The New Year.

1918 opens, as did 1917, with Christendom still at war. And so far as Christianity is concerned, 1928 might see the world still engaged in the pastime of destruction. Whenever and however the War comes to an end, the end will not be in the least due to the influence of Christianity, whether organized or unorganized. Discontent in the world of labour, the implied threat to capitalists if the War continues, the feeling that the lengthening of the War may threaten the security of a dominant class, scarcity of food, even the war-weariness in the Army itself, all these factors may combine to bring the War to a close; but no one would be daring enough to suggest that the influence of Christianity will be strong enough —even as a discernible factor—to lead the world back into the ways of peace. Powerless to prevent the War breaking out, the Churches of Christendom show themselves equally impotent to bring it to a close. All they can offer the world is the futile imbecility of a Day of Prayer. But it is not the intercession of prayer the world requires; what it needs is the intercession of common sense.

The Savage in Our Midst.

Each year of the War has been ushered in by a Day of Prayer, and each year has seen the War growing more ruthless. That is God's answer—if he answers at all—to the petitions of his followers. In each country millions of Christians pray to their Deity that he will help them to kill a few hundred thousand of his followers in some other country—for that is really what a Day of Prayer amounts to. They do not put it thus plainly—religion in a civilized country is nothing if it is not hypocritical; but as our leaders are convinced that peace is impossible until enough Germans have been killed to break the German military class, and as German leaders are equally convinced that peace cannot come until the "mailed fist" and "shining sword" have established their supremacy, no other meaning can be given to the petition. And if God does answer these prayers, his reply is to be read in the casualty lists. In the mediæval period, people carried the images of saints in front of them for protection. Further back in the history of human culture we find savages carrying their gods before them when advancing to attack a hostile tribe. The savage with his Ju-Ju, the mediæval Catholic with his image, the modern parson with his Day of Prayer, what is the mental difference between the three? There is none; despite difference of language and dress, they are absolutely upon the same level. The dress of the archbishop masks the paint and crude ornaments of the savage medicine-man; the paint of the medicine-man holds the promise of the elaborate dress of the archbishop. Modern God and primitive Ju-Ju, primitive priest and present-day parson, they are all of a piece. A substantial identity exists beneath a difference of dress. The call to a Day of Prayer is a call to the savage in our midst. Civilization has not destroyed the savage yet. He is merely restrained with occasional periods of liberty. And on January 6 he is having a day out—by Royal Command.

What Has God Done?

One may well wonder whether any reasonable being really expects anything to follow from this "Command" day of prayer? Will it have any effect on the German armies? Will it have any influence on our own? If it will, why not concentrate on prayer, and end the War in a way suitable to ourselves? Why trouble about economy campaigns, and loan campaigns, if our vital need is really a prayer campaign? Why not mobilize the parsons and leave the laymen at home? We have the King's word that we can only have victory if the "blessing of Almighty God" rests upon our endeavours. But in a war victory usually rests on someone's endeavours, and we must, therefore, conclude that whoever succeeds, God has blessed their endeavours. And a further conclusion is that, when the Germans were driven back from the Marne and the Somme, God blessed our endeavours, and when the Germans swept over Poland, and Serbia, and Belgium, and Italy, God blessed their endeavours. But, perhaps, the truer view is that God has nothing at all to do with it. That would certainly be more complimentary to the Deity. For imagine the moral value of a God with the power to end the War refusing to act until the nation goes on its its knees and asks him to intervene! A God worth spending sixpennyworth of incense on would have ended the War long ago. He would have prevented the German armies marching across Belgium, he would have stayed the sinking of civilians at sea, and the murder of civilians on land. He has done none of these things, and we are now asked to collectively arise and remind him that there is a war on, that it is time he did something! Could absurdity go further? A God who needs petitioning in such a connection is not worth the trouble of asking.

The Bursting of a Bubble.

Certainly 1917 can have given the Churches small cause for pleasure, and 1918 offers them but little comfort in prospective. When the War commenced, all the Churches did what they could to make capital out of the world-agony—the falsehood that the War was due to the growth of Freethought, alternated with deliberately concocted lies concerning revivals of religion at home and abroad. There is no need to mince matters; the people who spread these stories about a revival of religion must have known they were not true. When men like the Bishop of London went to France and told the soldiers of the revival of religion in England, they knew it was not true. And when they came home and told us about the revival of religion amongst the troops, they knew the tale was false. There was no room for an innocent mistake. There was no revival either at home or abroad, and that fact is now so patent that even the pretence of a revival is given up. The War did not revive men's faith in Christianity; on the contrary, it broke through the cover of a formal profession of faith, and brought them face to face with facts. And the result is that at no previous period have the Churches stood so low in the public estimation as now. Thousands have discarded Christianity who but for the War might have gone on rendering it a formal support. The War has broken through many shams, and one of them has certainly been the sham of religion as a beneficent force in human affairs. * * *

The Future for Freethought.

But if the outlook is dark, so far as the immediate future of the Christian Churches is concerned, it is promising enough for Freethought. We are not among those who foresee a millennium when the War is over. We do not believe that with the declaration of peace, the capitalist and the working-man, the squire and the agricultural labourer, will embrace and forget all their old differences, and causes of conflict. On the contrary, we foresee a stormy period ahead, and even a struggle to get back some of the liberties that we have lost for the avowed purpose of prosecuting the War. But we need not wait for the end of the War to see the progress made by Freethought. It is not that there have been—to use a cant term—conversions. We have no belief in conversions of any kind. It is rather, as we have said, there has been a realization. The shock of the War has compelled thousands to some sort of self-examination, with results wholly profitable to Freethought. There is a keener demand for militant Freethought literature to-day than has been the case for many years. There is a keener interest in Freethought lectures, and this in spite of so large a number of the younger and more adventurous spirits being out of the country, serving in either the Army or the Navy. The position of this journal, after more than three years of War, is itself an earnest of better days in store. The breaking down of Supernaturalism of necessity involves a gain to Naturalism; a weakening of faith in God is only the other side of a strengthening of confidence in reason and humanity. Peace will see a world weary of War, and largely disillusioned as regards the value of religious belief. And this will give Freethought a better chance than it has yet had to make its power felt in the life of the world.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

It is startling to think of the heavy, rough, actual wood of the Cross, and to observe that now the Cross has become only a symbol, and is decked with silken tassels and little velvet flags, and is guaranteed easy for carrying. Moreover, its victory was assured when it was accepted among the world's trinkets and worn as jewellery.—W. R. Paterson, "Benjamin Swift."

Stocktaking.

> One calls to me out of Seir (Edom), Watchman, what of the night? Saith the watchman, Morning cometh, and also night; if ye will inquire, inquire; go, come again (Isaiah xxi. 11, 12).

THAT is a delightfully sensible passage. It encourages neither unreasoning optimism nor hope-extinguishing pessimism. Egypt was being invaded by the Assyrian hosts, and the prophet represents the inhabitants of Idumæa as eager to learn whether or not their beloved country was likely to fall within the invaders' sweep. The prophet's answer was characteristically diplomatic. On the whole their chance of escape was good; but they must be on the alert: they must be neither unduly elated with confidence, nor cast down into despair; their duty was to keep their eyes and ears open, and be ready for any emergency. They must also be in close touch with their leaders, and never fall asleep. That is a principle applicable to any cause in any age or country. It behoves Freethinkers, every now and then, to inquire: "Watchman, what of the night? How do we stand? What are our prospects?" This is the season for stocktaking, for making an examination and inventory of goods in hand, and the prospects of the business, whatever it may be. Soon after the War broke out, clergymen confidently predicted that the death-knell of Rationalism had been sounded; in fact, that all anti-Christian movements were doomed to disappear—never to return. One of the loudest of such prophets was the Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Regent's Park Chapel, who joyously assured the readers of the Christian World that the future belonged to Christ and his Church, and that Freethought organizations had received notice to quit. At the time, to superficial observers, it seemed as if the prophecy had every likelihood of being speedily fulfilled. Churches and chapels were crowded to the doors, and the obsolete prayer meeting shot into prominence as the most popular institution of the day. Even the secular press had such headlines as "A Nation on its Knees," and "A Whole People at Prayer." The War was going to bring about the mightiest revival of religion the world had ever seen, and here it was already knocking at the doors. Surely this was the day of the glorious triumph of Christ, and the final overthrow of all his enemies.

For a while, we repeat, it looked as if Freethought was actually at the end of its tether, because the nations were returning to the God of their fathers; but only for a very short while. In a few months the religious wave that swept over the land had spent itself, and the people borne Christwards on its crest drifted back to where it had picked them up, with the result that in a recent interview the Rev. Dr. Orchard had the courage to admit that religion is now at a deplorably low ebb throughout the land. Instead of a religious revival, a religious decline appears to have set in everywhere. And Freethought is still alive. Even the Literary Guide and the Freethinker, over which Mr. Spurr waxed so sarcastically merry in one of his articles, have not had the decency to verify the reverend gentleman's prediction, but are even flourishing, despite the extremely adverse conditions under which they are being published. Indeed, we may honestly say that the outlook for our cause was never more encouraging and inspiring than it is at this moment. It is admitted by fair-minded clergymen that the War has destroyed the faith of multitudes, and added numerous recruits to the ranks of the army of freedom. Such being the case, one naturally asks, why do the people of to-day abandon the creed which their ancestors cherished with such ardour for so many centuries? Why does the religion of the Cross so completely fail to meet their intellectual and moral requirements? Mr. Bottomley has told us that he went to hell on the battlefield, and there saw the glory of God; but that is the first time we have ever known the place of torment to yield such a glowing, happy vision. Does the editor of John Bull verily believe that hell, wherever it may be, is a revelation of the glory of the God of justice and love? Is it not rather an irrefragable evidence of the non-existence of a Supreme Being who is said to rule the world in righteousness and truth? Some there are who argue that the War, at its worst, is only an egregious aggravation of evils and miseries and horrors from which humanity at the best of times has never been wholly free. We admit it, and have always maintained that the prevailing conditions of life afford an unanswerable argument for Atheism. What we are calling attention to now is the fact that in this War those evil conditions have assumed such unprecedented proportions, and become so enormously intensified, that thoughtful men and women are having their eyes opened to the infinite absurdity of the belief in a righteous and good Deity. It is an old argument, brought home to thousands for the first time by the horrible carnage going on day and night on the battlefields. In this respect Freethought stands to gain even by the War, while religion is being increasingly discredited thereby. How frequently have we recently heard the exclamation: "This war has robbed me of faith in Divine Providence, and made an Athiest of me." Seeing hell at the Front, many a British soldier has had a radically different vision from the one described by Mr. Bottomley.

The Christian religion is being so entirely discredited because it is not true. Many of its present-day champions assert that the two most cardinal articles in its creed are the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. As a matter of fact, however, neither article is to be found in the New Testament. The Gospel Jesus never throws out even the remotest hint that God is the Father of the human race as such. The Jews who persecuted him said: "We were not born in fornication; we have one Father, even God." Jesus gave them the lie direct, saying, "If God were your Father, ye would love me"; and to his disciples he confidently spoke of God as his Father and theirs. In John's Gospel we read thus: "As many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name." One of the great words in the Pauline Epistles is "adoption"; and the doctrine taught therein is that we are not children of God by nature, but become so by adoption. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God. For ye received not the spirit of bondage again unto fear, but ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." In the New Testament brotherhood also is restricted to the disciples of Christ. By Jesus himself his followers were addressed as "brethren," while "the Gentile and the publican" were treated as outsiders (Matt. xviii. 17). Paul invariably spoke of his converts as "brethren." In 1 Peter ii. 17, we are exhorted to "honour all men" and to "love the brotherhood."

Now, whatever some modern preachers may say, the fact remains that the Bible does not represent God as the Father of all men, or all men as brothers. Furthermore, Christianity ignores the natural greatness and dignity of man, and persists in depicting him as fallen, depraved, and lost, and as incapable of a life worth living except through faith in the finished work of Christ. They who become Christians confess that this world is not their home, that their citizenship is in heaven, and that their life here, as such, possesses no value whatever. On earth they are but strangers and pilgrims, "seeking after a country of their own," and looking for "the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God." The only legitimate inference from such expressions is that Christianity is a religion, not for this world, but pre-eminently for the world to come. Indeed, St. John instructs his readers to be on their guard against setting their affections on things earthly, because, he says, "the world passeth away," and is not worth bothering about.

These aspects of the Christian religion, once they are seen in their true light, condemn it as utterly unworthy of survival as the alleged inspirer and guide of man's life on earth. This is being found out by an ever-growing number of people, with the inevitable result that they become non-religious. Dr. Fort Newton recalls the pathetic refrain in classic lore, "The Gods do not care"; and he admits that "in one form or another this idea of Divine indifference pursued the classic mind like a Nemesis," and that "its long shadow has not entirely vanished yet." The reverend gentleman is not quite blind to the fact that to-day "faith is terribly tried and men everywhere are troubled by grave questionings"; but he is fundamentally mistaken when he describes the loss of faith as due to "giving way to impulsive illogic." The truth is that belief in God's care for men is always entertained in spite of the logic of facts. Does not Newman himself affirm that "it is a great question whether Atheism is not as philosophically consistent with the phenomena of the physical world as the doctrine of a creative and governing power"? That great man came to a pass when he had to embrace either Atheism or Catholicism; and though for himself he chose the latter, he has left it on record that an unbiased contemplation of the phenomena of the world leads to Atheism, Pantheism, or Polytheism (Apologia, pp. 323, 377, 379).

All things considered, then, we conclude that we have every reason to stir up our courage in confident hope of the final victory of our cause. The Freethought tree is spreading its branches in all directions, and all classes of men are finding grateful shade underneath them. There is no room for despair, or even for doubt. Within the Churches as well as without, our banner is held aloft, and many a clergyman is at heart on our side. Mr. Augustine Birrell speaks slightingly of Paine's Age of Reason, characterizing it as a work which "nobody is ever likely to read for instruction or amusement"; but be that true or false, the fact remains that the critical conclusions of the Age of Reason are now adopted and expressed by all the leading Biblical scholars, and scarcely anybody has the temerity to protest. Superstition is visibly passing; and the period of moral and social reconstruction on a purely natural and sound basis has already commenced. This affords ample ground for rejoicing, and justifies us in predicting for one another a happy and prosperous new year in the noble service of humanity.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Tame Torquemada.

The creed of Christendom is gradually melting away, like a northern iceberg floating into southern seas.—G. W. Foote.

EVERY bishop, it seems, must have his biography; and there have been episcopal biographies which made their readers groan. Hence, it is not surprising that a leading light of Nonconformity should have "related himself to paper," and Dr. Robert F. Horton's Autobiography (Allen & Unwin) is amply justified. It is the intimate record of a very full life, told with sincerity. Earnestness is its outstanding quality; and the wonder is that after so many years tilting at windmills, this Free Church Don Quixote should retain his crusading spirit unabated.

Dr. Horton is one of the last of the "hot gospellers," but he has stronger affinities to Newman Hall than to Spurgeon and Billy Sunday. Indeed, Spurgeon regarded him as one of the "Down Grade" heretics. The life-like portrait Dr. Horton has painted of himself emphasizes most clearly the outstanding differences between himself and the Boanerges of the Newington Tabernacle and the Playboy of the Western World. Dr. Horton has a passion for "crying for the moon," and has always set himself seriously to the solving of some of the social problems of the age. He has not hesitated to say frankly what he thinks; and, doing so, has offended susceptibilities. The most interesting quality of Dr. Horton's Autobiography is, however, not the prejudices of the author, but the light thrown on the religious and social life of our time.

Reared in a Nonconformist home, Dr. Horton was eyed with some suspicion in his schooldays. At Shrewsbury school he was appointed crier, which compelled the holder to end announcements with the pious adjuration, "God save the Queen, and down with the Radicals." He only escaped this pleasant ordeal by his removal to New College, Oxford. It will be news to many to learn that Dr. Horton rowed in the Oxford Eight five years consecutively. Still in his study hangs the oar which helped the boat up in 1887; and his section of the victorious vessel is now a cupboard to hold books.

Dr. Horton was fortunate with his acquaintances, and he watched the celebrities he met with a critical eye, and jotted down his impressions with determination. He tells an amusing tale of Professor Bywater, who was always talking of Plato: "When I was a child I was vaccinated and christened; neither of them took." The talented and unfortunate Oscar Wilde was also a student, and sat for his examination with Horton, who says:—

> I see him now, with his flabby face and ruffled hair, striding up to the desk for fresh paper after the first hour; then handing in his book half an hour before time was up. He was a genius, and for him to pose was second nature. Of course, he was in the first class; he reached by sheer ability a position which I had gained only by the concentrated and interested labour of two years.

These recollections of his Oxford days have more than a passing interest. "Milner," he says, referring to the Union debates, was the speaker of that time who made the greatest mark afterwards. He had a somewhat foreign accent, and never struck us as quite English, but his intellectual mastery was the prophecy of his famous career." Dr. Horton adds a caustic comment on the intelligence of the governing classes:—

> My Union experiences were not without their value in opening my eyes to the nature of English public life. When I was president my predecessor and successor were Lymington (now the Earl of Portsmouth) and Brodrick (now Lord Midleton). Thrown a good deal into their company, I found out the slender equipment with which the governing classes, by the weight of their traditions, could be carried to the highest places.

Dr. Horton decided to adopt the ministry, as his father and grandfather had done. "I knew that in Dissent," he writes, "it is absolutely impossible to obtain a distinction which gives you any acknowledged place in the national life." This is a hard saying in a civilized country, for Horton belonged to the Congregationalists, one of the oldest, wealthiest, and most reputable of the Free Churches. Always a "whole-hogger," he announced his intention of declining the title of Reverend and refusing to adopt clerical dress. "I shall wear," he declared, with a plentiful lack of humour, "no clothes to distinguish me from my fellow-Christians." The Oxford "barbarians" made rare fun of this remark, and caricatured Horton soaring to the sky and tearing off his clothes.

There are more serious things in the book than these trifles. Dr. Horton's first speech at the Oxford Union was in defence of the rights of Nonconformists to bury their own dead with their own rites. A Free Church minister had lost his wife, and when he brought her to the churchyard he found that the place allotted to her was a rubbish-heap. It was happenings such as this which determined Horton to enter the Congregational ministry. Had it not been for these ecclesiastical antagonisms, he might have entered the Church of England, and, to quote his own words, "even have risen to be a canon." And, as canons go, he would have been a good one.

Dr. Horton's indignation at the Church's conduct towards Nonconformists was only natural; but it must be remembered that the Church's attitude towards the working classes was equally objectionable. What sixteen centuries of the rule of the Bishops had done for the common people has been told by Joseph Arch, the first agricultural labourer who became a member of Parliament. In moving language he described the conduct of Churchmen towards their poorer brethren:—

> First up walked the squire to the communion rails; the farmers went up next; then up went the tradesmen, the shopkeepers, the wheelwright and the blacksmith, and then, the very last of all, went the poor agricultural labourers. They walked up by themselves; nobody else went with them; it was as if they were unclean—and at the sight the iron entered into my heart and remained fast embedded there. I said to myself, "If that's what goes on—never for me!"

The Torquemada strain in Dr. Horton shows itself in his abortive efforts to impose Puritanism on his fellow-citizens. Once he determined to preach in support of a crusade against music-halls. "Then it occurred to me," he says, naively, "that I had never been to such a place." So he went, and found the performance decorous and commonplace. "It was deplorable," in Dr. Horton's view, "that human beings should find pleasure in things so banal, stupid, and insipid." However, to his credit, he recast the notes of his sermon.

Dr. Horton's personality could neither have grown nor thriven outside the British Isles. It is one of the oddest of blends, for it includes a good deal of Paul Pry, a touch of Pecksniff, and an infinite amount of Sunday-school teacher. In the bad old days of absolute monarchy it was a law with all good citizens that "the king could do no wrong." This adage Dr. Horton has applied to himself. He magnanimously denounces all those who dare to utter a word that might not profit the little boys and girls of that Hampstead conventicle he himself adorns. Dr. Horton's theology, however liberal it may be, has not yet reached the level of Freethought, nor can it ever do so until it ceases to be theology and becomes simple Secularism. For any purpose connected with the real welfare of the people, the Christian religion might as well be dead and buried—as it will be when the people see the truth.

Mimnermus.

A Fragment on Matrimony.

Among civilized communities the system of monogamy is in every way the best. That love which lies deep does not depend upon external attractions alone. It arises from mental sympathy, and is permanently nourished by mutual affection and esteem. This form of love deepens and develops as the years roll round, and there is, perhaps, no more beautiful human spectacle than that displayed by the venerable married couple most happy when most united, albeit youth and youthful beauty have long since fled. Not that youth and beauty are necessarily associated. Many a grandparent possesses an intellectual loveliness of feature which is the harvest of a well-spent life. Professor Bain has shrewdly observed that:—

> The sociable interest is by its nature diffused: even the maternal feeling admits of plurality of objects; revenge does not desire to have but one victim; the love of dominion needs many subjects; but the greatest intensity of love limits the regard to one.

Nor is this overmastering passion for the sole possession of the adored one peculiar to the higher human stocks. Uncivilized races furnish examples of its power, while Brehm and other careful observers have described its occurrence among birds. In his Descent of Man, Darwin submits evidences of the monogamous instincts of domesticated mammals, and there is ample proof that most birds pair for life. But although an unbroken partnership constitutes the ideal state of matrimony, this need not discountenance reasonably easy and inexpensive divorce. When an ill-matched couple find it impossible to endure enforced companionship or cohabitation, every rational facility should be afforded for divorce with the right to re-marry so long as the interests of the innocent children are properly safeguarded. The offspring are necessarily the first consideration, for they were not consulted as to their birth; the children are frequently helpless; they suffer acutely amid domestic misery, and in them resides the future of the race. Therefore, with complete security of the rights of the children unsuitable alliances could be expeditiously dissolved with great advantage to the distracted partners, their offspring, and the social organism.

The duration of wedlock varies widely among different communities. With some peoples the ties of matrimony are so slender that they scarcely endure for a season. On the other hand, Man, the traveller, asserts that in the Andaman Islands the marriage union is absolutely indissoluble. The Yeddahs of Ceylon, certain New Guinea races, and several tribes of the Indian Archipelago never part until separated by death. But in the majority of cases the marriage contract is easily broken. In Greenland, Nansen tells us the married couple frequently separate after a six months' marriage. Waitz states that the Wyandots take their partners on trial, and should the experiment prove unsatisfactory the parties separate after a few days have elapsed. Among the savages of Australia, the natives of Samoa, the Dyaks of Borneo, and numerous other uncivilized stocks, divorce is as easily obtained as marriage. In the far eastern East love is so fleeting that the people are incessantly occupied in changing their mates. Divorces are an everyday episode of Moslem life. The matrimonial bond is so loose with the Bedouins that Burckhardt met men of middle life who had been married more than fifty times. In Egypt, Lane noticed a similar state of affairs. Very few are the dwellers in Cairo who have not divorced one spouse at least. In fact, as Professor Westermarck records in his invaluable History of Human Marriage, many native Eyyptians—> have in the course of two years married as many as twenty, thirty, or more wives; whilst there are women, not far advanced in age, who have been wives to a dozen or more men successively.

Winwood Reade, in his Savage Africa, remarks of the Sahara Moors that they considered it improper for man and wife to live too long together, and "the leaders of fashion are those who have been the oftenest divorced." Old wives vanish, and new spouses appear so frequently in the household of the Bondo Negro that the paternity of the children is a subject of the haziest conjecture.

With various races in all stages of savage and semi-civilized development the husband has full liberty to send his wife away. The Aleuts commonly bargained their women for food and raiment. In Tongo the man merely informs his helpmeet that he desires her no longer when he wishes to divorce her. Among the ancient Israelites, again, if the woman failed to reach the man's standard of excellence he simply bade her depart. This is plain from the following verses:—

> When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it into her hand, and send her out of the house.
> And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife.—(Deuteronomy, ch. xxiv. v. 1, 11).

With other peoples other customs prevail, even the Greenlanders rarely dismiss their wives when they are mothers, and divorces are infrequent among many of the North American Indians. With numerous native races in all parts of the world the marriage tie is regarded as much too sacred for hasty dissolution, and many instances are recorded from China to Peru where divorce is the exception rather than the rule.

Recognition of the parent's duties towards the offspring has materially influenced the marriage customs of quite uncivilized races. No divorce is available among the Kukis if the wife has given birth to a son; but if the union prove barren, the man may discard his spouse and wed another. In Indo-China divorce is permitted among the Red Karens when the marriage proves childless, but the birth of one child is sufficient to prevent divorce. Hunter states that with the Santals and Tipperahs of India the consent of the husband's clansmen or that of a jury of village elders is essential to secure a divorce. With sundry backward tribes adultery alone will condone divorce, and among various other communities public sentiment serves to strengthen the dignity of marriage. Even with some extremely uncivilized races the wife's assent forms an important factor in cases of separation. The ancient Mexicans viewed matrimony as a permanent contract, and divorce was frowned upon both by the priests and the people. Adultery, in Nicaragua, constituted the only offence which empowered a husband to divorce his partner. Although divorces are easily obtainable in China, Medhurst ascertained that separation is comparatively rare in that country. Legal facilities for divorce are very reasonable in Japan; but according to Professor Rein and other authorities, the softening influences of family life are so healing that the marriage bond is seldom broken, and divorces are relatively rare.

In Rome and Greece divorces were easy of accomplishment, particularly in their later periods. With the triumph of the Christian religion, facilities for judicial separation were restricted, and the New Testament text, "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder," was sternly quoted against all dissenters. Still, divorces were from time to time conceded to the rich and powerful, until the Council of Trent, in the sixteenth century, "definitely suppressed the last traces of divorce as a legal practice."

Catholic countries still suffer from the Church's pronouncement. Divorce was established in France by the great Revolution. It was sanctioned and utilized by Napoleon, but it disappeared with the reaction which succeeded his fall. The Republic waited until 1884, when the Government became sufficiently stable to withstand all the plots of the royalists and clericals. Then, on the 27th of July, divorce was restored to the statute books of France. In Spain and Italy a husband may apply for a legal separation, but the marriage contract cannot be annulled.

The Reformation led to an amelioration of the Canon Law in Protestant States. The proof of adultery on the part of the wife is now sufficient to secure dissolution of marriage throughout the Protestant world, although the law varies in other respects in different countries. Under the Prussian "Landrecht," debauchery, drunkenness, insanity of more than a year's duration, and the combined wishes of the two partners in the absence of offspring, are among the provisions for divorce. When the married pair have remained judicially separated for three years, divorce is available in Denmark and Norway by mutual consent. Even in Jesuit-ridden Austria unconquerable aversion, when conclusively established, finds its solution in divorce. Clericalism, however, was, in the 'fifties, too powerful in Ireland to permit the inclusion of that country in the new divorce legislation of England. To this hour divorce is only possible in Ireland by special Act of Parliament.

It is a legitimate inference from analogy that aboriginal man paired with his partner until after the birth of the offspring. Whether the union persisted longer, we cannot say. Trustworthy observers have noted that the man-like apes form family groups, and it is a fair deduction that the habits of primitive races were very similar. After a long and careful consideration of all the available data, Westermarck concludes that on the whole the tendency towards lifelong unions has increased with the advance of civilization. Nevertheless, that anthropologist regards a further freedom as inevitable among civilized mankind. For—

> It must be remembered that the laws of divorce in Christian Europe owe their origin to an idealistic religious command which, interpreted in its literal sense, gave rise to legal prescriptions far from harmonizing with the mental and social life of the mass of the people. The powerful authority of the Roman Catholic Church was necessary to enforce the dogma that marriage is indissoluble. The Reformation introduced somewhat greater liberty in this respect, and modern legislation has gone further in the same direction.

Even in England there is now a fair prospect for an advantageous rationalization and reform of our effete laws relating to divorce. And despite the angry antagonism of the representatives of Rome at the top, right down to the pastors of the puniest Bethels at the bottom, this urgent and far-reaching improvement cannot long be delayed.

The Parson's Thanksgiving Prayer.

The following lines—slightly altered—appeared in the Freethinker at the end of the Boer War. They are so appropriate to the present situation that we have ventured to reprint them.

ALMIGHTY GOD, whose only Son
Was dead against all "scrapping,"
We very nearly had begun
To think that Thou wast napping.

We now approach Thy Throne of Grace,
Not far from Ludgate Circus,
To "kid" the foolish British race,
And—keep us from the "work'us."

O Lord, we're thankful 'tis Thy will
To set the nations squabbling;
We're glad Thou art a Briton still;
We thought Thou had'st been "wobbling."

We thought that Thou had'st been and gone
And joined the Hun rapscallions,
Forgetting that Thou'rt always on
The side of big battalions.

Almighty God, we hope that we Shall bring them to submission,
Those horrid Germans, thanks to Thee
And—lots of ammunition.

We beg an answer to our prayers,
Clear cut, without evasion,
Regretting Thou hast answered theirs
On more than one occasion.

Thanks, Lord, for leading us in war,
The field to slay the foe on;
"Thanksgiving Day" would be no more
If nations had no war on.

O pardon what we've done amiss
To make our vict'ry tardy;
O Lord, we'd quite forgotten this:
The Kaiser's not the Mahdi.

There's one thing more we ask of Thee,
And trust that Thou wilt heed it:
Fill us with generosity;
Thou knowest that we need it!

VI.

The tragedy of the child in modern civilization has been, or should have been, made obvious to every thinker by the conditions of life which we find around us to-day. The child mind, so delicate and pure in quality; so susceptible to environment, and so fanciful in its imagination, has for its home to-day an insane hot-bed of corrupted brains and decadent ideas. All things would seem to conspire against the purity and delicacy of the child mind. It is born flower-like into an atmosphere reeking with the foul odours of extreme commercialism, sordid competition, struggles for existence, militarism, and general degradation.

Who can adequately estimate the disastrous psychological effects of this diseased environment upon the infant personality? What reward would sincere investigators receive? What attention and honest thought? Practically none. The idealist and the reformer cannot but be forced to one conclusion; that high-minded purpose, idealism, beauty, and the coloured joy of life, are utterly alien, and even repulsive to the modern brain, which prefers to fatten upon gross and ugly realities of its own manufacture. Observe, for instance, in the large and popular toy-shops (which set themselves the task of pleasing the child mind) how important the idea of militarism has become since the War. Remember that the emotional and spectacular imagination of the child is inflamed by the sensational "Khaki Outfits," toy swords, pistols, cannons, soldier's hats, and even miniature uniforms, &c. Look for beauty in a modern toy-shop and you will be disappointed. This is only one example of the systematic corruption of the child mind. Contamination awaits it at every turn—escape seems impossible. Only those children gifted with abnormal personalities and even genius can withstand, or attempt to withstand, the polluted stream of civilization as it sweeps down into the gutters of time.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

THE FATE OF CHRISTIANITY.

The same means that have supported every other popular belief, have supported Christianity. War, imprisonment, murder, and falsehood; deeds of unexampled and incomparable atrocity have made it what it is. We derive from our ancestors a belief thus fostered and supported. We quarrel, persecute, and hate for its maintenance. Does not analogy favour the opinion that, as, like other systems, Christianity has arisen and augmented, so like them it will decay and perish; that, as violence, darkness, and deceit, not reasoning and persuasion, have procured its admission among mankind, so, when enthusiasm has subsided, and time, that infallible controverter of false opinions, has involved its pretended evidences in the darkness of antiquity it will become obsolete; that Milton's poem alone will give permanency to the remembrance of its absurdities; and that men will laugh as heartily at grace, faith, redemption, and original sin, as they would now do at the metamorphoses of Jupiter, the miracles of Romish saints, the efficacy of witchcraft, and the appearance of departed spirits.—Shelley.

Acid Drops.

The article in the Nation, by "An Officer," to which reference was made in these columns last week, has been followed by a letter from "Another Officer" on the same lines. He endorses the statement that "the most unpopular feature of Army life" is the Church parade. He adds :—

> At a certain Cadet School in Sussex (name herewith) it was decided, some months ago, to make Church Parade voluntary. Result—no Church Parade and the issue of an order to the effect that one Company would turn out each Sunday.
> The Church has no more hold on the civilian in the Army than it has on him outside the Army. Therefore the armed (and powerless) civilian does object very strongly to being forced to listen to men (who, in many cases, obviously do not credit him with the intelligence of a Tierra del Fuegan native) preaching at him.
> At the present time the soldier's religion is, probably, composed chiefly of a little faith and a lot of hope; that he will one day escape from the horror and misery of war; that he may be delivered from the endless parades—church and others—the dull, brainless routine of army life, and be a man again, free to walk how, when, and where he chooses, and to have his haircut when he likes.
> In the meantime it would interest him to know why the Padres are all officers.—Yours, &c.

Many others besides soldiers would like to know why parsons rank as officers—with a comfortable salary.

On one point, however, "Another Officer" is mistaken. He says: "Soldiers are officially obliged to have a religion, and if, in the flurry of joining up, they are unable to think at the moment of one, they are entered as C. of E." But this is not the case. Soldiers need not profess any religion on joining the Army. Many men, and many officers, seem to be of a different opinion; but it is not the case. A soldier is asked his religion, and his reply must be taken as given. It is because so many are ignorant of this that a profession of some religion is insisted on. And in a profession where men are washed by order, dressed by order, and put to bed by order, probably many do not see why they should not have a religion by order likewise.

The clergy are quaint folk, and, in the expressive French phrase, "live in baloons." For instance, note the interest these men have in the War. They are exempted from military service, and when they do act as army chaplains they get the pay of officers and not that of privates. Their profession is almost the only one unaffected by the War. The burning question of the moment with them is not the prosecution of the War, but concerns the orthodoxy of Dean Hensley Henson, who has been appointed to the see of Hereford.

"Christmas waits have been scarce this year," sighs a contemporary. We wonder what the folk who have stood in the food queues think of it.

Lord Hugh Cecil has expressed his staunch faith in eternal punishment—for other people. This reminds us of the story of the two Scotch elders who were discussing the question of the everlasting bonfire. One of the elders scouted the notion of mercy, and broke out, "A kirk without a hell isna worth a single dam."

Reviewing a small book on the Achievements of Christianity, the Church Times contrives to pay the author a left-handed compliment. The object of the book is to show that Christianity is not discredited; that it has done and is doing much for civilization. The student of apologetics is told that if he reads the four short chapters he will hardly fail, "if not to be convinced, at least to be moved," by the arguments. We do not doubt it. Many readers will be moved to pity the writer for wasting his time and energy on so ungrateful a subject. But in the name of common sense, what is the value of an argument that does not convince?

Still, the reviewer is cheerful, if a bit muddle-headed. One ends by praising this "real thinker" whose arguments are not convincing, and assures us that there is a good time coming for the Christian faith.

> One of the most encouraging signs of the present day is the way in which the younger men, both clergy and laity, are devoting themselves to hard thought on the new problems, both theological and social, of the coming age. These problems they are facing with courage and confidence. They may make mistakes, but none can say that Christianity is bankrupt of intellectual and spiritual power when he thinks of the brilliant young men who are content to fight under its banner to-day. It is the agnosticism of the Huxley period that, like Giant Pope in Bunyan's allegory, has grown "crazy and stiff in its joints"; and has almost lost its power to injure.

We have read some of the sociological studies of these clerics and clerical-minded laymen, and have found them disappointingly amateurish. After all, what can we expect from people who imagine that anti-Christian polemic is still where Huxley and his Agnostic friend left it? One Agnostic we know is, curiously enough, a Broad Church clergyman, whose strong point is not coherent thinking. Most people who use their brains are Atheists. They know that they are as much entitled to deny the existence of God as Christians are to deny the existence of fairies. There is not an iota of evidence to show that fairies do not exist; but as sosn as it was obvious that there was no evidence to show that they do exist, the case went against them by default. We not only doubt their existence—we deny it. Agnosticism, as a witty writer once put it, is a feather bed to catch a fallen Theist.

The Bishop of London has once more unburdened his episcopal soul. "This is the time," he says, "for the nation at the critical moment of the conflict to tighten the belt." Surely a counsel of perfection from a bachelor bishop who enjoys a salary of £200 weekly for preaching the Gospel of Poverty.

One of the Yellow Press publications was quite lyrical in its Yuletide leader. "Let this Christmas be spent," it said, "by the faithful, in prayer." We wonder how many journalists had "housemaid's knee" owing to their devotions.

Bishop Welldon is exultant because "the birthplace of the Saviour is now safe under the shadow, not of the Crescent, but of the Cross." Couldn't Providence safeguard the old home without the assistance of Thomas Atkins?

"Christmas Day finds the British at Bethlehem," says the Sunday Pictorial. We thought that Cook's excursionists were no uncommon sight in the Holy Land.

"France has her holy places," declares that accomplished theologian, Mr. Horatio Bottomley. Perhaps he remembered that when good Americans die they go to—Paris.

Business men do not seem to mind whose corns they tread on when they are on the war-path of commercialism. Recently we saw a cigar-box with a coloured portrait of Buddha on the lid. Perhaps, before long, some enterprising tradesman will name a brand of cigarettes after the Second Person of the Trinity.

A cripple, charged at a London police-court with begging, admitted that he sometimes took five pounds in a day. The dear clergy will smile at this modest result.

A writer in the Staffordshire Sentinel says that when Dr. Hensley Henson, the new Bishop of Hereford, came to the East End of London, he at once challenged the "Bradlaughites" to put forward their best man. A debate was arranged with the result that the said "Bradlaughites" cheered Dr. Henson to the echo and "hissed their own champion off the platform." With the usual care for the feelings of Freethinkers, we note that the name of this discredited champion is withheld. It would complete the story if the readers of the Sentinel were told that the man hissed off the platform was Bradlaugh himself. When one is telling a lie one might as well go the whole hog and have done with it. As it is, the story is spoilt for want of a little artistic trimming.

We fancy the authority for the story is an unnamed curate, as it is a curate who informs the Sentinel writer that he remembers what a "disastrous blow" Dr. Henson dealt at "the truculent propaganda of Atheism" in East London. Well, we have a personal acquaintance with Atheism in the East End of London for going on thirty years, and we can only marvel at its rapid recovery. But the Bishop of London usually explains that it was he who laid out Atheism in the East End. Now it turns out to have been Dr. Henson. We rather imagine it was "Mrs. Harris."

The American Young Men's Christian Association has raised ten million pounds in two months. This raises begging to one of the fine arts.

An ugly doll, representing a Conscientious Objector, has made its appearance in the toy-shops. And this is a country that professes to worship the Prince of Peace.

Pious folk who hailed the conversion of Mr. Horatio Bottomley to Christianity as a victory for the Faith had better moderate their transports, for it almost appears that the distinguished theologian is still searching for spiritual satisfaction. Writing of the British occupation of Jerusalem, Mr. Bottomley says, "may not one of the first fruits of the New Occupation be the merging of all the creeds of the Churches into a new Evangel for the succour of the souls of mankind?"

The dear clergy are always proclaiming their hard lot in converting a naughty world, but they do not say much about the "cushy jobs" in their profession. A Sunday paper declares that "the Dean of Windsor has little to do beyond supervising the services in St. George's Chapel, and he receives £2,000 a year to keep up the Deanery, a most comfortable residence in the Castle precincts."

Lord Longford, Prof. H. W. Mackintosh, a couple of canons, with other folk, sign a letter published in the Irish Times—the proper address of which would have been the district asylum. The lesson these people derive from the present state of affairs is that we are near the close of the "Times of the Gentiles," that the "Personal return of our Lord" cannot be far distant, all affairs should be considered in the light of this "Blessed Hope." What a long way off the "Age of Reason" does seem when one comes across such a production as this letter.

A writer in the Sunday Chronicle suggests using the Churches as centres for food distribution. We see no objection, and it would certainly be putting them to a more useful purpose than they serve at present, although if it were done we should find the Churches using it as an argument in favour of the truth of Christian doctrines. But why not ask the Churches to pray for a repetition of some of the Biblical miracles—say, of the loaves and fishes. That would get over the trouble at once.

The Times, which is so ready to exclude letters on all sorts of subjects that do not suit its policy, continues the publication, week after week, of letters on "Christian Reunion." And it is an illustration of the power of Christian brotherhood that after all these centuries Christians should be discussing whether it is possible for them to worship together. They can meet and work together on all sorts of non-religious matters, it is only when religion is on the carpet that they separate.

The Daily News of December 22 refers to a decision of the United States Supreme Court annulling an ordinance of Louisville which segregated the black population. It then refers to a case in which certain South African natives were forbidden to attend service on board a British transport on account of their colour. Someone wrote to the Primate about it, and he did not see his way to interfere in the matter. He added that "No problem has caused more distress and difficulty than the problem of the mixture of white and black at Divine Service." The brotherhood of man is a most elastic doctrine in all Christian countries.

We do not agree with the Society of Friends that "Christianity requires the toleration of opinions not our own lest we should unwittingly hinder the worship of the Spirit of God," for the reason that such has never been the opinion of any considerable body of Christians at any time or place. But, nevertheless, we do appreciate the decision of the Society to continue its publications on War and Peace without submitting them beforehand to the Censor, as required by Regulation 27c. That is the way to meet regulations of this character. Mere protest is useless. Tyranny is never disturbed by bluster, only by determined action. We repeat what we have said before, that we have no objection whatever to proper legal penalties being attached to treasonable literature, provided the decision as to what is treasonable be left to the Courts. But to make certain individuals, whose elevation to power may be the result of party political accident or trickery, the judges of what ought to be allowed publication, is an act of sheer tyranny. The public has no means of knowing what is suppressed, or why it is suppressed. Free opinion is stifled at its birth, and all that is left is a manufactured opinion both vicious and worthless. We don't care a brass button about the fortunes of political parties, but we do care a deal about freedom of speech and of the press; and we have hopes that this latest attempt to muzzle opinion will yet be given up as unworthy the traditions of British freedom.

Mr. H. B. Irving, speaking at the City Temple, said that some of the old Puritan prejudice against the theatre was due to the fact that more people went to the theatre than to church. This was getting right on the spot, and had Mr. Irving carried his researches back far enough, he would have discovered that the objection of the early Christians to the Roman games on Sunday was avowedly based on the fact that they kept people away from church. Later, this business aspect had to be disguised, and moral reasons were invented. These always flourished best here, for John Bull was always an easy first in discovering a moral reason for everything he did or contemplated doing.

The Rev. John Godsell Prentice, a Nottinghamshire rector, and his wife, were remanded at Nottingham the other day, charged with stealing 664 tickets, value £12 9s. 4d., from a Church Army canteen. Mr. and Mrs. Prentice will be tried on January 8. But it hardly seems the touch of a 'prentice hand.

"The creation of a strong, wide, tolerant, orthodox, reformed Church of England, as nearly as possible co-extensive with the nation," is the great need of to-day, says the Dean of Manchester, Whose need? We presume the Dean means his need, and the need of those in the same line of business as himself. No one else appears to be conscious of any such need. Anyway, we fancy the Dean will wait a long while before he sees a Christian Church co-extensive with the nation.

Man and Nature.

THE world rolls round for ever like a mill
And grinds out death, and life, and good, and ill;
It has no purpose, reason, mind, or will.

Man might know one thing, were his sense less dim,
That it rolls not to suit his petty whim,
That it is quite indifferent to him.

Yet mind is born as bursts a beauteous flow'r,
And man attains to intellectu'l power—
From clods, not gods, is caught this sentient dower.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 6, Manchester; January 13, London; January 20, Southampton; January 27, Swansea; February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 6, Birmingham; January 20, London; January 27, South Shields; February 3, Failsworth; February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester.

THE Editor begs to return thanks for the many Christmas and New Year good wishes that have reached him. As an earnest of goodwill, they are greatly appreciated.

J. F. AUST.—Thanks. See paragraph. Our best wishes for the New Year.

R. H. ROSETTI.—Your card reached us on Christmas Eve, and we were pleased to see it, as an indication that you are still well. We hope to see you before long.

A. F. DICKINSON.—Copies of the Freethinker for so far back as 1885 could only be obtained second-hand. It might be possible to pick up a bound volume for that year.

H. BULL.—We endorse your opinion that if people could only be induced to read and think sufficiently, the game of Christianity would be ended. However, greater numbers are now both reading and thinking, and that is so much to the good. Shall be pleased to see you when we visit Birmingham.

VINCIT OMNIA VERITAS.—Papers are being sent, and hope they will reach you safely. Balance will be used for sending copies of Freethinker to men at the Front. Thanks for good wishes, which we heartily reciprocate.

J. RANKIN.—The Bible Student's Monthly is distributed from house to house, and its character almost defies comment. There are some things in the world that are protected from criticism by their very stupidity. The leaflet you enclose is one of these.

J. H. WATERS.—Received, and shall appear. Thanks.

F. S. LAWES.—Pleased to know your newsagent is willing to display Freethinker poster, and also to display copies of the paper. When that is done sales are certain. We are sending on the posters for use.

S. CLOWES.—We did not mean that the victory over the L.C.C. had not a value for those outside London, only that it was of special value to Londoners as their liberty was directly attacked. That is why we directed our appeal specially to them.

C. W. GREEN.—There is no end to these fanciful interpretations of the Bible, which we regard as so much wasted ingenuity, even though they may carry with them a certain interest.

V. NEUBERG.—Pleased to hear from you, but sorry you have been spending time in hospital. Hope to see you home again soon, and that good luck will follow you through 1918.

"SAMMY."—Criticizing writings of the kind you enclose is a sheer waste of time. People who write and people who read this "prophetic" stuff are hopeless. It is the most hopeless form of religious imbecility.

W. W. KENSETT.—We are obliged for the consideration shown in your note. Having to face such things is one of the penalties of our position. We regret that want of space prevents our publishing your letter this week. We have received others on the same subject. If we cannot find room in our next, we may summarize the more pertinent ones.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings and best of wishes for the New Year.

C. GOODWIN.—We do not think 1918 will be easier for us than was 1917. It looks like being much harder; but we are not at all discouraged. And we feel sure that 1919 will see us still pegging away.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We commence with this number the thirty-eighth volume of the Freethinker. So far as Freethought journals in Europe are concerned this constitues a record. Thirty-seven years is a long while for a journal, such as this one, to endure, and its survival argues an unusually strong bond between writers and readers. And we think we may safely say that during the whole of its existence the Freethinker has never ceased to battle for freedom in a larger than a sectarian sense. It has championed Roman Catholic or Protestant equally with Freethinkers whenever it saw the legitimate freedom of either attacked. It has aroused bitter hatreds and devoted friendships; and the same cause has led to both. When a man or a paper acts with strength, he or it is bound to make both warm friends and fierce enemies. The latter may be avoided by a policy of hesitancy and compromise, but the former will also be sacrificed. And we certainly would never dream of losing our friends for the sake of placating our opponents.

And so, in spite of the depressing circumstances around us, we greet all our readers with the best wishes for a Happy New Year. The best of good fortunes would be that which brought back peace to this priest-ridden, superstition-drugged, and blood-deluged world. We owe our readers much for the help they have given during 1917, and we have evidence that there will be no slackening of effort during 1918. The Freethinker has more than held its own during these three years of war, and we have every confidence that the Freethinker flag will be flying as bravely and as proudly as ever when the War is over. The struggle gets harder as the War lengthens, but there is some consolation in the thought that every month brings us nearer the end.

We have planned a fairly elaborate programme for 1918, the details of which will become apparent as circumstances permit their realization. But we have mapped out for publication over a score of pamphlets, in addition to several books, some of the former of which will be of special interest to Freethinkers. Two things will determine the rate of their appearance—the possession of capital and the paper shortage. We fancy we can overcome the first, if the second does not become too acute. But the supply of paper grows shorter, and the price gets higher. Still, we have managed to put a number of new publications on the market, and some more new ones will certainly follow within the next few weeks.

The Manchester Branch of the N. S. S. commences its New Session to-day (January 6) with two lectures by Mr. Cohen in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Ardwick, at 3 o'clock and 6.30. The secretary writes that he is expecting good meetings, and we hope he will not be disappointed. There is nothing like a full house for encouraging audience, speaker, and organizers.

The Birmingham Branch opens its New Year course of lectures at the Repertory Theatre, Station Street, on Sunday, January 6, with a lecture by Mr. J. T. Lloyd, entitled "God and the War," with special reference to Mr. Arthur Machen's articles on the subject in the London Evening News. Comment will also be made on the National Day of Prayer.

We wish to call special attention to the course of Sunday afternoon lectures arranged to take place in the West Central Hall, Alfred Place, Tottenham Court Road. The lectures are arranged by the Executive of the N. S. S. Mr. Snell opens the course to-day (Jan. 6), at 3.15. His subject is one that should attract a good audience.

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

THE purpose of this Fund is to raise the balance of expenses—estimated at between £80 and £100 incurred in defending the right to sell literature at public meetings in the London parks. On the initiative of the N.S.S. a Protest Committee was formed, and after carrying the question into the High Court, the London County Council was induced to rescind the offending resolution. It was a splendid victory, and one which should specially appeal to all Londoners.

Previously acknowledged:—£31 2s.; J. G. Dobson, 2s. 6d.; S. Clowes, 2s. 6d.; P. Shakespeare and Cannock Friends, 5s.; J. White, 5s.; Four Draughtsmen, 10s.; O. A. S., £1; W. W. Kensett, 10s.; John Weeks, 2s.; B. B., 5s.: G. Grove, 2s.; Sam Hampson, 4s.

The Crows.

IN these times the young are beginning to realize what a fearful legacy their ancestors have left them. They cannot lay their fingers on the plague spot. Now, it must be very clear that fetters cannot be placed on our hands unless our minds have first been so thoroughly subjugated that we are, at any rate, ready to receive them. If we are the children of working-class, or so-called middle-class folk (for in actuality there is no difference), unless we are very lucky we receive our first fetter but a few days after we are born. What is this fetter? We are made members of some religious body or other, as like as not the Established Church of England. Whether it is Church of England or not, we come under the influence of the "Crows." Well did a more enlightened French nation dub the black-coated sycophants who neither toil nor spin, but whose whole subsistence depends upon the credulity of simple folk, blood suckers who prey one upon the other, and all upon the poor. This sounds like mere abuse, the invective of the untutored agitator, but it is true. I have searched in vain for one great action of the modern churches to help democracy and the mass of the people. On all hands they encourage the worst elements in the community. They encourage the idle, both rich and poor, the vagabonds to increase like mice and flood the labour market with cheap and inefficient labour, thereby forcing the artizan worthy of the name to lower himself in order to include the worthless as comrades. They encourage the exploiter of labour to put up the price of his wares, and to lower the pittances doled out to those he employs, they encourage the professional soldier, that enemy of progress, the lawyer, and in fact, all those in the community whose existence is sterile and dependent upon subservience. "But," you will say, "if this is so obvious, why is it tolerated for an instant?" In the first place, it is not so obvious to those who have been brought up in its tainted atmosphere from the earliest minutes of their existence. Weeds sown so young are very hard to eradicate. In order not to appear merely dogmatic and abusive, let us examine them and their systems piecemeal. Of the Mediæval Church I shall not speak, its many faults and vices are so patent. It was the bitterest enemy of Progress, both scientific and political; but let us, in common fairness, remember that the Early Church did at least stand in opposition to the actual rapacious governing class. It was the Church who excommunicated King John. The sanctuary knocker had a significance which is absolutely foreign to the Church to-day. The foul and incestuous union of Church and State has generated a breed of vices Christianity pure and simple is a doctrine of forgiveness and non-resistance. The Church, with its twin brothers, the Army and Navy, practically form the nucleus of the State. So we see that the Church in its very essence is essentially unchristian.

Since the doctrine of the Church is unchristian, what is it? Since it is not Jesus which binds all the Churches together, whether free or fettered, what, in the name of humanity, is it? When considering the subject, let us erase from our minds Jesus and the Brotherhood of Man, since it is only left to Freethinkers to respect them, and looking deeper, expose the real doctrine to light.

The Crows tell us that it is impossible to "make the best of both worlds." Nearly all the various sects and schisms agree on this point, especially that withered and anæmic object, the Church of England. It is a lie, unless to make the best of this world is to be either a business man or a clergyman, for if there is a Heaven above, there is no room in it for the conscious Pharisee. How dare they attempt to say to the starving man "that it will be made up to him" in the next world, with their dinners waiting for them at home? The first to talk like this is usually that monstrosity the "muscular Christian" curate, whose face is red with the blood of the meat meals he engulfs. How dare he talk of showing men the way to God when he knows nothing of God or the way? The yokel in the fields who sees the blue sky, the brown earth, and the green trees, or the sailor who sees the great waves trying to swallow him up, and hears the gale shrieking through the rigging; or, again, the mechanic who tends and feeds some huge engine with its remorseless steel arms and whirring wheels, knows more of God and his ways than this puny object. The Crows claim that they tend suffering and visit the sick and poor—another lie. If they spend so much time visiting the sick and trying to cure them by prayer, why is there so much sickness? Or is it that they merely cry "Baal! Baal!" to a God that hears them not? It is left for the hard-working doctor to bring them recovery or a more or less painless death. And if they do comfort the sick, they are paid to do it, a thing which the ordinary man does from the best motives for nothing. Their religion has not created human sympathy. And as for visiting the poor, it is a sham and a lie. How little do the unfortunate relish these compulsory district visitings by the miserable lay worker, who is usually some idiotic woman with no useful occupation; indeed, no occupation at all, except to meddle with what is best left alone. They preach an ascetic denial of this world's goods to those that don't possess them, but never to those that do, or to their own bishops and high paid clergy. And for this the wealthy, of whom their Founder said it was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for such to enter the kingdom of heaven, thank them, for it all helps to bind the thinking artizan and to pauperize the vagabond. They teach chastity to the young, and have enormous families themselves, for whether the marriage law should be amended or not, it is not the chatter of the clergy that renders the impure pure, all in a twinkling. They teach the idle and stupid to increase and multiply, to flood an already overstocked labour market, and to provide material for the "charitable" (loathsome word!) orgies of their parishioners. To prevent children is unheard of by them; it is potential murder. This, they say, when they must know that it is a hundred times more immoral to flood the world with children that cannot be kept, and for whom there is no room, and who, after wandering the streets, must ultimately become either hooligans or prostitutes. Nor will they touch upon the real and terrible problems that face us, such as unemployment (the result of their own teaching, by the way) or prostitution or venereal disease. Oh dear, no! Such things are not discussed in the drawing-rooms they frequent. Nor do they give a thought to their own sex-starved daughters who "help in the parish." We who are young and to whom the problems of life and love are very real, can procure no help whatever from our spiritual pastors. I know, for I am one who has tried. What do they offer us? Mouldy doctrines of sacerdotal rites. Do they really believe that a babe is "made a member of Christ," whatever that is, by a priest's fat hand and a little water? I trow not. Do they really believe that a child who dies without this rite, to quote a Jesuit, "crawls the red-hot floors of Hell"? If they do believe it, they are monstrous beasts; if not, liars. I hope and believe that the majority do not believe such rubbish, for it is easier to deal with a silly rogue than with an obscene fool. Is it possible that they still believe that indifferent port and war-bread can miraculously change to blood and wine, and that there is miraculous curative power in a bone that a dog would scorn to gnaw? No. The truth is they don't know what they believe and, what is more, they don't care.

And such are the men to whom the spiritual guidance of children is committed! It is a matter for great congratulation that the Sunday-schools both of the Established and of the "Free" Churches are annually being more and more depleted. Year by year they have to retreat from one stronghold to another, but their grip is still tight upon their hapless victims. How can we expect Labour to take the dignified position it merits, when the labourers of the future are spiritually suckled upon the milk of subservience? Link by link is the moral chain firmly riveted: first by baptism, when the recipient is quite irresponsible; from baptism, by easy stages, to catechism. This impudent proces verbal teaches yet more subservience. The words, "to order myself lowly and reverently to all my betters, and to submit myself lowly and reverently to all my pastors, masters, and spiritual teachers," are always dinned into the young head. If you throw enough mud, some will always stick. Just at the impressionable age it does stick right readily; and the pity of it is that this unspeakable cant is always taught just before the young person is entering the labour market. Mark this well, for it is very significant. The bud is nipped at exactly the right moment, and the mischief is done. After that, the young mind is further worried by being admitted to the communion. With regard to this rite, the Church of England has no definite doctrine at all. It wobbles between the two stools of meaningless symbolism and the facetious doctrine of transubstantiation, and ends up by sitting heavily and ignominiously on the floor. The mischief wrought by the Crows would fill a huge volume, and at any rate far outrun the scope of this essay. Mischief between husband and wife, parents and children, thereby severing the greatest and most sacred bond between humankind; misappropriation of funds, public and private; grabbing of land and rents (for the Ecclesiastical Commission is a notoriously heavy-handed landlord), all go to swell the long catalogue of the misdeeds and crimes of the Church. All that applies with equal force to the dissenting bodies, for whether one pipes to the multitude wearing a cope and mitre, or a black cassock, or a white tie, or a scarlet jersey, the net result is the same. They all stand for mental bondage and domination. They are all playing the tyrant's game. The only difference between the various breeds of Crow is that the chains they wish to bind on us differ in colour. They pipe, but happily fewer and fewer dance to the tune.

The War for a time restored to the Crows some of their vanishing power, for in the mental disorder that inevitably follows on any upheaval, people lose their balance and fall back on superstition and darkness. Hence we see that the Crows, along with necromancers and fortune-tellers, for a time regained some of their lost popularity. It is easy for a cleric to twist, and the Prince of Peace is soon made to don khaki. However, the mental miasma soon lifts, and the Crow is seen with his feathers more ruffled than ever. How cheerfully they shouted for king and country, and went from door to door, recruiting. One priest I know of went so far as to decorate his altar with red and blue bunting. They yelled louder than any that all must go and fight their fellow-Christians. How gladly they urged the young poor man to give his life, and the old rich one to give his money, for a consideration. Suddenly, however, all are forced to go, and with yelps of fear all the eligible curates run to find protection behind their respective bishops' gaiters. The truth comes out at last; they have been urging upon others to do what they themselves were unprepared to do. However, they rose to the occasion, and sat upon tribunals to deliberate as to others. It is a notorious fact the clergy who sat upon tribunals were far more deaf to the appeal of the widow's son with many cares than were his "lay" brethren. Woe betide the Conscientious Objector, who, at any rate, was only following the teaching of his Prophet, whether right or wrong, who was to be judged by a Crow. Again, the clergy have spent much breath urging upon the laity to lend their money for the prosecution of the War. It is significant that the official body of the Church felt it necessary to wait to lend their money until it could procure a higher rate of interest, and then invested three million sterling of filched money. It now transpires that, foreseeing the disaster that surely waits them in the future, they are making an effort to regain a footing by endeavouring to make themselves teachers in the schools. Let us not allow this hardly won privilege to be taken from us, this progress to be destroyed, while our minds are engrossed elsewhere. I appeal especially to those between twenty and thirty, in whose hands the future lies, to be up and doing now, as there is great danger ahead.

Let us not be led by any false sense of delicacy to spare the feelings of these men. A refinement of taste must hamper us in combating these folk. Always let us remember that they call out about their offended feelings while executing the laws against "blasphemy"—which is, in plain language, disagreeing with them, and saying so—with all the ferocity of which they are capable. Have they not always vilified great names in the history of Freethought? Are we to show consideration for the persecutors of Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Foote? Are our "feelings" of no account? Let us not be afraid. I recommend every young Freethinker to speak fearlessly, to be proud of his freedom on every occasion possible. For let us remember the struggle is to be one of life or death for our views. There can only be one possible issue to such a contest in the long run, as truth must ultimately rout falsehood. Let it not be said that we in any way retarded the advent of cleaner and more wholesome thought.

E. G.

Heinrich Kitzler.

Authorship is a singular thing. One man has luck in the practice of the craft, and another meets with misfortune.

Perhaps the saddest mishap befel my poor friend Heinrich Kitzler, Master of Arts at Gottingen. No one there is so learned, no one so fecund of ideas, no one so industrious as this friend, and yet, up till this hour, no book of his has appeared in Leipzig. The old library attendant always laughs when Heinrich Kitzler asks him for a book, which he greatly needs for a work he has in hand. "It will be in hand for a long time," murmurs the old attendant while he ascends the library ladder. Even the cook laughed when she went to the library to fetch a book "for Kitzler." He was commonly regarded as a fool, but, at bottom, was merely an honourable man.

Nobody knew the real reason why no book of his was forthcoming, and only by chance did I discover it once when I called on him at midnight to light my lamp, he being my study neighbour. He had just completed a treatise on the Excellence of Christianity, but seemed in no way to be rejoicing at the circumstance, and woefully looked at his manuscript. I said to him: "Now, at last, will your name figure in the Leipzig book catalogue, among the works that are just coming out." "Ah, no," he sighed deep from his heart, "this work, too, I must throw on the fire, like its predecessors." And then he confided to me his dreadful secret. The poor doctor met with the saddest misfortune when he had written a book. As soon as he had developed the groundwork of the theory he had set out to demonstrate, he felt obliged to acquaint himself with the objections which any opponent could maintain against it; he investigated the most cogent arguments attaching to the opposite standpoint; and, as these unconsciously took root in his understanding, it always happened that when the book was ready the opinions of the poor author had similarly been transformed, and a conviction quite contrary to that maintained in the book had grown up in his mind. He was, then, honest enough, as a French author had likewise behaved, to sacrifice the laurel of literary fame on the altar of truth; that is, to consign his manuscript to the flames. For this reason he sighed so deeply when he had demonstrated the Excellence of Christianity.

Mournfully he said, "Now I have made excerpts from the works of twenty Church Fathers; whole nights I have been glued to my desk, reading the Acta Sanctorem, while punch was being drunk, and songs were being sung in your study. For the theological works necessary for my book I have paid thirty-eight hardly earned thalers, instead of buying a pipe-bowl with the money. I've worked like a dog for two years—two precious years of life, and all to make of myself a laughing-stock—to make me turn away like a convicted boaster when I am asked, "When will your Excellence of Christianity be out? Ah, the book is ready," continued the poor man, "and it would also please the public, for in it I have glorified the victory of Christianity over Heathendom, and have thereby shown also truth and reason triumphant over hypocrisy and folly. But, unfortunately, I feel in my heart of hearts that——"

"Don't say any more," I cried with genuine indignation, "Do not dare, O Deceiver, to blacken the sublime, to drag the splendid through the mud. Even if you would deny the miracles of the Gospels, yon cannot deny the victory of the Gospel was a miracle itself. A small company of defenceless men went forth into the great Roman world, and, in spite of its railèrs and philosophers, triumphed by the mere power of the Word. Corrupt heathen society trembled and tottered at the word of these strange men and women, who announced a new kingdom of heaven, and feared nothing on the old earth, neither the claws of wild beasts, nor the fury of wilder men; neither the sword nor the flames, for they themselves were the fire and sword of God.

This sword has cut down the withered leaves and decayed branches of the tree of Life, thus healing it of gathering corruption. This fire has again warmed from within the torpid trunk, that it may put forth fresh leaves and new blossoms. These pioneers of Christianity—their struggle and their complete victory—are the most awful and sublime phenomena in the world's history." These words were spoken with the more appropriate expression, as that evening I had taken too many glasses of beer, and my voice sounded the more resonant. Heinrich Kitzler allowed himself to be in no way impressed thereby. With a painful ironic laugh he said, "Friend, don't give yourself so much trouble. All that you have just said I have myself, in this manuscript, far better and far more thoroughly set forth.

I have painted in the sharpest colours the abandoned condition of the world in Pagan times, and I may flatter myself that my boldest strokes recall the work of the greatest Church Fathers.

I have shown how vicious the Greeks and Romans became through the evil example of those gods, who, if we are to believe the crimes imputed to them, were hardly worthy to rank as men. I have said, in plain language, that even Jupiter, the first of the Gods, would, if judged by the Criminal Code, have deserved the prison, if not the gallows, a hundred times. On the other hand, I have expounded the moral teachings which are to be found in the Gospels, and shown how, after the pattern of their godly example, the first Christians, in spite of the contempt and persecution which they suffered therefore, only taught and practised the best and purest morals. The finest part of my work is where, full of inspiration, I recount how the young Christianity, the little David, measures itself against the old Heathendom, and kills this great Goliath. But this dual has since appeared to me in a different light—all the pleasure and love of my apology dries up in my breast when I picture to myself how any opponent could represent the triumph of Christianity. To my undoing, a new author, one Edward Gibbon, came to my notice, who did not express himself very favourable over this victory, and did not seem to make much of the fact that those Christians for whom the spiritual sword and fire did not suffice, sought refuge in the material fire and sword.

Yes, I must confess that at last my deepest sympathy was evoked for the vestiges of Paganism, those lovely temples and statues, which were no more a part of the religion that was dead long before the birth of Christ, but which belonged to Art, which is eternal. It all came to me once when, with moist eyes, I chanced to read in the library the Appeal for the Temple, wherein the old Greek Libanius most pathetically beseeched the pious Barbarians to spare those priceless masterpieces with which the genius of Hellas had decorated the world. But in vain—that memorial of a springtime of humanity, which will never return, and which could only flourish once, was irretrievably destroyed by the dark fanaticism of the Christians.

"No," continued the Doctor, "I will not by publishing this book lend countenance to such crimes. Never. And to you, the shattered statues of beauty, and to you, ye Manes of the Dead Gods, to you who are now only lovely visions in the Shadow Kingdom of Poetry, to you I sacrifice this book."

With these words Heinrich Kitzler threw his manuscript in the fire, and of the Excellence of Christianity nothing was left but grey ashes.

A Day of Thanksgiving.

What have we to thank thee for O God of Heaven?
For loosing on our peaceful lands the bloody hounds of war,
For murdered son and outraged sister, ruined homestead, loss of limb,
Lover's voice for ever silenced in the bloody din?
Is it because the harvest is less than the year before,
That famine and tornado, pestilence and flood
Stalk through the lands that are not yet at war?
Is it that thou hast taught us through centuries of grace,
How by scientific warfare we can reduce the race?
(More humane means we knew of but thy servants did forbid.
Since in using them thy power we did withstand).
Is it for empty cupboards, is it for fireless grate,
The piteous wail of little ones, fretful sound of children,
Crying for their birthright, sobbing for their rest,
That before Thy throne, O Great One, with song of praise we wait?

With clasped hands, and with bended knee, we often thee besought,
Right strenuously we prayed to thee for peace.
We have built thee noble mansions, we have furnished them with taste.
We have clothed thy priests in broadcloth, we have decked them out with lace.
We have given of our earnings which we could ill afford,
And thy servants they did tell us "we were pleasing to the Lord."
Yet in thy anger thou hast smitten we who strove so hard to please;
Toiled with aching brain and muscle to keep thy priests in ease.
In thy blind and wanton fury, thou hast lashed us till the gore
Poured in torrents from our body, and we swore to bear no more.

Yea, O God, we haste to thank thee, to lift our voices to the skies,
Since the mask at last has fallen from humanity's tired eyes.
And we see beyond the darkness the first gleam of morning light,
And we know we near the ending of the Gods' long night.

The Churching of Bacchus.

January 6 being set apart for national prayer, the public-houses are to be closed upon that day.—Daily Papers.

Ah me! how sad it is to think
That beer and prayer such rivals are,
And living waters as a drink
Are ousted by the "public" bar.

But though the inns are tippler free
Upon the holy day; I think
The loudest prayer of all will be,
The prayer of thirsty souls for drink.

THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Major G. O. Warren, like most critics of the Malthusian doctrine, has quite misunderstood it. What Malthus showed was that if people married and had children without restraint, the number of births in each year would in all but exceptional cases exceed the production of additional food in the same period, so that either a check must be put upon reproduction, or there will be poverty and excessive mortality. This is true, whether there are a few thousands or thousands of millions of people upon the earth, as new land can only be brought into cultivation gradually. The fact that much of our land is uncultivated does not in the least show that our country is not over populated. In simply means that in recent times a unit of labour here enabled more food to be obtained by the exchange of our manufactures for the food of other countries, than it would have done if directly expended on our own soil. There is not the slightest justification for the assertion that our country could support twice its present population. This is derived from Kropotkin, who has utterly ignored the fundamental chemical question as to the amount of fertilizing material (especially fixed nitrogen) available for production on the large scale.

Major Warren appears also to have been captured by that plausible compendium of economic fallacies, Henry George's Progress and Poverty. That capital is absolutely essential for the employment of labour can be seen in an instant by simply considering (which Henry George carefully abstained from doing) what would happen in this country if capital were destroyed—dwellings, factories, tools, railways, ships, and other means of transport, flocks, and stores of food. How many people would be employed or be able to work in any fashion at the end of a month?

As a lifelong Freethinker, who has watched the progress of the Freethought and Rationalist Movements for many years, I have been both amused and saddened to see how, in employing the Darwinian doctrine for the iconoclastic purpose of destroying the Christian faith in a beneficent Deity thwarted by the machinations of Satan, many "Freethinkers" have persistently neglected Darwin's own warning as to the necessity for bearing the principle of the struggle for existence in mind in considering all biological phenomena, and have merely substituted the Socialistic faith in a beneficent Nature thwarted by the machinations of the capitalists. The Malthusian doctrine, which is absolutely substantiated by modern vital statistics, is equally destructive of the myths of theology and of Socialism, and it has the merit of giving us a sound basis for constructive rational ethics—the crying need of the Freethought Movement.

Society News.

The North London Branch debates re-open this evening. Mr. Percy Friedberg will support the contention that Freethinkers ought to be Socialists, and Mr. A. Eager will oppose. We expect a lively discussion, and hope the North London "saints" will attend in full force and bring friends with them For further particulars, please consult the Guide notice.—H. V. Lane, Hon. Sec.

We hear from Mr. J. Partridge, the indefatigable Secretary of the Birmingham Branch, that the lecture fixtures for January, February, and March include Messrs. Cohen, Lloyd, F. J. Gould, H. Snell, A. D. Howell Smith, E. Clifford Williams, and F. E. Willis. Mr. Partridge will be delighted to forward a printed programme to anyone applying for it to 245 Shenstone Road, Rotton Park, Birmingham.

The New Manchester Branch of the N.S.S., which commenced its first regular series of meetings early in October, has proved an undoubted success. The weekly gatherings have been well supported, and the "papers" given—exclusively by members of the Branch—have led to some interesting discussions. The lectures, so far delivered at the Downing Hall by Messrs. Cohen, Lloyd, and Palmer, have had good results, and we are looking to the future in the confident assurance that the committee's efforts will be rewarded by a further increase of members, and an active participation in the propagandist work of the Branch. A social has been arranged at the Downing Street Hall for Saturday, January 12, at which, it is hoped, that all the members will endeavour to be present.—H. Black, Secretary.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation .....

Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

The New Bishop of Hereford.

Quite a storm is raging over the appointment of Dr. Hensley Henson to the Bishopric of Hereford. The quarrel is largely a domestic affair, and a Freethinker can hardly be expected to contemplate the rumpus without considerable amusement or a certain amount of contempt. Dr. Henson is denounced for his heretical and liberal views, although both his heresy and his liberality exist only because there are still large numbers of people calling themselves civilized while holding beliefs that properly befit men of the Stone Age. In such an environment, the reputation for being a liberal thinker is easily attained; and we have no doubt that many people in the position of Dr. Henson would be surprised if they could only be brought to realize how very old-fashioned they are. The heresies they propound, with quite an air of dashing adventure, are now such commonplaces with Freethinkers that they are very often thought of as unworthy of mention.

The Absurdity of Christianity.

It must be due to our having escaped the misfortune of being either born a Christian or trained as one, that we find it a matter of the greatest difficulty to treat grown-up men and women who hold beliefs such as form the subject of controversy between Dr. Henson and his critics with any degree of gravity. The charges against Dr. Henson are that he does not believe in the Virgin Birth of Jesus; he thinks there was no resurrection of the body of Jesus—or that it is, at least, open to question; he does not believe in the miracle of the marriage feast at Cana, etc. But these are really not things that a man should be attacked for not believing; they are things that any sane person should be ashamed of having it said of him that he does believe them. Any sensible person who knows the constituents of wine and water, knows that to transmute water into wine is a sheer impossibility. It can no more be done, in fact, than a conjurer can produce eggs from a silk hat without putting them there beforehand. When we see eggs produced from a hat, we may not know how it is done, but we laugh at those who accept the trick at its face value. And so of those who believe the things that the new Bishop of Hereford is attacked for doubting. They may have a certain claim upon our sympathy; they have none on either our gravity or respect.

Fraud or Folly.

Let us try to put the matter quite plainly. Just at the moment there is a deal of discussion on the question of Spiritualism. Mr. Edward Clodd, in a just published volume, after a most elaborate examination of the evidence, comes to the sweeping conclusion that it is, in the main, a case of folly or simplicity, misled by fraud. And in that conclusion thousands of Christians will agree with him. But is there any reason why we should be less plain of speech, with regard to Christian doctrines, or to those who believe them and those who teach them? When a man comes along and professes to believe that, of all the myriads of people that have been born, one, and one alone, was born without the co operation of a male human being, and that after being truly dead, he arose from the grave, what reason is there for our not saying that this is a case of pure folly or pure fraud? Can anyone even think of a child being born without a father? The birth of a child is no longer a mystery. We know all the stages from conception to birth. How, then, can anything else than folly or fraud believe or profess to believe in the hocus-pocus of the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation? And so with the resurrection, the raising of the dead, and similar doctrines. It is not that we simply do not believe these things for want of evidence, we know they are not true. We are as certain of this as we are that two and two did not make five in ancient Judea, any more than in modern London. We can assume either folly or fraud on the part of Christians. We cannot credit them with sincerity and intelligence in relation to Christianity and still retain our own reputation for sanity.

Christianity a Survival.

A passage cited against Dr. Henson from his public writings is as follows. It deals with the events of the life of Jesus, including his alleged divine birth and resurrection:—

> If a nineteenth century observer had been present he would have given a different account of the occurrences from that which has come down to us.

This passage contains an important truth, but also a very serious error. It implies that a nineteenth century observer would have seen many things quite plainly that were not there to be seen. No one could have seen the divine birth, no one could have seen the resurrection, or the walking on the water, or the feeding of the multitude, or the turning of the water into wine, or the raising of the dead. No one could have seen these things, because they were never there to be seen. What a modern observer would have seen is that these things were believed. And if he had been properly equipped for writing home a report of his experiences, he would have pointed out that in believing these things the Christians were exactly on a level with a great many other people in the world. He would have noted the numerous stories of virgin love-saviours and of resurrected gods. He would have pointed out that the social atmosphere was thick with stories of the miraculous, and that all these beliefs were contemporaneous with an absence of scientific knowledge. He might have seen religious teachers casting out devils, and he would not have hesitated for a moment in describing these possessed people as epileptics or lunatics. Of course, we have no report from a nineteenth century observer on the spot, but we have reports from modern observers on these ancient beliefs, and they are clearly expressed on these lines. And the truth in the sentence cited is that the whole question is one of historical development. Go amongst the primitive peoples of the world to-day, and you will find flourishing the state of mind out of which the Christian Church grew, and on which it is built. Our modern Christians are, when they are sincere in relation to their religious belief, on the level of savages. Mr. Clodd has well pointed out the relation of modern Spiritualism to primitive savagery. And all he there says applies with equal truth to Christianity as a whole. Modern Christianity is an elaborate, an expensive, and a socially disastrous survival of primitive savagery.

The Road for Honest Men.

Nothing of what is said above is new to Freethinkers. But is it new to Christians? There's the rub. To some Christians it is, of course, new—so new that they would reject it with the readiness with which the religious mind always repudiates an unusual truth. But to other Christians? To the clergy, for instance? Is it new to them? For our part we find it almost impossible to believe that a large number of the clergy are not as familiar with what has been said as we are. The truth about religion is too well known, the proofs are too close to hand, they are too accessible in scores of volumes, for these gentry not to know that Christian doctrines trace their ancestry straight back to primitive animism. Christians do not believe in miraculous births, risen corpses, or in miraculous acts anywhere but in the Bible. And this is not the attitude of honest belief. When a man honestly believes an absurdity at home he will believe it abroad. He can have nothing against it. But when a man professes to believe a story in one place, and the moment he is told a similar story elsewhere, condemns it as a lie or a fraud, he pronounces judgment on his own sincerity. And from that point of view we sympathize with Dr. Henson's critics. If Dr. Henson does not believe in the stories of Christ's life as actual, historic events, he has no moral right to remain an officer of the Established Church, drawing its money, and professing himself a Christian clergyman. His place is outside the Church. He should follow the example set by many honest men. And it is certain that affection for the Church, as a Church, need not restrain him. There will be plenty left to look after its welfare. Fat salaries and easy posts, place and power and distinction will continue to form sure baits for many. But for honest and intelligent men there is only one course open. Folly may continue to believe, fraud may continue to profess, honesty and intelligence should take their way along the broad road of human development.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Jesus and His Words.

THE Rev. W. Garrett Horder, who has been minister of the Ealing Congregational Church for upwards of thirty years, is exceedingly well known as a great authority on hymnology, and has edited an excellent hymn-book. He is also regarded as a preacher of more than average ability. One of his sermons was published in the Middlesex County Times for December 29, 1917, and is eminently deserving of a critical notice. It is based on three texts in which Jesus is represented as the source of life and light to mankind, and as having left "us an example that we should follow in his style." Mr. Horder begins by stating that "the question as to whether Christian people should take part in war has been debated almost entirely on the words of the Master," and that "on that question words from his lips can be found both for and against participation in war"; but he maintains that such questions cannot be settled by an appeal to the mere words of Christ. He draws the well-known distinction between the letter and the spirit of Biblical terms, calling special attention to the Apostle Paul's declaration that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." In reality, the distinction is largely false and misleading. There is no legitimate method of getting at the real meaning of any statement except through the words employed. Mr. Horder's tirade against literalism misses the mark altogether, because if we do not take the words of Jesus according to the letter, their interpretation will be determined by the idiosyncrasies of different interpreters. The great fault of Tolstoi, we are told, was that he was a literalist—that is to say, that he had the temerity to take Jesus at his word, or to cling exclusively to his "mere precepts." The truth is that many of the precepts in the Sermon on the Mount are so incapable of translation into conduct that they cannot be treated seriously until they have been judiciously interpreted. Innumerable are the interpretations already in circulation, with the result that scarcely any two Christians are agreed as to the duty enjoined in any commandment of Jesus. Mr. Horder says:—

> The fact is, the best interpretation of the precepts of Christ is to be found, not in the minute exegesis of commentaries, but by finding out how Christ lived out his own precepts. The Life shows the precepts in action. In the Life the precepts live before our eyes.

Did Jesus live out his own precepts? If we accept the historicity of the Gospels, our answer must be in the negative. As Tolstoi points out, on one or more occasions he flagrantly violated his own principles. But let that pass.

Mr. Horder's discourse is by no means complimentary to Jesus as a teacher. Referring to non-resistance to evil, going to law, giving, and lending, he says:—

> These are tremendous demands. Taken in the letter no one has ever obeyed them. They would absolutely overturn the proper order of the world. Taken as an Oriental would take them—as exaggerated expressions of things, which at their heart are virtues, for all oriental speech is to the prosaic Westerner immensely exaggerated—those precepts point to ways that are possible, but in which men are unwilling to go. But taken as Tolstoi and the non-resistants take them, in their letter, it may be confidently asserted that Christ did not follow his own precepts.

If the Gospels are in the least degree reliable, it is absolutely certain that Jesus was not a conscious exaggerator. He tells us distinctly that his words were to be done by all, and that the doing of them was an incarnation of highest wisdom. He pronounced the doer of them a wise man who built his house upon the rock, and the non-doer of them a foolish man, whose house, founded upon the sand, could not withstand the storms of life. To him there was no distinction between the letter and the spirit of his sayings, which he treated, not as counsels of perfection, but as rules for daily conduct. Nothing in the world is easier than to wax hilariously merry over the case of Count Tolstoi; but few seem to realize how much he gave up in the attempt to walk in Jesus' steps. It is perfectly true that when the commandments of Jesus are presented just as they are, men express their revolt, saying, "Oh, this is visionary; this is no religion for us;" but the clergy endeavour to make the Gospel acceptable to outsiders by averring that Jesus did not mean what he said, but that, like any Orientalist, he deliberately exaggerated, with the result that most of his sayings stand in need of interpretation. Dr. D. W. Forrest, of Edinburgh, published a volume of more than four hundred pages, entitled The Authority of Christ, in which he interprets the Sermon on the Mount in the hope of making its teaching authoritative for the twentieth century. Christians boast that they see God in the face of Jesus Christ, but they might with even greater truth confess that they see Christ in the face of this or that divine; while, as a matter of fact, they see neither God nor Christ save as imaginary portraits painted by artists of different schools.

Like all his brethren, Mr. Horder pretends to be on exceedingly intimate terms with God, but he judges the Divine Being by himself. He also agrees with Mr. H. G. Wells, "who would have a God who would not suffer crucifixion, but would resist it; who would have a God presented as strong with immortal youth." He even admits that many of the precepts of Christ do lean in the direction of what may be called the softer virtues. Of course, he understands why Jesus did not name and expatiate on the sterner and more manly virtues, and he has considerable sympathy with the people who, in consequence, characterize Christianity as "a soft, unmanly religion." He goes the length of avowing that "a good deal of preaching about love in God is so one-sided and unbalanced that it makes the Christian Faith well nigh impossible for strong and vigorous natures." Then he adds:—

> The love of God is represented as like the love of many foolish parents, whose love leads to the spoiling of their children, and renders such children almost unbearable in their behaviour—parents who "love not wisely but too well," to use a common phrase. But the wiser teachers of Christianity have already had a truer and fuller vision of love in God. They saw clearly enough that love of the highest type, as it must be in God, sometimes leads to discipline, to chastisement, to sternness; that it does not always express itself in softness or yielding, but often by sternness and unyieldingness.

All that is true enough as applied to human love, Undoubtedly the two types of affection do exist and manifest themselves in human life; but Mr. Horder oversteps the limits of his knowledge when he describes God as loving in either sense. What he does is to paint God in his own image, and after his own likeness. Being of a strong, manly character himself, he takes it for granted that the same is true of the Heavenly Father. No doubt love is sometimes at its highest and best when the rod is in its hand. The preacher's object in thus dwelling on the character of God is to convince his hearers that Christ is God manifested in the flesh, and that we are to interpret his teaching in the light of his character. And yet we are assured that "a pedantic following of the steps of Christ is as foolish as a pedantic obedience of his words." At this point we are confronted with the preacher's Christian bias. He says:—

> Now I suppose it may be said that the life is more unique than the precepts of Christ. Probably, from the other sacred books of the world you could make a collection of precepts falling not very short of those in the Gospels. But the figure of Christ, the life of Christ that cannot be paralleled—that is the unique part of Christianity. There is the light for our way.

Of course, such a passage could only fall from the pen of a believer in the impeccability of the Gospel Jesus, a belief which has no other support than two bare assertions, the one by Paul that "he knew no sin," and the other by Peter that he "did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." From those two assertions the Church elaborated the dogma of the absolute sinlessness of Christ. And yet even the Gospels do not portray a perfect, spotless character. Jesus' treatment of his mother, on several occasions, was anything but faultless, and much of his teaching was immoral and anti-social. To his disciples he promised peace, and yet he declared that it was not peace, but a sword that he brought to the world. He disapproved of family affection by claiming for himself the supreme place in every heart. He came before parents, wife, and children; and without the surrender of all for his sake discipleship was impossible. Furthermore, the Gospel Jesus is a wholly impossible character. We know to a certainty that no such person ever lived at all, or ever can live. His very existence would have been a setting aside of the inexorable laws of Nature.

Mr. Horder must be aware that neither as teacher nor as Saviour has Christ been a success. Theoretically his teaching is eulogized as the truest and noblest in the world, while, practically, it is universally ignored. Theoretically his praises as Saviour of the world are enthusiastically sung throughout Christendom; but, practically, even Christendom still wallows in its sins. In this unspeakably horrible War millions of men have already been killed in his name, and for the establishment of his kingdom. Mr. Horder admits that words uttered by him can be found both for and against participation in war; and, as king of men, he was powerless to prevent the frightful conflict, and is equally incapable of ending it.

J. T. LLOYD.

Death, and After.

The Question: If a Man Die Shall He Live Again? By Edward Clodd. Grant Richards.

THOMAS CARLYLE'S unaffected tribute to brave Walter Savage Landor, "the unsubduable old Roman," comes to mind on seeing Mr. Edward Clodd's critical examination of Spiritualism, The Question: If a Man Die Shall He Live Again? (Grant Richards). At a time of life when most men think only of slippered ease, Mr. Clodd is busy with his pen on behalf of the cause he has so much at heart, and to which he has rendered such unselfish devotion for so many years. The old energy of style, the tremendous vitality and interest in men and things, remain unimpaired, and the veteran watches events as keenly as ever, and comments on them with his customary robustness and independence of mind. A man who has seen so much of the world as he, and who has been mixed up for so many years with the developments of thought, religion, and literature, and has met the leaders in these fields and in the society of his time, has enjoyed unusual scope for observation. Already he has dispensed from his treasures with a royal hand, but he has plenty in reserve, as is proved by the contents of his latest book.

Digitized by Google

Sir Oliver Lodge's Raymond has given a new impetus to Spiritualism, of which the astute dabblers in the occult have taken full advantage. Indeed, the name of Sir Oliver has been exploited as a triumphant proof of the existence of spiritual phenomena. Hence Mr. Clodd's brilliant examination is both timely and necessary.

With the exception of the Christian religion, there is, probably, no other cult whose history is so steeped in fraud as that of modern Spiritualism. The fraud is "gross as a mountain, open, palpable." Even Spiritualists have to admit it, and are driven to argue that the detection of fraudulent mediums is no proof that all manifestations are unsatisfactory. Mr. Clodd's inquiry is very exhaustive. He must have read many books and pamphlets, and he has overlooked nothing of serious importance. He examines in detail the cases of detection ranging from the time of the Davenport Brothers, the Fox Sisters, down to the day of Madame Blavatsky, Eusapia Palladino, and others. The methods of the famous Mrs. Piper are analysed, and Sir Oliver Lodge is also subjected to the ordeal of criticism. As the result of his examination, Mr. Clodd considers that spirit survival has not been established. It is not his fault that, though the book is primarily concerned with the question of man's immortality, it is full of talk of telepathy; it is about the soul of man, and full of chatter of clairvoyance; it is of matters religious, and discusses automatic handwriting. In the last analysis, the Spiritualists base their case for the soul's immortality on these things, and Mr. Clodd but follows their lead.

In this volume, Spiritualism appears in its best clothes, and is seen at its bravest. Yet Mr. Clodd's verdict is "not proven." As explained by this relentless critic, the new Spiritualism is very like the old. Behind all the verbiage of telepathy, clairvoyance, automatic handwriting, precognition, and the like, there is always the furtive figure of "Sludge, the Medium." This is clearly seen by Mr. Clodd, and it says much for his restraint that he writes calmly throughout. His book is the deadliest criticism of Spiritualism that we have seen. He shows that the "spooks" have contributed nothing to human knowledge. This is the purport of his volume, and it is written with knowledge and balanced judgment.

Spiritualists are not the only folk who profess to have dealings with the "supernatural." The clergy are as much interested in "spooks" as the mediums. They babble of "gods," who get angry with us; of "devils," who must be guarded against; of "angels," who fly from heaven to earth. The Bible is a spook-book, and belief in spirits is an integral part of the Christian religion. Nearly fifty thousand clerical gentlemen are engaged in this spook business, to say nothing of their lay assistants. The "spooks" of the clergy are no more real than the "bogeys" of the Spiritualists. The clergy, however, are wiser than the mediums. They know that if a showman never lifts the curtain, it does not matter whether he has anything or nothing on the other side.

In spite of the clergy and the mediums, the riddle remains unanswered, the sphinx is still silent. Couched in plausible and semi-scientific language, presented with all the resources of men who have devoted their lives to the subject, this plea for survival is, in the last resort, but an appeal to emotionalism. The poet Heine hit the right nail on the head where he suggssted, smilingly, that the idea of immortality may have suggested itself to a lover in the arms of his mistress, or to some worthy burgher sipping his beer on a summer's evening. It is, in the last analysis, but a desire for personal continuance, to be for ever as we are. In spite of man's importunity, "the rest is silence."

The new Spiritualism gives no better answer than the older creeds, and the later messages from the "other side" are as unconvincing as the earlier. The poor Indian dreams of his happy hunting grounds; the Mohammedan pictures his Paradise peopled with houris; the prosaic Christian looks for the jewelled streets of the New Jerusalem; and Sir Oliver Lodge believes that "spirits" smoke cigars made of essences, ethers and gases. The world is no nearer a solution than in the far-off days of old Lucretius, or in the still earlier time when primitive man cowered in his dug-out in mortal fear of the lightning. The oracles are contradictory with regard to a next world.

All we know for certain is that man is mortal, but nature is immortal. The world grows old, and we grow old with it; but nature is ever fair and young. The white flowers of the spring return year by year; lads and maidens are ever wandering at eventide. The love of husband and wife is ever consecrated by the coming into the world of the beautiful new life springing from their own. Though our personality be blotted out by "the poppied sleep," our influence goes to swell the volume of humanity.

After all, death is not so much our concern as life The men of to day have shown the greatest courage and the highest disdain of death ever shown. It is our present fate, smoky with clouds that hide splendour or doom, to be living at the very apex of the world's history, and in the zenith of man's challenge of fate. The secular solution is the best. All sprang from Nature, and have their day, and all return for sleep. Fear should have no place: "Into the breast that gives the rose, shall we with shuddering fall?"

Distressed Dualists.

THE walls of Modern Athens had scarce ceased to echo the flourish of trumpets which greeted the announcement of "General" Booth that he had decided to make Scotland a unit of the Salvation Army's life—an announcement, by the way, received in silence by Edinburgh's men of God—when a body of men calling themselves "The United Free Church Office-Bearers' Association" took sweet counsel together, and decided upon a conference on the subject of "Spiritual Quickening," which conference was duly held upon the 22nd day of December, in the year of grace (or disgrace) 1917.

This gathering was presided over by Sir David Paulin, a genial insurance manager; but, unlike "General" Booth's meeting, the clergy—and big guns at that—were in the very forefront of the proceedings. The principal speakers were Dr. W. M. MacGregor, a leading divine of the U.F. Church, and Dr. Wallace Williamson, ex-Moderator of the Established Church of Scotland. The newspaper report of the meeting is, to the extent of five-sixths of its space, taken up with the speeches of these reverend doctors, who trounced the Scottish laity for making Christianity merely an extraneous thing—a "trimming" to their lives. Dr. Wallace Williamson said: "The war was profoundly a spiritual war, and would be won only if the nation could stand firm to the eternal principles of Jesus Christ." Both divines insisted upon a "real rededication of the national life"—surely a tongue-twisting resolution for a Scotsman to take on New Year's Eve! A hint was given that a special effort was to be made with the objective of "spiritual quickening" in February, 1918. No precise information about this effort was furnished, but it was agreed to hold another conference, at which a more particularized plan of campaign may be forthcoming. Dr. Wallace Williamson desiderated "a God-fearing Scotland which would show its fear of God in being a clean, honest, sober Scotland." And Dr. MacGregor flatly declared that "they were not going to put their trust in what people call a 'social gospel.'"

All which would appear to indicate that there is substantial agreement between the spokesmen of the U.F. Church Office-Bearers' Association and the platform supporters of "General" Booth. The names of the latter were not so much as mentioned at the conference. Notwithstanding, here we have further gloomy testimony to the decadent state of "Puir Auld Scotland." How many conferences will be needed before she is spiritually convalescent? Her self-appointed spiritual guardians are wonders at conferring and at the preparation of elaborate reports. The late Dr. Parker, once invited to attend a Free Kirk General Assembly, after listening to the reports of a large number of committees, got upon his feet, and electrified the "House" by exclaiming, "Mr. Moderator, I should now like to hear the report of the Devil."

There is a certain type of medical man who encourages the crotchets of his hypochondriacal patients. Similarly, there are clerics who profess to admire the church member who is ever bewailing his moral degeneracy, and his lost and undone condition. In each case this habit of mind is either the outcome of disease or hypocritical affectation. But there are other Scotsmen, like David Deans, in the Heart of Midlothian, whose pessimistic lamentations are not merely individual and subjective, but also national and objective. To such minds, of course, a "Social Gospel" is necessarily abhorrent as a means of salvation.

Such minds to dispassionate philosophers are bewildering contradictions. You will please understand that the Scottish Church member, who is for ever denouncing himself as the vilest sinner, is, in reality, the holiest saint. So we may not be without justification in thinking that, by a parity of reasoning, Scotland is, after all, not so black as she is painted by such Scotsmen. With such men social and secular improvement is always suspect. No such improvement can be for the benefit of the people unless it receives the approval and benediction and imprimatur of the Church. At present we are all much concerned about the provisions of a new Scottish Education Bill which has just been introduced. Many of us look upon it as an epoch-marking event, and of the most vital interest to the community. But it does not appear to have occupied two minutes time of the conference on "Spiritual Quickening." The great panacea for Scottish ills in the estimation of our pastors and masters is not knowledge but belief.

Introspective morbidity is certainly harmful; but when to that is added the objectionable nose-poking habit of looking for the faults and vices of other people, the subject is on the high road to mental disintegration. Sane and balanced judgment is impossible to vigilance society experts. They are out to find mankind bad, and are never pleased when they are disappointed.

The Chairman, in opening the conference, to which we have adverted, made a notable, and-to Freethinkers a welcome, admission. He said there had been "a regrettable increase of Materialism." And it is this remark which has induced the adoption of the title of this article. This U. F. Conference platform sends out its S.O.S. signals because of that terrible thing Materialism. Ah, these deluded spiritualistic dualists! They seek to split the universe into two distinct sections—the material and spiritual, secular and sacred, human and divine. What does this inevitably tend to? Surely to duality, division, disunion, dissension. The Monist is he who believes in harmony, union, co-operation. His duty is to strike off the fetters from the minds of men. Change men's minds and you change everything. IGNOTUS.

Illusion.

IT is not often a modern article does not contain the word "illusion" or "delusion," or both. Compare the following, culled at random from recent issues:—

> (1) In all great upheavals and calamities in the world's history there has been a growth of delusions.....if anyone imagines he has heard the last of the Welsh Church spectre, he is likely on the return of peace to be disillusioned.
> (2) Neither the clergy's enormous wealth, nor their arrogance, nor prestige.....can avail to give them even the illusion of progress.
> (3) Men in crowds are swayed by a collective logic which has its roots in mysticism and illusion.
> (4) War is one of the many illusions and delusions which have come down to us from the ignorance and stupidity of the past.
> (5) The illusions of the childhood of humanity were harmless in comparison with the aberrations of later periods.

Here we have the illusion of progress, of collective logic, and of childhood; war is both an illusion and a delusion; while upheavals give rise to delusions, one of which is apparently the illusion of having laid the Welsh Church spectre.

Turning to Whately, we learn that "illusion is an unreal image presented to the bodily or mental vision, as fancy, hope, appearances," while "delusion is a false show which cheats the fancy or senses; an erroneous view, for instance, of politics or religion." From which we gather they are two aspects of the same thing; delusions are illusions to us, or else we should not hold them, and illusions are in reality nothing but delusions. In other words, our errors as to appearances or phenomena, politics and religion, are subjectively illusions, and objectively, as others see them, delusions. Thus, an author's pleasing illusion as to the value of his work may be viewed by the editor as a pure delusion; the bloom on a maiden's cheek is illusion when not the work of health, and delusion when not the work of Nature; the South Sea shares were an illusion when they were being bought, and a delusion when they and their owners were sold. It is high time we called our harmless or pleasing illusions and childish ignorances by their proper names—dangerous delusions. Like More, we may lose our heads over our Utopias.

To take Whateley's three suggested topics—first, the world of appearances. We are at the outset pulled up sharp by the idealist, who tells us that all phenomena are illusions. If he is right, these remarks need go no further; life, thought, and everything else becomes meaningless for us. But at the risk of being called "vulgar realists" and "no philosophers," we must submit that the delusion is here on the other side. Everything is a delusion to somebody; to the scientist supernaturalism is discredited, to the theologian science is bankrupt, to the supernaturalist Materialism is vicious, to the man in the street philosophy is taboo; and if it comes to the question which suffers from the fewest illusions, we may fairly claim that, from his very constitution, it is the Secularist. If it should be proved, after all, that life is an illusion, we may still fall back on Metchnikoff's argument that death (so-called) is a delusion, and wish our opponents joy of their theory when arterial sclerosis, caused by that same illusory life, in the form of phagocytes, carries them off.

Illusion is common to the unregulated imagination and emotions of childhood, such as love and hope. Shaw is unfortunately right in saying that it is the mainspring of all human action, but, happily wrong in adding that there can no more be illusion without a reality than a shadow without an object. It is the absence of reality that causes the pain of disillusionment which is inevitable sooner or later, as in the case of the boy with the memory, who used to think the slender tops of the fir-trees were close against the sky, and on growing up "found it little joy to know that heaven was further off than when he was a boy."

But it is religion and war, especially in company, which are the great illusion-makers. The great illusions about war have been sufficiently pointed out of late, e.g., that armaments can be amassed, and a whole nation learn the arts of war without using them; that conquests of territory and indemnities are intrinsic gain; that war creates as much good as it destroys; that war can ever end war, etc. Whether its abolition by an international ethics bureau is also an illusion awaits the test of time, but there can be no question as to the widespread disillusionment which the last three years have brought about.

To give an instance from the Bible. Abraham was promised by God that he should possess the land of Canaan, yet died without owning more of it than his wife's grave, for which, after the usual Jewish offer gratis, he paid the full price. This may be taken as a specimen of the promises of "Revelation." Or take the illusions of three typical recent "conversions," Mr. R. J. Campbell, after doing a large trade for several years in a humanized religion which denied any real reality to sin, a divine Jesus, atonement, and miracles, and obtaining thousands of adherents to a League of Progressive Thought, has now found that a rationalized religion is impossible, and declared his conversion to traditional Christianity. This return to the illusions of despair we can understand, but the second conversion, that of Mr. Wells to Godism, is not so innocent. "God, the Invisible King," is well described by Mr. A. S. Tom's as literary tosh, destitute of the least moral or spiritual meaning. Mr. Archer's full examination of this hocus-pocus of hallucinations is one of the brightest pieces of writing of the year.

And now we have Sir A. Conan Doyle's conversion to Spiritism. "A new revelation," he says, "is in process of delivery, with a body of fresh doctrine already accumulated from automatic writing, direct voices, and other sources." "The world beyond is a definite reality, attested by an irrefutable body of evidence, etc. Let those who must play tricks with themselves, for the uninitiated the age-long delusions of superstition merely inspire a life-long protest.

That a Moloch worship of this kind should be the story of our race, and command the adoration of millions for its fictions of blood; that the martyrdom of man over every square inch of the earth's surface should have had a mere nightmare for its sufficient explanation and countenance; that papacies and inquisitions should have been able for so long to clothe themselves with the glamour of this ignis fatuus; that tyrannies should have found a sanction for every vice and crime in the mere invocation of the "divine" name, and the appeal to its malignancy and terror; that under other names and forms its desolating delusions should still germinate; and that any kind of charlatanry and spirit-jobbery should be able to find a respectable name under which to harbour, is indeed appalling.

Countless explosives have been hurled in our day by illusion-freethinkers against these entrenched deceptions, till the empty husk of miraculous revelations, provident gods, bodiless spirit theories and the rest, line the shores of the dead seas of thought; but while we continue to palter with admissions that beliefs may be false and yet do no harm, and that to attack creeds may be productive of moral injury; in fine, as long as the exitialis superstitio of Christianity finds its Constantines, so long will illusion masquerade as saving truth.

But the conjuring tricks of the clergy, those princes of illusion are less and less holding the imagination of their followers. There is every hope to-day of undrugged humanity coming to its own. It is the inherent pessimism of religion, in teaching, for instance, that happiness and justice are not attainable in this life, that is the worst of delusions. Even Mr. Balfour admits that it is a strong point of naturalism that it has no sympathy with those metaphysical systems which regard all life as illusion, and all desires as wretchedness.

Is There a Hell?

THERE was momentous news in the issue of the Daily Chronicle of December 22, 1917. Therein we are told that Lord Hugh Cecil says that hell does exist, but hell-fire, as Lord Hugh understands it, would not hurt a fly; it simply means "a state of non-existence for the obstinate and wilfully wicked." What a change by the sea of thought! The mental nostrils of Lord Hugh abhor the smell of theological sulphur; but although the smoke of everlasting fiery torment has been smothered, the hobs of hell are still pointed to with pride. "Belief in hell," concluded Lord Hugh, "brings before us God once more as the Father of all mercies, not in spite of but because, he is the architect of hell." What a thing is Christian imagination! It is like a monk of the Inquisition showing a visitor the torture-chamber and, while regretting its disuse, dwelling lovingly on its devilish ingenuity. And who but a Christian could call the architect of hell the Father of all mercies? Why, no man could commit a crime deserving as punishment that of eternal torment, and this new-fangled explanation of hell-fire as a state of non-existence is a recognition of the fact.

"The view of eternal destruction must be admitted to be the most natural and the most complete solution of the problem of evil." Thus Lord Hugh. Now, what is the problem of evil? According to the fantastic Christian scheme of things, evil is the outcome of the sin of Adam and Eve in partaking of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. In other words, to be more profoundly ignorant than the priest makes the worshipper the more easily imposed upon by the hocus-pocus of theology. So, in order to save Christians from hell-fire—that is, the evil which is the result of the sinful fruit-eating of their first parents, a human sacrifice to God had to be made, which was effected in the crucifying of Jesus Christ. As a consequence, the Devil, God's hangman, was thrown out of employment by God's son. But the Devil was still given a chance to ply his trade, but was always liable to bankruptcy if his victims called upon the name of their Redeemer. The Christian scheme of things is puerile, still has in it the reek of the animistic, primitive savage, evinces the handiwork of anthropomorphic guessers, and only maintains its position by reason of its highly ornamented covering of modern apologetics.

That there is evil in the world goes without question, and men generally think of evil as that which is harmful or fatal to their welfare—that is, they figure evil variously as lack of food or shelter, storm and flood, pestilence, attacks by wild animals, failure of harvest, etc., and have personified evil under numerous names. Set was the name of the Evil One to the ancient Egyptians; the Assyrians knew him as Tiamtu; to the ancient Persians he was Ahriman; the Jews knew him as Azazel; to the Buddhists he is Mara, and the old

Scandinavians and Teutons knew him under the name of Loki. To Christians he is Satan, the Devil, Old Nick, Old Harry, the Foul Fiend, Lucifer, the Prince of Hell, and the patron saint of lawyers.

Having imagined the Devil, the Christians had perforce to imagine an abode for him, and the conception of hell was the result. This does not mean that the Christians were original in their ideas of devil and hell; they simply elaborated on previous notions of the like; in short, they put a more frightful face on the bogey, and said that their hell was bigger and hotter than any hell that ever was. Notwithstanding the assertions of the Christians, the notion of hell did not at first imply that it was a sort of superlative kitchen fitted with multiple roasting-jacks. Primarily, hell simply meant the abode of the dead. In it the members of the great majority spent their time for ever doing nothing. It was the place of eternal rest; its inhabitants had been in the rack and turmoil of earthly life, and had dropped out of it into nirvana. Those who thought of the dead thus were kindly, but along came the prototypes of the Christians and flung terror into the place of the dead, and the Christians have easily outdone their tutors in the art of theological frightfulness.

Thus does Omar Khayyam address the "Father of all mercies, who is the architect of hell":—

> What! out of senseless Nothing to provoke
> A conscious Something to resent the yoke
> Of unpermitted Pleasure, under pain
> Of Everlasting Penalties, if broke!
> What! from his helpless Creature be repaid
> Pure Gold for what he lent him dross-allay'd
> Sue for a Debt he never did contract,
> And cannot answer—Oh the sorry trade!

Old Omar Khayyam thus answers the question, Is there a hell?

> I sent my Soul through the Invisible,
> Some letter of that After-life to spell:
> And by and by my Soul return'd to me,
> And answer'd "I Myself am Heav'n and Hell.

Acid Drops.

This from the leader-writer of the Times Literary Supplement:—

> The Kaiser's God is one who approves of German conduct. It is impossible for us to believe in a God who does that; but, if our hope fails us, we may believe in a Godless universe to which the Germans are better adapted than any other people; and we may see in all their successes and our own failures and blunders a proof that they are better adapted. That is the state of mind that they wish to produce in us ..... and we can defend ourselves against it not by cultivating particular hopes as a help to victory, but only by means of a universal hope opposed to their universal despair. With that hope we shall believe still, in spite of particular disappointments, that the nature of things is with us, not against us; that it is our enemies, not ourselves, who are living and acting against the grain of the universe.

If there is a God, and if he has a sense of humour—Sir Oliver Lodge believes he has—this is the sort of thing that will afford him cause for laughter. It is impossible for us to believe in a God who favours Germany. Granted; but then it will be equally impossible for Germany to believe in a God who favours us. And the logic of the situation on both sides is that both are warning God that if he wishes for the support of Germany or the Allies, he must make up his mind which he will help. He must make up his mind to lose one, and if he persists in a neutral attitude he looks like losing both.

The suggestion that, if brutality pays, it must be a "Godless universe" is in the true style of Christian advocacy. The thesis is: "If you don't believe in God, you must believe in brutality; and if brutality pays, the universe must be godless." This is the gutter method of Christianity in high places. And it conveniently ignores the fact that the greatest of all brutalities has been because of the belief in God. After all, the brutalities of Germany do not exceed those which the Biblical Jews perpetrated by the direct command of God, and the Germans will have to work very hard indeed to exceed the barbarities committed by one section or another of the Christian Churches.

The truth is, of course, that brutality does not pay; not because there is a God, but because the nature of human and social evolution is such that the dice are loaded against it. It is not the "grain of the universe" that is in question—that is a wholly stupid expression—but the structure of human society. And in a social structure, the parts of which are more or less interdependent, all conduct which excites an emotional and intellectual reaction is bound to yield to conduct that excites feelings of approbation. There is nothing occult or supernatural in this; it is a question of social efficiency. It is no more than the social parallel that the biologic law of an organism in which the laws are not well adjusted to serve the interests of the whole is doomed to disappear. The pity is that such a pretentious piece of ignorance as the example cited should find a leading place in one of our leading papers.

The farcical character of the apostolic succession of bishops is emphasized by a bold advertisement in the daily press, issued by the English Church Union. The notice asks those who wish to protest against Dr. Henson's appointment to the bishopric of Hereford to write to the Prime Minister. It looks as if Mr. Lloyd George, who is a Welsh Baptist, has a voice in nominating the successors of the apostles.

Mr. Edward Clodd, in his searching examination of Spiritualism, the Question, has some excellent stories. One of the best is that of the Christian Scientist lady who called to see a sick friend. To the servant who answered the door she said: "Your mistress is not ill; she only thinks she is." She called again, and, in reply to her question, the servant said: "My mistress thinks she is dead."

Men of God nowadays will discuss anything on earth except the one thing that matters, as far as they are concerned, namely their religion. Christian ministers will discuss Socialism, the War, or anything else that happens to draw audiences. They make their services attractive by including such things as organ recitals, orchestras, and solo singing. But if they are asked to discuss Christianity, they answer: "No, thanks; we're not having any."

Quite a number of churches in London refrained from holding "Watch Night" services on December 31. Perhaps it was for fear of air raids, for prayers are a poor protection against bombs. Perhaps it was because they wished to reserve the full force of the prayers for the National Day of Prayer, and it would have been unwise to bombard the Lord thrice in one week. Any way the services were dispensed with. And no one was any the worse. Perhaps the example will be followed on other occasions during the year.

We are glad to see the President of the Transvaal Teacher's Association, as reported in the Rand Daily Mail, speaking out plainly against an attempt to further clericalize the schools. He says:—

> For ages the teacher has been looked upon as the factotum of the parson. His has been the duty of running the Sunday schools, of training the choir, of playing the organ, and generally of being at the beck and call of the parson. The recent incident on the East Rand, where an attempt was made to coerce Government teachers to do these very things, shows that this idea of the position of the teacher still holds the field in many quarters.
> Whatever may have been the case in the past it is no longer the case that the teacher is in any way inferior to the parson. On the contrary, he is frequently superior in education and outlook; he is engaged in a nob'er and more useful work; and he is not inferior in morals, industry, and the conscientious discharge of his duty.

We have before noted the different signs of a Freethought advance in South Africa. We do not think we shall be wrong in taking this as another symptom.

In his prayer at the City Temple on Christmas morning, 1917, Dr. Fort Newton said the following: "Surely Thy goodness and mercy have followed us all the way, even running ahead of our need, anticipating our prayer, and making our loftiest dreams come true before we dream them." What an utterance in this time of war-bread, long and often vain waiting to get a few ounces of margarine, shortage of meat, and the fiendish sacrifice of millions of young men on the altar of the God of Battles.

The London Evening News of January 1 states that "house-to-house invitations to the watch-night service were sent out by a South London church." What a change from the time when attendance at church was compulsory and abstention meant a fine!

The same paper states "the Nonconformist bodies of Waltham Abbey have agreed to unite in a joint service with the Anglicans in the Abbey Church on the National Day of Prayer." This does not mean that Anglicanism has capitulated to Nonconformity, or that Nonconformity has surrendered to Anglicanism. It means simply that their customary acerb relations have been sweetened enough to allow of their joining for one hour in the hocus-pocus of prayer.

The same newspaper reports of Dr. Taylor Smith (Chaplain-General to the Forces) that, when asked at a united thanksgiving and intercession at Queen's Hall, What won Jerusalem for us last month? replied: "The same thing that won Jericho in days of old. Not by men, not by munitions, not by money. It was the Household of God who prayed and who hoped that before Christmas Jerusalem might be ours. The prayerful Commander marched in, led by the Lord of Hosts." Munition makers and workers will go into a blue funk when they hear of this. Incidentally, it shows that the modern priest is still the ancient witch-doctor but thinly disguised.

"There is no peace outside heaven," declares a Sunday paper. Unhappily, heaven is not in the atlases.

So we are being warned that the decisive factor in winning the War will be food. And that is what the glory and greatness of war comes to in the face of hard facts. Can the Germans and Austrians starve the women and children of the Allies until they bring the men-folk to peace? Can the Allies starve the women and children belonging to the enemy until he sues for peace? So much for the chivalry and greatness of modern war! A competition as to which can starve the other soonest! If hard facts like these don't disgust the world with militarism, and show it for the mean, brutal thing it is, nothing will.

This is not alone what modern war has come to; it is what war between Christian nations has come to. Divided only by a narrow sheet of water, German Christians can read with gratification of the probable starvation of forty or fifty million people in Great Britain. And here British Christians can read, with a sense of something good accomplished, of millions of Germans suffering death and disease from a shortage of food. And each knows quite well that in this game of starving out it is the weakest that will suffer first. So long as there is food, the wants of the fighting men will be supplied. It is the children, the delicate, that will have to suffer before others. And only when their suffering has reached the point that strong men can endure the sight of it no longer, will the game cease—to be followed by thanksgiving services to God for having granted the winning side so glorious a victory. So much for all these centuries of the Christian religion.

January 6, 1918, was, by Royal appointment, a Day of Prayer to God by the British people. In this connection the following list, published earlier in the War by the Philadelphia North American, containing descriptions of the Deity by several of the belligerents, is not without interest:—

God of our Fatherland.—NICHOLAS.
God of our Dear Fatherland.—WILHELM.
God of all French.—POINCARE.
God our Defence and Bulwark.—FRANZ JOSEF.
God of our race.—GEORGE.
God our Right Arm.—ALBERT.
We can take care of ourselves.—SERBIA.

On Prayer Sunday—we suppose we may call it—the Edinburgh Food Control officials had the courage to work, with voluntary assistance. When the intention to do this was announced, however, the Rev. G. W. Taylor, of Leith, condemned the proposal in respect that the day had been set apart as a National Day of Prayer. A compromise was arranged. The Food Control people had an interval in their work, when a service was conducted by Bishop Walpole. But why not the Rev. G. W. Taylor?

We have the following story from an "Official" source. There are between 500 and 600 officers at Eastbourne Command Depot. As it was the Day of Prayer last Sunday, and the Mayor was holding a special service, he asked that seventy-five officers should attend. Only twenty-three volunteered out of 600. Then the authorities ordered a Church parade and detailed enough to make up the required seventy-five. We venture to say that a deal of what these conscripted worshippers did say during the service was not in the prepared prayers. But what God must think of the Eastbourne Command must be very distressing. It would serve these officers right if the Bishop of London was brought down to preach to them.

Among other by-products of the War, according to the Bishop of Durham, is the turning of Sunday into a day of unrest. In a New Year message to the Lord's Day Observance Society, he says: "Munition work and alleged necessities of military drill have contributed to the break-up of Sunday. Yet let us not lose heart. I, for one, am sure that a strong tradition of reverence for the Sabbath still lives in the common English heart, and is open to appeals." Doubtless the bishop does not despair of the full attainment of the English Sunday with all shops closed, happily Nonconformist chapels as well, and everybody compelled to attend church, in spite of the Protestant doctrine that God endowed man with free-will.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley, writing on New Year resolutions, says that the "greatest of all" religions is "that which finds its expression in the service of man." This is a long way from the popular Christian ideal of saving men from "the immortal fry, of almost everybody born to die."

What is coming to the Daily News? In its issue for January 4 it published the following four quotations:—

The act is in God's hand, as is our whole struggle. He will decide on it and we will leave it to Him. We must not argue with His ordering.

We owe it to those who have given their lives in the holy cause to endure to the end and to abstain from grumbling, pessimism, and carping criticism, taking as our watchword "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

Because the cause in which we are fighting is the cause of right, we may fearlessly ask God to pardon our faults and to bless our efforts.

We stand firm, faithful to our task and to the fulfilment of our duty. There is no doubt on which side lies the right. Therefore this conflict has become a holy conflict.

Two of these are from the Kaiser's speeches, and two from Captain Guest's hints to clergymen, for use in their sermons on January 6. The Daily News invites its readers to try and pick out the Kaiser's words from Captain Guest's. We think they will be puzzled to discriminate. When it comes to pietistic humbug, the Kaiser and our own religious "Prussians" run neck and neck. But what made the Daily News publish them? Has its religion also been shaken up by the "Holy War"?

MAJOR WARREN.—MSS. received, with thanks. We have had it on our mind for some time to write on Hammond's book, which is really an important piece of work. We may fulfil our intention very shortly.

(MRS.) E. TAYLOR.—We were both pleased and interested in your letter, and regret not having the pleasure of meeting you on Sunday at Manchester. Your stand for your opinions does you credit, although it has doubtless brought a great deal of satisfaction—in spite of the annoyance to which you may have been subjected. Nor is it surprising that you have gradually won the goodwill of your neighbours. In such cases character usually tells.

C. F. J.—Received. Shall appear as early as possible.

DIE PROFUNDIS.—We do not mind sending any of our own publications for use in the hospital in which you are placed.

S. L.—The hypothesis of evolution is itself subject to growth, and during the last twenty years there have been very considerable advances made, which involve some modification in its statement. But the principle of evolution is in nowise affected thereby. That remains a datum for all useful scientific work and thought.

W. ROWE.—Received. The matter is quite all right.

E. B.—You are quite correct. We have written the party concerned.

F. ROSE (Bloemfontein).—Draft received, and apportioned according to instructions. When you say that your opinion of our conduct of the Freethinker is shown by getting as many new subscribers as possible, you are returning thanks in the form we most desire. The new subscribers are having their papers sent them.

T.C.—The drawing together of the Churches is, as you suggest, an indication of their weakness, since only the feeling that they are getting too weak to stand alone, would lead to such a move. On the other hand, it contains a threat to all reformers, since their united strength is still enough to threaten real freedom and progress. Our best reply is to go on making more Freethinkers.

G. WALLACE.—It is cheering to have the opinion of a twenty-five year's reader of the Freethinker that there is "no paper or magazine published at present of so much importance." It will not be our fault if a much larger public than it addsesses at present does not arrive at the same conclusion.

DR. B. DUNLOP.—Subscription received with thanks. The expression you note is rather cryptic, perhaps we had better not venture an explanation.

D. H.—Pleased you found our notes on religion in history so helpful. We have had in contemplation a small volume on that topic, and may do it one day.

C. MEADOWS.—You say that no one could ever convince you of the reasonableness of Atheism. After reading your letter we agree that the task would be an impossible one.

J. REES.—We do not know of any book on the same lines as the Bible Handbook dealing with other religions. Will send specimen copies of Freethinker to address given.

W. FITZPATRICK.—We intend raising the whole question in the Freethinker before long. Thanks for notes.

W. BAILEY.—Papers are being sent. Sorry a cold prevented you being at Manchester. Hope the indisposition will soon pass.

N. STRIEMER.—Next week.

H. IRVING.—See reply to E. B.

MRS. J. M. HINDLEY.—Looks like a patent medicine advertisement. But prayers are very often funny things. Glad to find you appreciate "Views and Opinions" so much.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: J. Pendlebury, £2 10s.

G. R. HARKER.—Thanks for quotation. You do not say what use we are to make of the enclosure.

H. LIBRENTEN.—A good and useful letter. Will use later.

F. W. A.—Will hand on the information.

J. BARTRAM.—Your clerical correspondent evidently doesn't understand the bearings of Utilitarianism. He evidently possesses the wisdom of discretion.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen had two fine meetings on Sunday last. The evening meeting was the largest held in Manchester for some years, and the lecturer's comments on the futile imbecility of a Day of Prayer met with the keenest appreciation. There was a good sale of literature, some new members made, and the energetic Secretary, Mr. Black, was as busy as ever, and evidently gratified with the results of his labours.

The second of the course of Sunday afternoon lectures at the West Central Hall, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, will be delivered by Mr. Cohen. His subject is "Some Curiosities of Christian Evidence." The lecture commences at 3.15. Freethinkers would do well to bring along a Christian friend—or two.

Mr. Cohen will address two Freethought meetings at Southampton next Sunday (Jan. 20), the first delivered there for many years. A Branch of the N.S.S. has been formed, and Mr. A. Wildman, of 100, Clovelly Road, Southampton, will be pleased to hear from any one wishing to become a member or to help in any other manner.

Mr. Lloyd opened the new course of lectures at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, on Sunday last, with a crowded house. This is as it should be. And we are not surprised to learn that, as Mr. Lloyd was in his best form, the audience was delighted with his address.

The Shields Daily Gazette reports that a meeting of the Tyne Dock Branch of the National Union of Railwaymen passed unanimously a resolution in favour of the restriction of education in all State-aided schools to subjects defined as "secular" in the Education Code. We notice the name of our old friend Mr. R. Chapman as one of the speakers to the resolution. This is good work, and we hope Freethinkers everywhere will see to it that similar resolutions are carried wherever possible, and moved whether carried or not.

At a not very distant date we hope to deal with the whole question of the part that might be played by Freethinkers in connection with public affairs. It is quite certain that much could be done; and it is certain that if applied Freethought, if one may use the expression, is to operate, it can only be by Freethinkers everywhere expressing their opinions as Freethinkers. This would be educative so far as Christians are concerned, and helpful in breaking down whatever boycott exists.

It is early yet to record the response to our appeal for a New Year's gift in the shape of a thousand new readers, but we are glad to note that some letters have reached us to the effect that a start has been made. A Bristol friend writes that he secured two new readers before the old year had expired, and from Birmingham, Edinburgh, and Cambridge we have also good news of fresh readers. So it is clear our friends are on the move. And we daresay those who try will be astonished at how many readers may be obtained at the price of a little effort. For, after all, there is only one Freethinker in England. And if there is another journal in England with more "fundamental brain power" than this one, we have yet to come across it.

The Daily News has at length decided, in view of the scarcity and cost of paper, to double the price at which it is to be sold. This is only one of quite a number of papers that have taken, or taking, a similar step during January. One of these is the Schoolmaster, which, we believe, is subsidized by the Union of Teachers. Meanwhile, we are wondering how much longer we can struggle along unchanged. The task gets steadily harder, and even from a personal point of view we are beginning to feel the pressure. But we don't like to give in if it can by any means be avoided.

We hope we may be excused pressing the claims of the Fund to meet the expenses incurred in fighting the L.C.C. We are a little disappointed in the response given by London Freethinkers and London reformers generally. The matter, while having a very general application, should appeal with special force to them. It was a very important fight, and we won a very decisive victory. All interested in outdoor propaganda ought to help. In any case, we think we ought to close the Fund within the next two or three weeks.

Swansea friends will please note that Mr. Harry Snell lectures twice to-day (January 13) in the Docker's Hall, High Street. The lectures are under the auspices of the local branch of the N.S.S., and we hope to hear that Mr. Snell has the audiences he deserves.

We congratulate Mr. John Galsworthy on his refusal to accept a knighthood in the New Year's Honours (?) list. Titles have long since ceased to afford any presumption of personal worth or of national service. Good men who accept such distinctions are only helping to keep alive a source of corruption and demoralization. The whole system of titles is in the nature of a survival from barbaric or semi-barbaric times, and men of worth should leave them severely alone.

We venture to again draw attention to the fact that all N.S.S. subscriptions are now due on the first of January of each year. We hope that all members who have not yet remitted to the General Secretary should do so. And if they are moved to send in addition to their usual subscription, as a kind of thank-offering for "Providence having preserved the N.S.S. during the War," so much the better. A Society, such as the N.S.S., can always do with an enlargement of its financial resources.

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

THE purpose of this Fund is to raise the balance of expenses—estimated at between £80 and £100 incurred in defending the right to sell literature at public meetings in the London parks. On the initiative of the N.S.S. a Protest Committee was formed, and after carrying the question into the High Court, the London County Council was induced to rescind the offending resolution. It was a splendid victory, and one which should specially appeal to all Londoners.

The Morality of Robert Burns.

Born January 25, 1759; Died July 22, 1796.

Of these am I, Coila my name.—The Vision.

IN Scotland and elsewhere the annual spate of post-prandial oratory is somewhat diminished by the exigencies of the "great War." Such things, like clouds, obscure the stars. It passes, and the heavens are clear again, and brighter than before. The constellations are undimned. Not a star has fallen from the sky. But even during the War the "Immortal Memory" will be pledged over many a cup, and, in annual resurrection, the poor ghost must listen to those "interminable—not eternal—speeches," full of fulsome adulation, mouth honour, breath, which the poor heart would fain deny but cannot.

Do not let the awkward squad fire over me, he is said to have remarked, with almost his last breath, referring to the local volunteer corps; but the poet has suffered since from the blank cartridge discharge of many a feeble volunteer. No hectic of a moment clouds the marble brow of the unresentful dead. No; not even when the orator sorrowfully pauses to refer to that blot on the escutcheon of Bonnie and pious Scotland—the morals of Robert Burns! Totally misunderstanding the "virtues" of his hero, he, of course, as completely misunderstands his "vices"; and he forgets that, even in the sphere of morals, he is, perhaps, not fit to tie the shoestrings of the wicked bard. One would think, to hear those rustic moralists and reverend purveyors of pious platitudes, that Burns was not only his country's greatest poet, but its greatest sinner, which is false, of course; but even were it true, his virtues would still outweigh those of the purest pietist the world has ever seen. In sense and worth he was always supreme. What faults he had—and he advertised them well—were the mere excess and overflow of an immense and vigorous vitality. Let it more greatly be said of his, as of the morals of Voltaire, "Is it strange that a vessel which has taken the ocean aboard should have battered decks and broken masts?" (M. Mangasarian). And further, as the same writer says:—

> Even as a great chimney consumes its own smoke, a great man—a Goethe, a Voltaire—converts his own defects into fuel for his genius. Genius is intensity in seeing, feeling, and doing. The genius is ourselves—on a larger scale. He has our virtues and vices—but so much more of them. He thinks, speaks, and acts with a thrill. The blood boils in his veins. "Daily his own heart he eats." Let us understand before we criticise.

Or, as the poet himself puts it, laying the responsibility at the proper quarter:—

> Who made the heart, 'tis he alone
> Decidedly can try us;
> He knows each chord—its various tone,
> Each spring—its various bias;
> Then at the balance let's be mute,
> We never can adjust it;
> What's done we partly may compute,
> But know not what's resisted.

Burns sensed Determinism, and was on the brink of a great discovery when he wrote of erring humans:—

> One point must still be greatly dark,
> The moving why they do it.

Religion was conventional with, rather than credible to, Burns; at best a loyalty to an ancient and native tradition. There was no greater doubting Thomas than he. This paradoxical utterance proves it. Questioning the reality of Christ and heaven, he wrote to Mrs. Dunlop these burning words:—

> Would to God I as firmly believed it as I ardently wish it.

Digitized by Google

But the strong mind of the reasoner would not allow the wish to be father to the thought. That ardent wish, and not a selfish and particular one, only put him on his guard against a too facile credulity.

But Burns shone at his brightest when, like Omar, he had divorced old, barren Reason from his bed, and sent the beldame theology packing to bear her uncongenial company. Then came The Vision, clothed in an atmosphere transcending both reason and religion, glowing with the light that never was on sea or land, in heaven or hell; but illumining, permeating, transforming the crude material of one poor clodhopper of the Ayrshire fields, making the man a god; and who rose up mightily, and henceforth poured his soul in song. He had found his true Metier. He had dimly glimpsed his own greatness. And yet the light was from himself, or focussed in him from all time, all space, and all experience. Talk of the fierce light that beats upon a throne! and, compared with this, you talk of a rushlight shining on a bauble. First and foremost always was the light of love, and its twin-soul liberty, and mingled in one serene splendour with humanity, friendship, true patriotism, courage, independence; with lightning gleams of humour, pathos, irony, and scorn—all as those elements so mixed in him; or personified in that "tight, outlandish, hizzie braw," whose "half a leg was scrimply seen," and who confessed:—

Of these am I, Coila my name.
"And wear thou this," she solemn said,
And bound the holly round my head;
The polish'd leaves, and berries red,
Did rustling play;
And, like a passing thought she fled
In light away.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

IX.—NEARER THE CROSS.

WHERE palm-trees spread their fans, and balsam-trees produced sweet ointment, and water-springs bubbled down slopes, the city of Jericho stood; and many were its white villas; and the land on one side was the flat vale of Jordan, and, on the other, cliffs and hills rose up.

A crowd followed Jesus into Jericho. The Twelve were with him also. Some say that Judas, the worst man of the Twelve, was born in this city.

"Son of David, son of David! help me, son of David!"

This yell came from a blind man, seated at the wayside. He had heard the tread of a host of feet, and asked the reason, and had been told that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by. He called to the Wonder-worker, as if calling to a king, the son of a king.

Presently, the wayside beggar was marching with the rest along the high street of Jericho; he had received his sight.

As Jesus walked by a shady tree, he saw a man sitting astride of a bough. It was the tax-gatherer, Zacchæus, who, being short, had not been able to see the Prophet over the heads of the crowd; so he had climbed the tree.

"Quick, Zacchæus!" said Jesus, "hurry down; I am coming to your villa."

Down the little man scrambled; and he ran to his house, and bade the servants spread a good table; and he felt as proud as an emperor as he sat with the Son of David and the Twelve Messengers. Of course the Lecturers and Pious Men murmured jealously.

Zacchæus stood, and said,—

"My lord, I do what I can in my humble way. I give half my income to the poor folk; and, if ever I find I have collected more than the just tax from any citizen, I give him back four times as much as I took."

"Salvation has come to this house," exclaimed Jesus to the people around, "this man is a true Jew; he is a son of Abraham. Some of you count him as a lost soul; but I came to seek the lost, and to save them."

A few hours later, the procession of country folk that had gathered in the train of Jesus was tramping along the narrow pass among the high rocks which led from Jericho to Jerusalem. 'Twas the road where the Good Samaritan assisted the man who had fallen among thieves.

At length, they saw the walls, the towers, the roofs of the Holy City, and the spires of the Temple of Yahweh glittered in the sun; and they began to swarm over the Mount of Olives, and some peeped over the fences of a pleasant garden, where olive groves grew dense. This was the Garden of Gethsemane.

Two of the Delegates ran in front, found a young ass tied to a post or wall, begged the owners to lend it for the Lord, David's son, and, before long, Jesus the Master of the jinn and Preacher of the Kingdom, was riding along the mountain pathway towards the gate of Jerusalem. The peasants pulled cloaks and tunics from their own shoulders, and flung the garments on the stony way, for the royal rider to pass over. A roar of cheering and praise echoed across the valley, and was heard in the city streets,—

"Glory, glory! Hail, hail! Blessed is the King that rides in the name of the Lord! Peace in heaven! glory in God's high heaven!"

"Sir," cried a group of Pious Men, "tell your people not to call you by such divine titles."

"They must shout," replied Jesus. "If they did not, the very stones would shout. It is the moment for a shout."

He paused when he saw all the ramparts and turrets of Zion, the City Beautiful, so beloved of all Jews; and his friends saw tears trickling down his cheeks.

"The day will come," he sighed, "when men of war will batter these walls to earth, and not leave one stone upon another."

Then on the multitude swept, across the valley, up the slope, through the gate, along the street to the Temple. At that point, the Preacher of the Kingdom leaped from his ass, and rushed into the fore-court of the House of Yahweh. Men were busy at tables and stalls, selling and buying such articles as country visitors to Jerusalem might be attracted by. The place was like a market or a fair, and Jesus was greatly angered.

"Out, out, you thieves and profiteers," he commanded, as he struck right and left. "This is a House of Prayer, and you have made it a Den of Thieves!"

Much racket and hustling followed; tables rattled to the ground, and the marble floor was littered with this, that, and the other. When all was quiet again, the King from Galilee was telling parables to the listening crowd, and the Pharisees and Lawyers looked on, grim and scowling.

Day after day, this scene was repeated.

The scribes were furious when they heard the Preacher say to the people,—

"Beware of the learned Lecturers on the Law. Have a care, good folk! These pompous scholars strut in long robes, and love to be salaamed to in the market-place, and they sit themselves down in the grandest seats in the synagogue, and they shove themselves into the front seats at feasts. The miserable make-believes that they are! They squeeze the last farthing of rent out of poor widows; and then they come out in the street, and bawl long prayers to Yahweh for you, my friends, to listen to. I tell you that, in good sooth, their doom will be hard and stern."

But very different was his voice when he watched an ill-clad, pale woman go up to the collecting-box in the Temple porch, and quietly drop in two very small coins.

"Did you see that?" he asked his disciples. "Rich men threw in handfuls of gold and silver. That widow gave two copper mites for the service of God. I tell you, she really gave more than all the rich gave, for she gave her little all."

The Lecturers, Temple-Clergy, Long-Prayer-Makers, and Talkers about Yahweh hated the preaching of Jesus; and they held meetings to discuss what to do. This fellow, they agreed, was an agitator, a shaker-up of the common folk, an over-turner of good manners; he must be got rid of. The Roman Governor Pilate must take him in hand as a rebel. Yes, Governor Pilate; and no doubt King Herod, the slayer of John the Baptist, would be ready to crush this pretended King from Galilee! A man who talked of a Kingdom as this agitator did must be an enemy of Cæsar and the Romans. Once let the Romans think this ranter and shaker dangerous, they would soon hang him, or behead him—or hammer him to a cross!

As thus they talked, there came in a man with stealthy glance, and a curious pursing of lips. It was Judas Iscariot. Why he had turned against the Master nobody knows. He told in a low voice how the Prophet went out to the garden of olive trees at dusk with a few comrades, and how easily he could then be captured.

The bargain was soon struck. Thirty pieces of silver would be paid down as soon as Jesus was arrested.

One day Peter the Pilot and John the Fisherman followed a man who bore on his head a water-pot; they tracked him along a back street of the Holy City till he halted at a humble house. The Wonder-worker had told them they would see such a man, and he—being a friend of the Kingdom—would let them have a large upstairs room in which the board could be laid for the supper of the Spring-festival, or Passover. In the evening, Jesus and the Twelve Apostles reclined on seats at this table. The Jews would usually have roast lamb, bitter herbs, unleavened cake, sweet sauce, red wine. Peter and John seem only to have provided wine and bread.

"I very much wished to eat this Passover with you," said the simple King. "This is our last supper before the Kingdom comes."

They all sat silent,

"We thank thee, O Father, for the Holy Vine," murmured Jesus.

Then he filled a cup, and bade all the Twelve drink from it.

Again he spake thanks as he broke a cake of bread, and he gave morsels to his friends, saying,—

"This is my own body. Eat."

They ate without a word.

"Your hands," he said, "rest on the table. One of those hands will betray me."

They looked at one another anxiously. Who could the traitor be? Judas gazed blankly, as if he was the most innocent man on earth.

"Lord," cried Peter, "have no fear. I, for one, will go with you, if need be, to prison, or to death."

Jesus smiled sadly.

"My good Peter, before the sun rises and before the cock crows, you will three times swear that I am no friend of yours."

"Here are two swords, Master," exclaimed one of the Apostles. "We can defend you."

"Two will be enough," he said.

Oh, yes, two would be quite enough, when only one man among them would be ready to draw a sword for defence.

* * * *

Love feasts, or suppers, were held by societies of Romans and other people, who had joined together in friendly guilds or burial clubs (for paying funeral expenses of members), or religious companies. Old Roman pictures found in the underground passages (catacombs) of Rome show men seated at supper tables, on which lie fowls, fishes, and bread-cakes crossed like our Good Friday buns. And Roman soldiers often held meetings for eating bread and drinking water in honour of the God of Light and Life, Mithra.

An ancient book, called the "Teaching," speaks of pious folk meeting for a meal which was begun with a Eucharist, or Giving-of-thanks, thus: "We thank thee, our Father, for the Holy Vine of David thy servant."[1]

When the Gospel of Luke relates how Jesus said: "This bread is my body," it makes us think of many religious customs of olden times.

People thought of trees and corn plants as having a living soul inside them, and just as one man may be kind or unkind to another, so the tree-spirit or corn-spirit might be kind to give sap, or juice, or grain, or withhold the precious food and drink from hungry man and his children. So people tried to please the spirit or god by offering gifts in sacrifice; first, human sacrifices, and, afterwards, when people's feelings rebelled against this dreadful sort of offering, they would make imitation sacrifices, such as puppets of dough. Even till our modern times, country folk in Sweden would, in the days of harvest, bake a loaf in the shape of a little girl, to be eaten at the harvest supper. In Mexico, before the Spaniards arrived, the Aztec people would make bread images of their great god twice a year, and eat the bread in a very solemn supper. And such things have been done in many parts of the world. People would think that, in eating these sacrifices, they were doing what they wished the god to do, and so, in a way, they were made one with the god, and were even eating his food, and eating him. This is why learned men speak of Early Men, and of savages in our own day, as "Eating the God."[2] And, of course, the sap or juice of plants, such as the vine, would be thought of as the blood of the god. Thus, when the followers of Jesus set up a custom of the Eucharist, and ate the body and drank the vine-blood, they were doing, in a new manner, what was done in many religions in various regions of the earth.

ST. GEORGE OF ENGLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Someone has been good enough to send me a copy of your issue of December 9, in which a contributor, who hides his identity under the pen-name of "Mimnermus," offers some disparaging remarks concerning St. George and his identity. I need hardly say that his statements and surmises are not only stale and unprofitable, but lacking in originality. Now, one who would instruct others should surely take the trouble to gain all possible information concerning his subject. But your contributor, presumably a Freethinker, allows his judgment to be biased and fettered by the opinions of Gibbon and by those who, like himself, have adopted that great historian's fallacies concerning the patron Saint of England. A Freethinker should surely be a fair thinker, a searcher after truth, striving to enlighten, and not to obfuscate, the intelligence of those possibly as ignorant and careless as himself. Smartness may make good "copy," but abuse, while it may occasion merriment, is neither fair nor honest, and without educational value.

If, on some future occasion, you will allow me the hospitality of your columns, I shall be happy to tell, more especially your English readers, something about St. George, and why he is held in such veneration and associated with the rapidly growing observance of "England's Day."

HOWARD RUFF, Hon. Sec.,

[Our columns are open to Mr. Ruff for a brief statement of the case for St. George.—ED.]

SOCIALISM AND MALTHUSIANISM.

SIR,—I trust you will find room for a protest against Dr. Drysdale's assertions, coupling, as he does, all Henry George's doctrines—true and false—together. I am a Socialist and a Malthusian, and while I admit that Socialism, apart from an immediate and practical application of the law of population, would be necessary when any socialistic system of society is attempted, or else I believe full use is certain, I do not admit that there are any failures in the doctrine of Socialism. Many Socialists are of my way of thinking, but deem it best to lie low at present about the matter. I don't. I think it very urgent. The bulk of Socialists, I regret to say, are violent opponents of Malthusian doctrines. They will have to learn by experience, as John Stuart Mill points out.

A. J. MARRIOTT.

SIR,—When Malthusians say that, if population increases without limit, there will not be food enough to go round, they state what is perfectly obvious. I will even go further and say that, especially under the existing capitalist system, the restriction of the family by every married couple of small means is, in their own interests, highly desirable. Where I disagree with Malthusians (or the majority of those who write on their behalf) is in their apparent use of this doctrine as an argument against Socialism.

If it is true (and I do not admit that it is) that the food at present producible on the earth, under peace conditions, is insufficient to maintain the present population of the earth in moderate comfort, then it follows that the earth is like a besieged city, and should, in the interests of humanity, be treated as such: the available food being rationed, even in time of peace, among the population. This can only be done on Socialist lines.

If, on the other hand, all Malthusians maintain is that the present rate of increase in population will, if continued, outrun in a certain time, the possible increase in the production of food, then two things are necessary: (1) the restriction of the increase in population, and (2) the increase of food production up to the limits of physical possibility. (1) I understand, the Malthusians propose to achieve by propaganda. Vain talk! The middle classes already practise family limitation: the excessive increase, of which complaint is made, occurs, as a fact of common observation, principally among the very poor. Now, what do Malthusians think they will gain by going and telling the very poor to limit their families? You have a class who, thanks to your economic arrangements, are perforce deprived of all the pleasures of life except two—the pleasure of convivial drinking, and the pleasure of connubial intercourse. Teetotalers want to take away one, and Malthusians (in effect) propose deprivation of the other. Naturally the very poor answer, as one of them answered a good lady of whom I know: "What, ain't we to enj'y ourselves?" It is no use telling very poor people that they may, if they like, enjoy themselves without resultant offspring: people who have to count every halfpenny they spend are not in a position to purchase what middle-class people, and even skilled artizans, can afford. Mere Malthusian propaganda, then, is clearly no use.

Only two things can meet this difficulty; a general levelling-up of poverty by Socialism, when the same forces that operate to limit the birthrate among the middle-classes will be free to operate among the (present) very poor; and the economic independence of women, which will enable women, without exception, to choose for themselves whether they will have children, and, if so, how many, since unlimited child-bearing will no longer be, for the majority of women, the sole means of livelihood.

The remaining desideratum, the maximum public increase of food production, equally presupposes a Socialist reconstruction of society. Under the existing system of production for profit, production is only undertaken if there is an "effective demand" for the commodity to be produced, i.e., if there are people with money to pay for it. The allocation of labour is thus determined by the distribution of wealth; and there is no doubt whatever that much labour is now directed to the production of luxuries for the rich which, given a more nearly equal distribution, could and should be employed to produce food, clothing, and decent comfort for all.

The Malthusian theory, therefore, so far as it accords with facts, is not destructive of Socialism, but corroborative of it. Unfortunately, many Freethinkers seem to have inherited from Charles Bradlaugh, besides his great and excellent qualities, his one unhappy defect, which was his total failure to understand Socialism. Otherwise we should not find Dr. Drysdale seriously writing in the Freethinker, as if Socialism meant the destruction of capital in the sense of "dwellings, factories, tools, railways, ships," etc. And, by the way, Henry George was not, and did not profess to be, a Socialist.

ROBERT ARCH.

THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE.

SIR,—The following extract from the Town Labourer, 1760-1832, by J. L. Hammond and Barbara Hammond, recently published by Longmans, Green & Co, throws a bright light on the teaching of Malthus and its baneful results: "We are concerned not with what Malthus taught the world, but with what the upper classes learnt from him. For them his teaching was simple and soothing enough. The doctrine that poverty was inevitable and incurable put a soft pillow under the conscience of the ruling class. But his teaching offered still greater consolations to the anxieties of the benevolent, for it seemed to show that poverty was the medicine of nature, and that the attempts of Governments to relieve it were like the interference of unintelligent spectators with the skilful treatment of the doctor. The relief of poverty meant the increase of poverty, for if the conditions of the poor were improved, population would quicken its pace still further.....

For some years the influence of Malthus was supreme and fatal. Shelley, in his preface to his Prometheus Unbound, says that he had rather be damned with Plato and Lord Bacon than go to heaven with Paley and Malthus. It was a strange heaven that Malthus, as he was interpreted by the rich, offered to the poor."

Your readers will do well to study this book and also The Land and Revolution, by R. L. Outhwaite, M.P., if they want to understand the actual facts as regards the unnecessary starvation of the people by the infamous Enclosure Acts, whereby they were deprived of access to the old common lands. And, in the Times of 3rd inst., Mr. H. M. Hyndman indicts the Duke of Montrose and his fellow-landlords for playing the game of the Huns in bringing scarcity, and probably famine, upon our people.

Society News.

In spite of the counter attractions provided by King George, and the unreasonable behaviour of the weather on Sunday afternoon, the West Central Hall was well filled.

Mr. Harry Snell was in his happiest mood, and, at the close of an excellent address, received a perfect ovation of applause. Many questions were asked, and the audience generally expressed the hope that it would not be long before Mr. Snell lectured for us again. Friends are requested to note that these lectures start at 3.15, and that a general movement of chairs after the lecture has begun is disconcerting to the speaker.—E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

North London Branch.—The debate of Sunday evening last was a huge success both in point of attendance and of quality. On Sunday, January 13, our genial friend, Mr. C. E. Ratcliffe, opens a discussion on Freewill. Opposers, please note! On Thursday, the 17th inst., a new departure will be made by a week-night debate in the large hall of the St. Pancras Reform Club, when Mr. Colette Jones, N. S. S., will meet Mr. Horace Leaf, of the Spiritualist Education Council. A large attendance of both Spiritualists and Freethinkers is expected, so come early. All seats are free, but we shall take up a collection for incidental expenses.—H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec.

Credulity.

PLEASE don't unveil the naked truth,
To which mine eyes are closed, forsooth!
I do not care to see
Obtrusive facts that would impinge
Upon my mind, and quite unhinge
My bland credulity!

Don't let me see where I have erred
In holding views that are absurd—
Withhold such truths from me.
Hard facts, 'tis said, "are stubborn things,"
And truth, unveil'd, disaster brings
Upon credulity!

The sweets of life are truly grand!
And heaps of lucre are at hand—
To which access is free
For those who trouble not in mind
Concerning truths that are unkind
To my credulity!

Now go thy way, O man of light!
Thy truths are vivid—much too bright.
As hostile aircraft flee
Into the darkness of the sky
Before the searchlights, so does my Dismayed credulity!

My thoughts lay bare this view of you:
You cutely weigh the false and true
In scales of scrutiny;
And thus you probe and nose about
For findings which you mean to flout
At my credulity!

From thought-provoking fuss depart!
For Thought will sever head from heart,
And make them disagree;
Then Doubt, with all his weight and stress,
Will make, indeed, a sorry mess
Of my credulity!

J. F. CORDON.

The clergy used to assert constantly that England's greatness depended on Sunday observance. Now that the British armies are so busy on the Sabbath, as on other days, they observe a discreet silence.

The Pope has sent a protest to Vienna against the destruction of two churches at Padua by aeroplanes. Poor old Providence is too old to safeguard his own houses.

Oh, those journalists! A paragraph referring to the Archbishop of Paris's announcement of special prayers for the Allies was headed: "France's Day of Prayer."

The playfulness of Providence has not been affected by the World-War. Guatemala city has been destroyed partially by earthquake, and 125,000 persons rendered homeless, and thousands killed.

Views and Opinions.

War and the Churches.

It requires but little study of the daily and weekly press to perceive that the Day of Intercession on January 6 was anything but a pronounced success. Save where a special advertising policy had been adopted, the Churches do not appear to have been much fuller than usual, and the non-church-going public—which is the larger portion—was quite unaffected, where it was not disgusted. Most of the papers described the Day of Prayer as having been "widely observed," when it was not width but thickness that was required. A pound of butter may be widely spread, but its width gives little satisfaction to those who eat it. And now that the Day of Prayer is over, things seem to be going on much as usual, except that the food question is growing more acute. The nation looks more like standing in queues than going on its knees. And if it opens its mouth, it is in the hope of filling it with food, rather than to return thanks to a God who has allowed his world to get into its present state, and who, while able to save stone crosses from shell fire, is powerless to prevent the destruction of food or the sinking of hospital ships.

The Impotence of Deity.

If anything, the Day of Prayer seemed only to emphasize the impotence and worthlessness of the Christian Churches. The function of a Church, if it is to have any useful function at all, should be that of keeping aloft the light of the ideal. In this War, more perhaps than in previous conflicts, there has been a greater readiness to ignore those elements of truth, justice, tolerance, and humanity, upon which the permanent welfare of the race depends. Step by step the process of demoralization has gone on, and those who have shrieked loudest about, but have not perhaps felt most keenly, the brutality of the German campaign, have been most anxious for us to imitate German methods, by way of out-deviling the Devil. In such circumstances, the Churches had a clear part to play, if they would only have played it. What part have they played? Let anyone glance over the reports of the services held during the "Command" performance of a Day of Prayer, and what will he see but, in the main, an appeal to force as the arbiter of national destiny? The prayers are for victory, chiefly by force of arms. No prayers were offered that God would change the heart of the Kaiser or open the eyes of the German people, and so once more give the people peace. Apparently that is given up as hopeless. Christ, who can change the heart of the converted burglar, is powerless against the Emperor William. God, who could move the American people to come into the War, cannot, apparently, move the German people to get out of it. He can only operate to nerve men to keep up the fighting. The Christian Deity is still a God of war, in England as in Germany; not so openly proclaimed here as there, but a God of war nevertheless.

A False Standard.

Quite significant of the mental characteristics encouraged by the Churches was the classification of the peoples of the world. "We pray thee for the small peoples as well as for the great," we will "maintain the freedom of a great people as well as of a small people" (this from the Church Times), and so on through endless variations. But who are the great peoples, and who are the small peoples? The only standard in Christian countries, and in the Churches on Prayer Sunday, is that of money and arms. By what other standard is England greater than Switzerland, or France greater than Denmark, or America greater than Holland? A nation is not necessarily greater because it is forty million strong instead of ten, or because it can raise a million soldiers instead of ten thousand, or because it can count its wealth in millions instead of in thousands. Size is not greatness. Multiply armies and navies, and wealth, and population as you will, and in the absence of other and more valuable things, you are only multiplying evil and misfortune. Germany's criminal folly was that it took world-power, huge armies, and a colossal commerce as the marks of a nation's greatness. It has yet to realize that the Germany which achieved these things was a littler Germany than the one that knew them not. But in defence of Germany, it might be said these were the ideals of Christendom. They are the ideals expressed in the prayers for the "great" and the "small" nations. It is an ideal that rests upon the belief in force. Christian nations, and the Christian Churches, have not yet reached the point of classifying nations as "great" or "small" in proportion as they are morally developed and mentally enlightened. The Churches do not yet see that the only way to kill one passion is by arousing another; the way to weaken one ideal is to develop another; and that German militarism can only be successfully killed by destroying the ideas and ideals by which it lives.

Russia to the Rescue.

It is for these reasons that the one event of profound significance in this War is the Rnssian revolution and its outcome. This may have been a set-back to the Allies' military operations; the duty of an army is to beat its opponent, and anything that stops this is properly enough regarded as a disaster. But with this aspect we are not concerned. In the Russian revolution, and, for the first time, a great idea has come definitely and commandingly to the front. It has already borne fruit. It has drawn from President Wilson the clearest and finest expression of war aims yet published, and one on behalf of which, so long as it is fairly interpreted, soldiers abroad and civilians at home, may fight without misgiving. For the first time in this War all the peoples engaged therein have a clear cut idea before them. Are we to continue to live in a world dominated by the glamour of "possessions," of alliances cemented not by mutual esteem and confidence but by distrust of others, or are we to work for a new world that shall take the form of a community of nations in which the presence of a standing army shall serve as a reproach, if not as an actual disgrace? Whatever be the outcome of Russia's present plight, she has set this ideal before the world. And nothing can undo that. It is the 1789 French Revolution over again. Monarchical and Christian Europe hurled itself against the French people. Every country—our own included—strove by wars and repressive laws to prevent the ideas of 1789 gaining entrance. But with only very partial success. The Revolution might be suppressed at home, and much of its advance lost, but the ideas lived on. They were all over Europe; they were persecuted, but they defied annihilation. The Freethinking revolutionary leaders of Russia are doing to-day for the world what, over a century ago, France did for Europe. These leaders may be false to their own ideals, the revolution may be crushed, but the work it has already done will remain and fructify.

The Blunder of the Churches.

It is in this direction that the Churches have shown their weakness and their worthlessness. If they taught ideas they were wrong ones. They have held up the idea of force as bravely as the crudest of politicians. Always ready to sell themselves for an advantage of the moment, they have never realized that in human affairs the ultimate and the decisive force is the force of an idea; that the real task before the world was not to get bullets into German bodies, but to get better ideas into German heads. Had they realized and preached this right through the War, an institution such as the Church, which can reach every town and village in the kingdom, would have had a claim on the respect of men, even though they could not believe in its theology. The Church has done its best to strengthen men for the War; it has done nothing to strengthen them in the direction of ending this War in such a way as shall make future wars impossible. And when the War is over, impartial students are not likely to forget this. They see now that the force upon which many counted as being able to curb the passions of men is in every country in the world at the service of the Government it serves. It preaches a German God in Germany, as it preaches a national deity in whatever country it exists.

The Power of Ideas.

Finally, the Church would not have "hindered" the War had they acted thus. They would only have clarified men's minds, nerved their spirit, and made the "war aim" clear to all. For there is nothing in the world for which men will fight so desperately, and so cheerfully, as for an idea. The very history of religion itself proves this. When Garibaldi called the youth of Italy around him, with the offer of nothing but a crust and hard blows, it was for an idea. When the ill-trained, ill-fed, ill-clothed armies of Republican France swept over Europe, it was as the propagandists of an idea. Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, proved more powerful than pay, plunder, and patronage. When Bruno went calmly to the stake, it was for an idea. When free-thinking men and women braved Christian prisons and outrage, it was for the idea of free speech and a free press. The man who fights for an idea holds the future in pawn. But the Churches have no hope in the future. They know this holds nothing in store for them but condemnation. They are condemned by their past. They are condemned by their present. Nothing is left for the future but to pass sentence.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Lord, Increase Our Faith."

SUCH is the prayer for the New Year which the British Weekly for January 3 urges its readers to adopt as a motto for these troublous times. Jesus was enjoining his disciples to the practice of forgiveness. Dora Greenwell says that "We might have expected, when a moral duty difficult to the natural man was in question, the words would have been 'Lord, increase our charity.'" But what the disciples seem to have realized is the alleged fact that forgiveness is too difficult for the natural man to exemplify in his own strength, and being fully aware of this they naturally prayed "for an increase of the faculty through which alone the Divine aid can be made available by the soul." Hence, in its first issue for the year, the British Weekly devotes its leading article to a stirring commendation of faith as the Alpha and Omega of religion. Nothing can be truer than the statement that without faith supernatural religion is a natural impossibility. He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he hears and can answer those who call upon him. Sir William Robertson Nicoll, for the article under consideration is presumably from his editorial pen, is perfectly justified in assigning to faith the supreme place in religion, and in regarding it as a distinct gift from above. The natural man does not possess it, nor does he feel the need of it. Faith is a faculty of a new, spiritual man, created by Jesus Christ. Sir William thinks there "may be lives so smooth and easy that faith is apparently little needed, the outward tokens of prosperity and peace amply sustaining the soul." The truth, however, is that the natural man, whether in prosperity or in adversity, has no sense whatever of the supernatural. He is a citizen of this world only, and it is this world that supplies all his wants. The difference between the natural and the spiritual man is that the former is pre-eminently a knower and walks by sight, while the latter is pre-eminently a believer and walks by faith. Faith should never be confused with knowledge. Sir William affirms that "by faith we know God;" but, as a matter of fact, God is never known at all. Were he an object of knowledge faith would be superfluous. Even believers are never absolutely sure of him.

Sir William tells us that "we must have faith first of all in God's moral government of the world." The distinguished editor is fully aware that this is exceptionally difficult, for "often it seems as if God had abandoned his own creation." The prosperity of the wicked, he admits, tries everybody's faith, as it did that of the Psalmist long ago. Then he says:—

> Faith may be sorely tried by the apparently impregnable lines of the enemy. They have thrown up fortifications which to all eyes but the eyes of faith appear to be impassable. Again and again the faithful are com> pelled to spend their lives under the tyranny which appears to be in perpetual possession, and they die in the day of its strength.

That is a very old complaint, and often it is nothing but a pious excuse for radical inefficiency. Generally, prosperity is the reward of well-organized industry, but "the faithful" derive much consolation from the belief that their non-success in life is due to their superior honesty and godliness. There are people who seem born to be trampled upon. They are unfortunate in all their ways. As Sir William puts it:—

> Nothing prospers in their hands. A blight seems to have come upon them. They lose the brightest and the dearest by untimely deaths. They fail in business. Cloud follows cloud, and storm follows storm, and when the end comes it is welcomed as a deliverance from a burden too heavy to be borne.....There is before us the prospect of many sad to-morrows, each bringing its own weight of anxiety and anguish. Need we wonder that in these circumstances faith is often very difficult? It may diminish. Questions are put to which no direct answer can be returned. There may come instead of faith a morously sullen or defiantly rebellious mood.

The troubles described in that extract are peculiar to those who have more or less religion. They believe in God, but doubt that his providence extends to them. It is not the existence but the goodness of God that they are inclined to question. A morously sullen or defiantly rebellious mood is possible only to lukewarm believers. If they only used their reason and consulted history, they would understand that the circumstance of their life and the trials that overtake them are easily explained without any reference to supernatural agencies of any kind.

The writer of the article informs us that "faith is called to superior contests in this our day," and that "by faith we may overcome the world even when we seem to be defeated." Here we have the testimony of neffectual and unconvincing pietism. Take this sample of the reasoning:—

> Times have been dark and bloody before this and faith has won through. If we are to give over believing we sin against the whole Israel of God. We offend the generation of God's children. We abandon that precious tradition of faith which is the sacred treasure of the world. We desert the forlorn hope of the righteous. We renounce fellowship with the martyrs and saints who have fought for the good cause from generation to generation. Many of them died fighting, and all the hope of the world is with them.

That passage is a sentimental appeal to the emotionally religious class, and the unethical or anti-ethical nature of its argument is patent to all. Should we continue to believe against evidence and against the direct testimony of common sense merely in order to avoid hurting the feelings of those who do so believe? Is not Sir William aware that the tradition of faith is precious only in the estimation of believers, while to honest unbelievers it is by no means a sacred treasure? There are thousands of men and women in London alone whose conscience backs their intelligence in the rejection of what Sir William terms "the good cause," and are they to disregard the testimony of the highest and best within them for the sake of remaining in "the fellowship of saints"? Or, are we not to give over believing in order not to "desert the forlorn hope of the righteous"? Surely to employ words which imply that the righteous pursue a "forlorn hope" is to give the Christian case wholly away. Some four years ago we read a series of British Weekly articles, contributed by the editor, on "The Difference Christ Has Made," in which the triumph of the Cross was depicted in extravagant terms, and a positive assurance was given that whilst we might still have wars, they would be conducted in a much humaner and milder manner than any wars of the past; but since then we have had three years and a half of the bloodiest and most brutal war on record, and now it is admitted that the Christian hope is a "forlorn" one. What is a forlorn hope? "A desperate case or enterprise"; "any enterprise having little prospect of success." The Christ who, four years ago, was declared to have conquered and won Europe, and to have established his kingdom of righteousness and love upon earth, is now seen to be face to face with an exceptionally perilous or desperate situation, with scarcely any chance whatever of a victorious issue. Sir William's tone to-day is radically different from what it was four or five years ago. He says:—

> Our faith sometimes seems to be very weak, sometimes it seems to have vanished altogether. Sometimes we are tempted to close our Bibles and say we will never open them again.

That is a temptation against which Christians struggle with all their might, but which even the saintliest among them never entirely overcome. It returns again and again to the end of life, and the question naturally arises, Why is it so difficult to believe, and what accounts for the never-ceasing tendency of faith to decline? The Christian answer is that the cause of unbelief is the sinfulness of human nature, the natural depravity which has been the lot of humanity ever since the Fall in Eden. The temptation to disbelieve comes from the Devil, who has easy access to our souls; and somehow or other there is that in us which falls in with his evil suggestions. This explanation satisfies the theologians; and their message to those whose faith is weak, and getting weaker, is "Pray for grace to resist the Devil and compel him to take his flight." That is Sir William's way of escape. Faith is increased by prayer. "In answer to prayer we are visited by the breathing of the spirit of Christ." But the Christian solution of the riddle is not a true one. The truth is that belief in the supernatural is difficult because it is unnatural, because the spiritual man so enthusiastically introduced and eulogized by St. Paul is a sham, existing only in imagination; and faith, being a faculty of the spiritual man, is likewise foreign to our nature, and can never form a part of our life as children of the earth. St. Paul's natural man is really the whole man, and his whole duty consists in being a useful, sympathetic, and helpful member of the race to which he belongs.

A Pennyworth of Prophecy.

Hotspur.— At my nativity
The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
Of burning cressets; and at my birth,
The frame and huge foundation of the earth
Shaked like a coward.

Glendower.— Why, so it would have done
At the same season, if your mother's cat had But kittened, though yourself had ne'er been born.

—Shakespeare, "Henry IV."

THOMAS MOORE, the poet, was nearly choked with indignation by being asked by a lady at dinner how he got his forecasts for his famous almanac. Yet the fact remains that "Old Moore," the prophet, counts more readers to-day than the author of Lalla Rookh, a poem much admired on publication, and for which the author received ten thousand pounds.

Prophecy, it used to be said, found a man mad, or left him so; but an exception must be made in the case of "Old Moore," the most genial and kindly of prophets, whose almanac is known to everybody. Not long ago, there rose up, in an idle week, the old newspaper dispute over the names of the twenty greatest men now alive and famous. Reputations tossed and rose and fell. There were odd folk who were not quite sure of Mr. Lloyd George. Over the merits of the Bishop of London and Billy Sunday there were unkind comparisons; but none of the correspondents ever questioned the right of "Old Moore" to be considered a great man.

His is a fame that flourishes wherever the English language is spoken. He has shown to hundreds of thousands the annual vision of the future, and he has carefully observed the secret of anonymity. As for the public, the prophet serves us well. His manly utterances set us right at the moment when a new bacillus swims into our ken; when we are anxious over a coming eclipse; or the press-gang screams over the inadequacy of the defences of the country.

"Old Moore" should know something of the stars, for he has been in active communion with them for over two hundred years. At least one of the editions of his almanac claims to be in its 221st year, whilst another is said to have a circulation of over a million copies annually. It is true that the name of "Francis Moore, Physician," is not in the Medical Directories, but, probably, on account of his patriarchal age, he is on the retired list. He must have seen many ups and downs during his interesting career, having started in business as a prophet prior to the reign of good Queen Anne.

"Old Moore's" Almanac for the present year suggests that the "voices of the stars" are very clamorous, although, like the clerical prophets of Armageddon, the seer's anticipations are delightfully vague on matters of real consequence. The prophet's principal hieroglyphic for 1918 is a fearsome and a wonderful sight. To the uninitiated onlooker the chief features seem absolutely weird. In the top corner Uncle Sam, who represents America, is seen putting his head in a lion's mouth, but, fortunately, the animal seems unusually well-fed and good-tempered. Close at hand is an American flag, very much the worse for wear. On the right is a boy in a bathing costume, carrying a crucifix up a hill-side on which a bonfire is burning. Underneath, a lady, attired like one of the witches in Macbeth, is attempting to lassoo a good-sized tiger; whilst in the centre a cock is crowing over some skulls, and three Scotch soldiers are giving an open-air concert. The foreground shows a number of workmen engaged in pulling down a jerry-built church. The accompanying letterpress conveys the distressful information that "during the year religious matters will endure a good deal of rough usage," but, lest any reader should get cold feet in consequence, the prophet adds, "there will be a great revival in spiritual concerns." The military concert is interpreted by the prophet as a sign of peace, and "Old Moore" concludes his remarks on his chief cartoon with the inspiring and patriotic words, "God Save the King."

The dozen smaller hieroglyphics, thoughtfully provided for the twelve months of the year, supply considerable food for reflection, and amplify the larger drawing. From the attached letterpress we learn that "during many months of the year" the question of drink "will call for special attention," and that a duke will shuffle off this mortal coil in February. More saddening still, the unexpected death of a well-beloved clergyman will throw a gloom over the merry month of May. A celebrated actress will be beckoned from the stage of life in July. Of more interest to general readers is the autumn forecast that the question of excessive smoking among soldiers will be investigated. In December there will be "a bad railway smash," but, lest this calamity should induce pessimism, we hasten to point out that "trade will be good and cash plentiful," and "grand weather may be looked for."

That is how a twentieth century "prophet" looks out on the unknown year that stretches before us. It cannot be said to be an inspiring message in the unprecedented days in which we live, when the world has plunged back into "chaos and Old Night," and murder is the principal industry, and the preaching of hatred between men is the tender gospel of the Christian Churches. But "Old Moore's" pathetic commonplaces are no worse than the imbecilities of the spiritual leaders of the Christian world, which have varied from the boisterous braggadocio of the German pastors to the timid silence of our own Archbishops, the baby-talk of the Bishop of London, and the determination of the Pope to avoid hurting anyone's feelings. It will never be forgotten that the clergy have stood aside from the world struggle, and have been exempted from military service. The Churches have been organized on a national basis in every country, and they have acted the same as other official bodies. Hence the edifying spectacle in all Christian countries of the paraphernalia of religion being subverted to political ends, and the clergy of the hostile countries appealing to "God" for support for the machinations of the politicians, and subordinating the Christian religion to the secular necessities of the State. It can have but one result, and that is to reduce to the lowest ebb the prestige and influence of the Churches, which only continue to flourish in those half-educated stratas of the community which welcome "Old Moore" among the prophets.

There are so many people out walking in the streets who are celebrated, or notorieties, that it is a pleasure to find a prophet whose features are veiled, and whose private life is unreported in the daily papers. In these days, in this Bagdad of ours, no Haroun al Raschid can venture abroad undistinguished and escape the snapshotters of the illustrated journals. But "Old Moore's" fame is still safe without his portrait being reproduced alongside those of the Bishop of London and the star artists of the music-halls. Let the gloomy deans, and the still more gloomy laymen, give us as careful and as comforting anticipations, and there will be an end of the slump in prophecy.

Atheism and the French Revolution.

IN itself the capture of that prison-fortress, the Bastille, by the people was not a wonderful achievement; it was ill-defended, and its governor might, had he chosen, have exploded the powder magazine and blown it sky-high. But the event was the parting of the ways. It showed that the multitude had got the bit between its teeth, and needed a more potent master than the poor king at Versailles. And the event itself was a striking one. Men are led by imagination, and the Bastille was the symbol of centuries of oppression. Within its gloomy dungeons hundreds of innocent men had perished in solitary misery, without indictment or trial, consigned to death-in-life by the arbitrary order of irresponsible power. Men of the most eminent intellect and character had suffered within its precincts for the crime of teaching new truth or exposing old superstitions. Voltaire himself had twice tasted imprisonment there. What wonder, then, that the people fixed their gaze upon it on that ominous fourteenth of July, and attacked it as the very citadel of tyranny? The Bastille fell, and the sound re-echoed through Europe. It was the signal of a new era and a new hope. The Revolution had begun—that mighty movement which, in its meaning and consequences, dwarfs every other cataclysm in history.

But revolutions do not happen miraculously. Their advent is prepared. They are as much caused as the fall of a ripe apple from the tree, or the regular bursting of the buds in spring. The authors of the Revolution were in their graves. Its leaders, or its instruments, appeared upon the scene in '89. After life's fitful fever Voltaire was sleeping well. Rousseau's tortured heart was at rest. Diderot's colossal labours were ended; his epitaph was written, and the great Encyclopædia remained as his living monument. D'Holbach had just joined his friends in their eternal repose. A host of smaller men, also, but admirable soldiers of progress in their degree, had passed away. The gallant host had done its work. The ground was ploughed, the seed was sown, and the harvest was sure. Famished as they were, and well-nigh desperate at times, the men of the Revolution nursed the crop as a sacred legacy, shedding their blood like water to fructify the soil in which it grew.

Superficial readers are ignorant of the mental ferment which went on in France before the Revolution. Voltaire's policy of sapping the dogmas by which all tyranny was supported had been carried out unflinchingly. Not only had Christianity been attacked in every conceivable way, with science, scholarship, argument, and wit; but the very foundations of all religion—the belief in soul and God—had not been spared. The Heresiarch of of Ferney lived to see the war with superstition carried farther than he contemplated or desired; but it was impossible for him to say to the tide of Freethought "thus far shalt thou go and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." The tide poured on over everything sacred. Altars, thrones, and coronets met with a common fate. True, they were afterwards fished out of the deluge; but their glory was for ever quenched, their power for ever gone.

Among the great Atheists who prepared the Revolution we single out two—Diderot and D'Holbach. The sagacious mind of Comte perceived that Diderot was the greatest thinker of the band. The fecundity of his mind was extraordinary, and even more so his scientific prescience. Anyone who looks through the twenty volumes of his collected works will be astonished at the way in which, by intuitive insight, he anticipated so many of the best ideas of Evolution. His labours on the Encyclopædia would have tired out the energies of twenty smaller men, but he persevered to the end, despite printers, priests, and governments, and a countless host of other obstructions. Out of date as the work is now, it was the artillery of the movement of progress then. As Mr. Morley says, it "rallied all that was best in France round the standard of light and social hope."

Less original, but nearly as bold and industrious, D'Holbach placed his fortune and abilities at the service of Freethought. Mr. Morley calls the System of Nature "a thunderous engine of revolt." It was atheistic in religion and revolutionary in politics. It challenged every enemy of freedom in the name of reason and humanity. Here and there its somewhat diffuse rhetoric was lit up with the splendidly concise eloquence of Diderot, who touched the work with a master-hand. Nor did this powerful book represent a tithe of D'Holbach's labours for the "good old cause." His active pen produced a score of other works, under various names and disguises, all addressed to the same object—the destruction of superstition and the emancipation of the human mind. They were extensively circulated, and must have created a powerful impression on the reading public.

Leaving its authors and precursors, and coming to the Revolution itself, we find that its most distinguished figures were Atheists. Mirabeau, the first Titan of the struggle, was a godless statesman. In him the multitude found a master, who ruled it by his genius and eloquence, and his embodiment of its aspirations. The crowned king of France was pottering in his palace, but the real king reigned in the National Assembly.

The Girondists were nearly all Atheists, from Condorcet and Madame Rowland down to the obscurest victim of the Terror, who went gaily to their doom with the hymn of freedom upon their proud lips. Danton also, the second Titan of the Revolution, was an Atheist. He fell in trying to stop the bloodshed, which Robespierre, the Deist, continued until it drowned him. With Danton there went to the guillotine another Atheist, bright, witty Camille Desmoulins, whose exquisite pen had served the cause well, and whose warm poet's blood was destined to gush out under the fatal knife. Other names crowd upon us, too numerous to recite. To give them all would be to write a catalogue of the revolutionary leaders.

Atheism was the very spirit of the Revolution. This has been admitted by Christian writers, who have sought revenge by libelling the movement. Their slanders are manifold, but we select two which are found most impressive at orthodox meetings.

It is stated that the Revolutionists organized a worship of the Goddess of Reason, that they went in procession to Notre Dame, where a naked woman acted the part of the goddess, while Chenier's Ode was chanted by the Convention. Now, there is a good deal of smoke in this story and very little flame. The naked female is a pious invention, and that being gone, the calumny is robbed of its sting. Demoiselle Candeille, an actress, was selected for her beauty; but she was not a "harlot," and she was not undressed. Whoever turns to such an accessible account as Carlyle's will see that the apologists of Christianity have utterly misrepresented the scene.

Secondly, it is asserted that the Revolution was a tornado of murder; cruelty was let loose, and the Atheists waded in blood. Never was greater nonsense paraded with a serious face. During the Terror itself the total number of victims, as proved by the official records, was less than three thousand; not a tenth part of the number who fell in the single massacre of St. Bartholomew!

But who caused the Terror? The Christian monarchies that declared war on Freethinkers and regicides. Theirs was the guilt, and they are responsible for the bloodshed. France trembled for a moment. She aimed at the traitors within her borders, and struck down many a gallant friend in error. But she recovered from the panic. Then her sons, half-starved, ragged, shoeless, ill-armed, marched to the frontier, hurled back her enemies, and swept the trained armies of Europe into flight. They would be free, and who should say them nay? They were not to be terrified or deluded by "the blood on the hands of the king or the lie at the lips of the priest." And if the struggle developed until the French armies, exchanging defence for conquest, thundered over Europe, from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, from the orange-groves of Spain to the frozen snows of Russia—the whole blame rests with the pious scoundrels who would not let France establish a Republic in peace.

NO FAVOUR SHOWN.

On Hogmanay a queue was formed outside the premises of a licensed grocer, in Glasgow, waiting to get in their supplies for Ne'er Day. A minister who happened to be passing, with the usual curiosity of his kind, went forward to one of the queue to inquire the cause for such a crowd, when one of the women of the queue shouted out: "Hey, you there, gae awa' back to the end o' the queue. Minister or no minister, ye'll hae tae tak'yer turn wi' the rest."

Writers and Readers.

"THINKING," says one of the talkers in Wilde's witty dialogue, "The Decay of Lying,"— > thinking is the most unhealthy exercise in the world, and people die of it just as they die of any other disease. Fortunately, in England at any rate, thought is not catching. Our splendid physique as a people is entirely due to our national stupidity. I only hope we shall be able to keep this great historic bulwark of our happiness for many years to come; but I am afraid that we are beginning to be over-educated; at least everybody who is incapable of learning has taken to teaching.

I am reminded of this amusing paradox, which is really more than half a truth, by a book which I have just finished reading. It is called Poets of the Democracy (Headley Bros.), and the writer, Mr. G. Currie Martin, seems to be one of the earnest and well-meaning teachers that Oscar Wilde had in mind. He has a commendable enthusiasm for poetry—in itself something to be thankful for nowadays—and for those ideals and aspirations which are not unfrequently misnamed democratic. If he had been wise enough to put off his desire to teach until he had served his apprenticeship to learning, the result, I imagine, would have been more weighty. Yet it would be unfair to be too hard on a writer who is invariably modest, if not always wise. The chapters first saw the light in the pages of a popular journal, and seem to have been enjoyed by the men in the trenches—a sign, at least, of a mild interest in ideas. But I am afraid that Mr. Martin has not thought it necessary to think out his subject. Democracy, he holds, is a "spirit and an atmosphere"; its essence, "trust in the moral instincts of the people." Such definitions are a hindrance rather than a help to clear thinking. Democracy, like Socialism, and some other words in popular use, has anything but a precise meaning. We find it applied at one time to a state of society, at another to a form of government; or, it may be, to a combination of both. The United States, Mexico, and the South American Republics have democratic government; and yet, socially, they are less democratic, in many ways, than is England with a limited monarchy. In fact, the world has never had the democracy—that is, a pure democracy. A better title for the little book would have been Poets and some Democratic Ideals. Equality, freedom, the brotherhood of man, and all that are implied in these ideals, are not really peculiar to popular government. They depend upon thought, and perhaps more upon sympathetic imagination. For Mr. Martin, however, it is these ideals that constitute the democracy, and he accordingly hails as a democrat any poet who gives expression to them.

What, then, one may ask, are the signs of democratic poetry? Mr. Martin imagines that he is helping us when he quotes with approval Dowden's dictum that aristocratic art is "selective and exclusive"; implying, I suppose, that democratic art is not so. I can hardly imagine Dowden as standing to so absurdly wrong-headed a conclusion. Even the dull chronicles of our realistic fictionists or the poetry of Whitman's English disciples is not haphazard. The democratic writer must choose his subject, and must exclude vigorously everything that does not help him to express his ideas. Certainly, he may widen the scope of his art; but he cannot change its nature. Whitman called his poems Leaves of Grass, in order to suggest, I suppose, that democratic poems are, or ought to be, as much alike as two peas, or two blades of grass. I am ready to admit that with some writers I could mention the democratic process of levelling down is pretty successful; but I am glad to say that Whitman's practice was better than his theory. No poet has ever been more intensely individual. He sang the "powerful uneducated man," we are told. Precisely. Not the average uneducated man, mind you! but the exception; the uneducated man with a powerful brain, and strong emotions and will. It is the "superman" of our aristocratic friends in another form; the hero of Shakespearean tragedy translated in terms of democratic sociology. The art of Whitman is as selective and as exclusive as that of Shakespeare. It has more in common with the imaginative sympathy and broad philosophic serenity of The Tempest than with the sentimentalism and factitious simplicity of Towards Democracy. In fine, all art is in essence the same; it is the representation of the universal by the particular, and this process is always one of selection and exclusion.

Democracy, as we understand it, found little expression in early English verse. The Canterbury Tales reveal a tolerant sympathetic humanism; but Chaucer's standpoint was distinctly an aristocratic one. He did not take the plebeian as seriously as he did the man of high birth. The only poet of the fourteenth century who felt deeply the intolerable burden of poverty was the satirist, William Langland. The voiceless and long-suffering labourer in the fields of England found in him another Ebenezer Elliott. But the traditional ideals of English poets remained unaltered. For Shakespeare, and for the play-writers generally, the populace was an unwashed turbulent rabble, fit material only for comedy or broad farce. The only bright exception I know is Thomas Decker, who shows a sympathy with fallen and struggling humanity equalled only by that of modern Russian novelists, his song in praise of honest toil being one of the jewels to the crown of our lyric verse. In Gray, Goldsmith, and Cowper, the democratic ideals are present in varying degrees, but are not, I think, sufficiently pronounced to make a body of democratic thought. They are seen better in some lyrics of Burns, and in the whole work of Crabbe. We have the more philosophic side of democratic thought in Shelley, whom Mr. Martin thinks too difficult a poet for his readers. He shows his consistency by asking them to study Meredith, who is fifty times more difficult.

It is a misnomer, I think, to call Meredith a democrat. He had many opportunities in his novels of proving what he was made of, and, strange to say, he took pains to avoid them. His rustics are amusing puppets—never serious human beings. It may be said that Rhoda Fleming and her sister are a farmer's daughters. It is true; but, for all that, they are not less aristocratic than are any of the fine ladies of the novels. Meredith's commoners are either not commoners at all, or are treated with the traditional aristocratic mixture of condescension and good-humoured contempt. Meredith is said to have been a Radical; yet no Tory could have ridiculed Radicalism more effectively than the creator of old Dr. Shrapnel in Beauchamp's Career. Then consider what an opportunity he missed in Evan Harrington! It will be remembered that the problem to be solved is this: How is a son, whose father, a tailor to the aristocracy, has died, leaving behind him some thousands of pounds of debts, to pay off the creditors? The mother, who is the only democrat in the piece, says he must carry on the business; but the son who has been brought up to luxury and has fallen in love with a country gentleman's daughter is not in love with trade. Meredith solves the problem in the old snobbish way by making him marry an heiress. There is a similar democratic problem in Richard Feverel, the solution of which is just as carefully avoided. What would have happened if Lucy had not been the daughter of a naval officer? Meredith,

Digitized by Google

I am inclined to think, for all his pumped-up interest in Juggling Jerries and Old Chartists, had no inkling of what democracy means for most of us.

. . . . . .

The lover of English poets—more especially the beginner—will find in Mr. Martin's little book a stimulus to an intelligent study of it in connection with democratic ideals, but he will do well to be on his guard against the sentimentalism of the writer, and must take some of the statements with a grain of salt. For instance, he says of Meredith that "he believed that the real strength of life consists in spiritual communion and fellowship, in truest brotherhood, in education, and in prayer." The prayerful mood was certainly not cultivated by Meredith, who, if he was not a democrat—and if I do not blame him for his aristocratic bent—was a convinced Freethinker. Apart from such stupidities of criticism, some banalities of phrase, and a syntax that is anything but aristocratic, Mr. Martin's book is worth reading if only for the attention it draws to the fine work of Mr. W. W. Gibson, who is far and away the biggest democratic figure we have in modern verse. I hope to return to him at another time.

Acid Drops.

The House of Lords passed the Woman's Franchise Clause in the Representation of the People Bill by a majority of sixty-three. More remarkable still the bishops voted for it. And the Archbishop of Canterbury gave the reasons for their doing so. He said it was a "plunge in the dark," but there was a "great change of public opinion," and they had to consider the consequence of placing themselves in opposition to public opinion. That might mean, in a few weeks, "a humiliating surrender." So they voted for what it was not safe to oppose. There is one thing about a modern bishop, if he has no ideas to get saved by, he has none worth being damned for, and he will always give way if the pressure be strong enough.

What we should now like, is to see the bishops attempt would be to justify the historic teaching and practice of the Christian Churches in relation to women. No other institution has so uniformly and so universally denied to women legal equality as the Christian Church has done, and no institution was so powerful in moulding public sentiment in this direction. How Freethinkers, who inaugurated and carried on the fight for the equality of the sexes in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, would smile if they were here at the vote of the bishops. They would agree it was due to the pressure of public opinion, and an opinion they were instrumental in forming. An idea may make headway slowly, but provided it be a sound idea, it is as near being indestructible as anything we know. The next step of the bishops will be to prove that the legal equality of the sexes is in the Bible.

The Bishop of Peterborough, in his New Year diocesan letter, says that labour should put all the cards on the table. Presumably in order that the ecclesiastics should trump them.

Romanoff Omar, a Brahman, charged at Marylebone with concealing a deserter, was described as a crank who claimed divine powers. In a letter he had written he claimed to have healed wild tigers, and to have cured persons of diseases. Evidently his assumption of divine powers was worth very little, for his career has been stopped by the police.

How is it that the dear Bishop of London always talks like a negro preacher? Speaking at the London Opera House on Intercession Day, the Bishop said: "We need courage like that of the servant girl in East London to whom I said during the last raid: "I hope you are not afraid," and who replied: "I am, Bishop, but I keep it under. They do say there is no God, but I say there must be some one above the Devil." Is it a matter of surprise that such theology no longer appeals to educated persons?

Pity the sorrows of a poor old deity. The Intercession Day has been followed by a "Week of Prayer," with many of the same performers in the bill.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury Chapel, is in the habit of saying foolish things, but the other Sunday he surpassed himself in the pursuit of that art. He said: "The God of Germany is a false God. The God of England is the true God." Amazingly prodigious is the self-conceit of some people. We believe that all Gods are equally false; but, certainly, a believer in God has no right to differentiate between the God of Germany and the God of England, for they are both identical. It is high time the reverend gentleman learned that when he utters a word about any God he wickedly exceeds the limits of his knowledge.

Is not Mr. Phillips aware that every time he talks in that extravagant, irresponsible style, he is playing the fool, and involving himself in a sea of inconsistencies and contradictions. In the first place, England is at present without God, for we read that "when God comes many things will have to go." God is in Germany now, only he is "largely Pagan and altogether German." The chief function of the German Deity is "to secure victory for the Central Powers." What will be the function of the English variety when he comes? Will it be to give the English an inglorious defeat, in spite of all their praying that their enemy may receive his knock-out blow?

Mr. Phillips, evidently, is blind to the fact that if Germany possesses a separate God, he seems to have had things pretty much his own way up to the present. He wanted war and got it, while the God of England wanted peace and failed to get it.

Mr. John MacLeod, M.P., says he is not troubling about the soldiers when they come back. He is only concerned about the people at home. Mr. MacLeod is afraid of what the soldiers will think when they find us neglecting the things that the Christian religion stands for. This pious M.P. may possess his soul in courage. Judging from the men who are home on leave, they bear up with remarkable fortitude. They are even considerate enough not to attend church during their fourteen days in "Blighty." But probably that is because they don't want to appear to reproach the wicked ones they are visiting.

What Secularists those Christians are! A Sunday periodical prints a motto in each issue, and a recent one ran: "This old earth, that is what we have business with, how to shape her into something more worthy of our best." This is saner writing than beautiful nonsense about the Star of Bethlehem.

Since it has been patronized by Royalty, the Salvation Army has become very respectable. Further evidence of its respectability is shown in the display of Booth's posters outside the Law Courts, in the Strand, and outside St. Paul's Cathedral, the latter announcement being pasted on the statue of Queen Anne, near the west door of the cathedral. Innocent country folk will begin to think that the Government religion is the "Blood and fire" brand.

A new drama bears the captivating title Out of Hell. It ought to interest a number of pious folk.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley has a pawky wit of his own. In an article in a Sunday paper, published on Intercession Day, he said: "To-day the nation is supposed to be at prayer." A palpable hit!

Mr. H. B. Irving has been advocating the opening of theatres on Sundays, and pious people are angry. Yet who can say that it is more wicked to sit attentively through a play of Shakespeare's than to sleep through a sermon.

The piety turned on to order by the press on the Day of Intercession was not all of that childlike variety beloved by the clergy. Some of the newspaper comments were critical, as, for example, the remarks by the Weekly Dispatch (London) on the closing of the cinemas: "So the people of London who never go to church will now spend their day of intercession walking about the streets. There were never enough churches to hold them, even if they ever went."

First the men, then the women. First the boys, then the girls. Many pious headmasters of secondary schools have been lamenting of late that the boys have small sense of religion. Now the head mistresses are following suit. Their Association has been discussing the amount of "vague scepticism" among their pupils. This exists among girls who come from Christian homes. With the others, we assume, the scepticism is not "vague."

The conclusion reached by the Association was that religious teaching should be given in an earnest way by teachers who believed it. That looks like picking out the dullest members of the teaching staff, and advertising their dullness by giving them this special work. Further, there should be no desire to evade or exclude the results of scientific research, but they should be used "to fortify religious truth." But that is an impossible conclusion. If a teacher sticks to scientific teaching, "bang" goes religion. If it uses scientific teaching to "fortify" religion, it must distort, or evade, or misrepresent science. Why don't the teachers make up their minds to leave religion alone? Perhaps one cause is the number of parsons who can influence their appointment or determine their promotion. The first requisite for a good teacher is independence. And they will never get that while the parson is permitted to influence their career.

The Daily News is quite surpassing itself in its daring references to religion. In its issue for January 10 it cites the following from Mr. Siegfried Sassoon:—

The Bishop tells us "When the boys come back
They will not be the same; for they have fought
In a just cause: they lead the last attack
On anti-Christ; their comrades' blood has bought
New right to breed an honoured race.
They challenged Death, and dared him face to face.

"We're none of us the same!" the boys reply,
"For George lost both his legs; and Bill's stone blind;
Poor Jim's shot through the lungs and like to die;
And Bert's gone syphilitic: you'll not find
A chap who's served that hasn't found some change.
And the Bishop said: "The ways of God are strange."

Mr. Sassoon is a commissioned officer and writes, so to speak, from the inside. But to find the Daily News satirizing on God's ways is something of an advance.

It is very hard for a clergyman to surrender anything really stupid. Here is the Vicar of Selby, Yorks, resurrecting the Angels of Mons. He says it was quite clearly the "intervention of God" that turned back the German Army. It is a pity God wasn't equally attentive on Italy and Russia, or Cambrai, when the Germans counter-attacked. But what a back number the Vicar of Selby must be.

The Church Times got furiously angry over the appointment of Dr. Henson as Bishop of Hereford in succession to Dr. Percival, but our contemporary evidently forgot that it represents only one of the parties in the Anglican Church, and that the other parties have equal rights with itself. The Catholic party is exceedingly zealous, but it is also extremely bigoted, and sadly lacks the grace of toleration. These ecclesiastical wrangles highly amuse outsiders like ourselves, and afford a fresh example of the rarity of Christian charity under the sun. The Bishop of Oxford goes the absurd length of advocating the Christian duty of refusing to consecrate the new-elected prelate. One of Dr. Henson's chief offences is that he has demeaned his sacred office by preaching in Nonconformist pulpits!

The Protestants of Germany have issued a manifesto demanding that Courland and the Celtic provinces of Russia shall be annexed by the Fatherland in order that German religious influence may be extended. This suggests Christianity by compulsion, but it does not imply that the Germans are "Atheists."

There has been trouble in Inverness over Sunday concerts. The Town Council had permitted the use of a music-hall for a Sunday concert in aid of a hospital for wounded soldiers. The latter were pleased, but the "unco' guid" were not. And so a protest meeting was held—supported by a number of clergymen, of course—to denounce the Council. The chairman said they had many privileges in this Christian land, and amongst others the Bible and the Sabbath; and Scotsmen were noted for their love for these two things. And so the gathering of parsons protested vigorously against the desecration of the "Sawbath" even to aid wounded soldiers. There is no cause for surprise in the protest being made, but that the Sunday concert should be arranged in far-off Inverness is surely an event worth recording. And when the Scot moves he is not likely to go back. Slow to move, but firm to stick.

"Providence" goes its usual way in 1918. On January 4, in bitter wintry weather, a hospital ship was sunk by submarine action in the British Channel. The cold-blooded brutality of the act makes one almost sick. And the callousness of "Providence" runs a good second to German cruelty. Perhaps some of those who spent their time in stupid prayers on January 6 will give the matter a little serious thought.

Most decently intelligent persons will be pleased that the proposed Government "air raid" on the British Museum has failed. And now one is left wondering at the psychology of those who could see in the British Museum, with its irreplaceable wealth of art and literature, nothing better than an office for a war service. May we suggest to the Government that if public buildings must be commandeered there is St. Paul's, the City Temple, Westminster Abbey, and a large number of nearly unoccupied City Churches. And what about Buckingham Palace or Carlton House?

That New Reader!

No one is quite certain where he is. He may be sitting next to one in train or tramcar. He may be one's next door neighbour; he may be an old acquaintance with whom we have never exchanged opinions on religion. All we are certain is that he is somewhere near us, and that he can be discovered.

Finding a new reader for the Freethinker is quite an interesting occupation, and not by any means so difficult as many imagine. There are thousands of potential readers up and down only waiting to have the paper brought to their notice. They only want looking up, and they are quite grateful for being discovered. That is why finding a new reader for the Freethinker often means making a new friend. It is a pleasurable experience on both sides, with a helpful outcome so far as we are concerned.

Last year our friends helped us considerably in securing new readers. We feel sure that this year most of them will not mind emulating last year's efforts. And they will be helped by the many new friends made since.

We want to see the Freethinker well read in every town and village in the country. There is no reason why it should not be. There is every reason why it should be. All that is required is for us to say that it shall be—and to see that it is done.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 20, Southampton; January 27, Swansea; February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 20, London; January 27, South Shields; February 3, Failsworth; February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester.

P. G. TACCHI.—Literature is being sent. Certainly we will come to Inverness, if arrangements can be made. It is a deuce of a journey: but as we have been told we are going to the Devil, it is as well to get used to long journeys.

S. G. (Bristol).—The data needs very careful scrutiny. The statement that so many cases of hereditary disease were noted may mean only that the disease in question occurred in parent and child, and may ignore the fact that certain predisposing conditions remained the same in both cases.

T. MOZLEY.—Thanks for papers. You will see we have used them. Getting your newsagent to show an extra copy of the Freethinker is an excellent way of helping. Hope to meet you again before long.

G. WALLACE.—We remember the fight at Stockton well. It was warm, but enjoyable all the same.

J. BURRILL.—Sorry your letter came to hand too late for a reply last week. You have put up a brave fight for your opinions, and in a community which placed any real value on opinion, that would command success. We believe things in the future will be better than you anticipate. There is never action without reaction. We hope to see you when we again visit Manchester. The Society about which you inquire has suspended operations.

HELEN LUCAS.—We have sent your interesting letter on to "Mimnermus." He will greatly appreciate its contents.

S. THOMPSON.—We are inclined to agree with what you say; but tastes differ, of course. We hope to issue some leaflets and pamphlets soon on the lines you suggest. The great obstacle is the cost of production.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Quite ready to take the will for the deed.

A. F. DICKINSON.—We regret we have mislaid your address, but if you will forward it to this office we will put you in communication with one of our readers who may be able to supply the copies of the Freethinker you need.

R. NISBET.—Thanks for securing two new readers in the first fortnight of the New Year. Keep it up, and your total will be fifty-two for the year. The calculation is quite simple, and its realization is often not very difficult.

W. BATT.—Pleased our lectures at Manchester gave you so much pleasure. Yes, they did lead to some new members, but the Secretary is still unsatisfied.

TAB CAN.—Not only was Gibbon "Bowdlerized" to suit the Christian palate, but Hume was served in the same manner. And we drew attention a few years back to the Bowdlerizing of Melville's Typee, issued by Mr. John Lane, for, apparently, the same reason. Christians appear to be without compunction in such matters.

T. C. writes:—"In the Daily News of Jan. 10 the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell has a long article on 'A Strange Epiphany,' in which he takes a somewhat mournful look round. He is severe on the state of England just before the War, and considers that the twentieth century has not markedly improved upon the eighteenth. And he has no certain hope even from what was mediæval, superstitious Russia. But a few weeks ago he declared that his spiritual home lay in Jerusalem. May we not, therefore, consign his ideas to Jericho?"

S. COPLEY.—You acted quite rightly, and hope you will persist in your attitude. Are we at liberty to make the facts in your letter public? Sorry that God and the Air Raid is out of print. We may reprint shortly.

HASTAZLE.—Pleased to learn that your newsagent is selling more copies of this paper, thanks for your co-operation. We are greatly obliged for such cheerful help, so readily given.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—M. B., 10s.; W. Dodd, 12s. 6d.; H. Good, 6s; P. C. Harding, 7s. 6d.; G. R. Harker, 10s.

E. C. F. JAMES.—Next week.

ALICE BEACHEY AND J. H. LAYCOCK.—Crowded out this week.

G. L. BRADSHAW.—Paper sent as requested.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (January 20) Mr. Cohen breaks new ground at Southampton. He will deliver two lectures—the first Freethought lectures in Southampton for many years—in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road. The morning lecture at 11 is on "Do the Dead Live?" The evening one at 7 is on "Christianity and the Logic of Life." Local friends are doing their best to secure good meetings, and for the sake of the cause, we hope they will be successful. Next week Mr. Cohen visits Swansea.

Mr. Cohen often receives letters asking him what is his "fee" for lecturing. It may save time, and serve a useful purpose, if it is said now that he has not, and never has had, any regular "fee." When there is anything coming after lectures are delivered he takes it gladly. When there is nothing he takes—the situation—cheerfully, if not gladly. But he has never made the payment of a fee a condition of the delivery of lectures for any Branch of the N.S.S. He has always felt that Branches will pay when they can, and if they can't, well, no useful purpose would be served by not having lectures on that account. Mr. Cohen's services are at the disposal of the movement when ever any good is likely to accrue.

We have several times commented on South Wales as a favourable ground for Freethought work, and we are glad to have independent—even if unwilling—testimony to the work we have done there. The Plebs Magazine for December contains a communication lamenting that "many of the active minority" in South Wales are being claimed by Freethought. We are pleased to record this endorsement of what we have said, and we hope to provide further cause for complaint in the near future.

The above leads us to say that we have long been desirous of setting things moving in Cardiff. The difficulty there is in getting a suitable hall. Can any Cardiff reader help us in this matter? We feel certain of success if only a start can be made.

Mr. Lloyd delivers the third of the course of lectures at the West Central Hall, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, this afternoon (January 20) at 3.15. Londoners have too few opportunities of listening to Mr. Lloyd, and we hope they will make the most of the occasion. It will be an afternoon well spent.

Our appeal to Freethinkers belonging to various organizations to see that the question of Secular Education is kept to the front is bearing fruit. In addition to those instances already announced, Mr. F. C. Warren writes us that Branch No. 22 of the Furnishing Trades Federation passed a resolution, without dissent, in favour of Secular Education, and ordered that a copy of the resolution be sent to the Minister for Education. Other Societies, please copy.

Mr. F. J. Gould is lecturing for the Birmingham Branch on Sunday, 20th inst., at the Repertory Theatre, Station Street, at 7. Subject: "Lamennais, the French Democratic Priest." Mr. Gould's many friends and admirers in Birmingham will, no doubt, do their best to see that the theatre is well filled.

Mr. S. Scott writes from Setland:—

> In renewing my annual subscription to the Freethinker, I desire once more to express my satisfaction at the admirable manner in which it is conducted.....I, for one, have nothing but thanks and congratulation to offer for the help and comfort the brave old publication has been—and is—to me.
> I first made the acquaintance of the Freethinker in 1884, when I was living for a time in London. I had never seen or heard of it before; but when I read that first number I said, "This is just the thing I want, and have often longed for." I have never missed an issue since then. I have met many other readers of the Freethinker during my lifetime, and all say the same. All love the paper. I do not believe there is any other periodical, "sacred or profane," in the United Kingdom that has so devoted and affectionate a circle of readers. The Freethinker is absolutely unique in this respect. And long may it be so. Long may it flourish and prosper, and deeply may its flashing blade gore the filthy and cruel flanks of superstition and imposture.

Quite a cheery letter with which to start the New Year. A knowledge of the affectionate regard in which the "one and only" is held by its readers acts as a constant inspiration to all concerned in the upkeep of the Freethinker.

Manchester friends will please note that Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner lectures in the Co-operative Hall, Ardwich to-day (January 20), afternoon and evening. We hope the hall will be well filled on both occasions. We are glad to learn that the recent "social" held by the Branch was a complete success. Another one is in contemplation before the close of the season.

We are asked to announce that Mr. Miller will open a discussion at the St. Pancras Reform Club, under the auspices of the North London Branch of the N.S.S., on "The Religion of Russia and the Revolution." The subject is an interesting one, and should attract a good audience.

The Executive of the Miner's Federation of Great Britain recently passed a resolution protesting against military drill in elementary schools, pointing out, at the same time, that this was not to be taken as involving a protest against Swedish drill. We believe this to be a wise move, and hope that other organizations will follow suit. Germany, to use a famous phrase, turned its schools into training stables for the Army, and the world sees the consequence. If we are fighting against German methods of militarism, our first step ought to be to see that they do not effect a lodgment in the schools of the nations.

At the last meeting of the N.S.S. Executive permission was given to form a new Branch at Nuneaton, and thirty new members were admitted to the Society. This makes eight new Branches opened within the past two years, while the number of new members enrolled almost equal the number on the books at the opening of that period. This is good progress, particularly when one bears in mind that the work has been carried on under conditions of unprecedented difficulty, and with a great increase on the cost of railway travelling. We are expecting more Branches in the near future. Meanwhile there is Nuneaton and Birmingham with Coventry between. The latter is without a Branch of the N.S.S. We hope that omission will be repaired shortly.

Freethought is cropping up in all sorts of unexpected places. Thus, in a recent issue of the Licensed Vehicle Traders' Record, we observed a reprint of the late S. P. Putman's "blasphemous" poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" And A. G. G.'s article, "The War and the Churches," in the Daily News for January 5, read very much as though portions of it were reprinted from some of our own articles on the same subject written about six or seven months ago. These things, added to the passages one finds cited from the Freethinker in the provincial press, make one wonder what is happening. Hope we shan't get too respectable.

"The nominee of the Baptist Prime Minister" is, apparently, giving the bigwigs of the Church of England an attack of mental indigestion. The election of Dr. Henson to the Bishopric of Hereford will, says the Church Times, "be as the letting out of waters." Let brotherly love continue.

For the first time during the War period, Mr. J. T. Lloyd is visiting South Shields next week-end, and will lecture twice (afternoon and evening) in the Victoria Hall, Fowler Street, on Sunday, January 27. It is therefore hoped that Mr. Lloyd's numerous admirers will embrace the opportunity of once again hearing his voice in this North-East coast town. Suggestions or inquiries should be addressed to the local Secretary in time for the final committee meeting to-day (Sunday), when the arrangements are to be completed; and, in addition, Mr. J. Fothergill, the Treasurer, will give a brief survey of Professor Bury's famous booklet, The History of Freethought.

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

THIS Fund is to raise the balance of expenses incurred in defending the right to sell literature at public meetings in the London parks. A Protest Committee was formed, and after carrying the question into the High Court, the London County Council was induced to rescind the offending resolution. It was a splendid victory, and that should specially appeal to all Londoners.

The Orb of Day.

OUR globe, with all its multitudinous modes of being, derives its existence from the light and generous warmth of the sovereign sun. That mighty and majestic luminary is, indeed, our father throned in heaven. The rain that falls; the winds that blow; the heat which cheers and sustains us; the light, apart from whose beneficent activities no faunal or floral life could exist, are all ultimately due to the prodigious outpourings of the lord of day. Air and ocean alike would promptly freeze were the sun's powers withdrawn, and our planet's vast and varied population of animal and vegetable organisms would perish in the pitiless cold.

With the cessation of the radiant light and heat now received from the sun, our earth would rapidly become a floating graveyard. All our hopes and aspirations, all our trials and sufferings, all the grandeur and glory of human achievement, would fade into oblivion. In company with our pale satellite, the moon, our planetary home, tideless and inert, would spin in desolate space, with no mourner surviving to grieve over its departed pride.

Still, the sun does shine, and although until recently it was feared that its benignant activities were destined to near their end in the course of some twenty million years, we now possess cogent reasons for believing that the lord of heaven will continue to shower forth his prodigal blessings on just and unjust for countless ages to come. Indeed, in the light of the now ascertained energies resident in material bodies, Professor Arrhenius, the world-renowned chemist, speaks of the probable duration of billions of years for future expenditure of solar power.

But even now, when from our planet's point of view, the sun probably radiates its maximum heat and light, we experience a striking difference both in light and temperature between night and day. When, on a serene and cloudless afternoon in May, the sun warms the atmosphere almost to summer's splendour, the approach of twilight and the setting-in of night herald a remarkable fall in temperature, particularly when a cool breeze flows from north or east. And what a contrast between sable night and twilight grey, and the rising of the golden sun! As Browning depicts the dawn and sunrise:—

> Day!
> Faster and more fast,
> O'er night's brim, day boils at last;
> Boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's brim,
> Where spurting and suppressed it lay,
> For not a froth-flake touched the rim
> Of yonder gap in the solid gray
> Of the eastern cloud, an hour away;
> But forth one wavelet, then another, curled,
> Till the whole sunrise, not to be suppressed,
> Rose, reddened, and its seething breast
> Flickered in bounds, grew gold, then overflowed the world.

The sweet light of the sun is a great natural marvel, but perhaps even more wonderful are our luminary's heat-conferring powers. Sir Robert Ball has compared the heat of the solar globe with that of a perfect industrial furnace, in which—> even steel itself, having first attained a dazzling brilliance, can be further melted into a liquid that will run like water. Let us imagine the temperature of that liquid to be multiplied seven-fold, and then we shall obtain some conception of the fearful intensity of the heat which would be found in that wonderful celestial furnace, the great sun of the heavens.

To enable one to realize the enormous heat radiated from the sun's surface, it is essential to note the titanic proportions of our luminary. The moon journeys round the earth at a mean distance of nearly 240,000 miles. Now, if we were to imagine a hollow globe occupied by our planet, together with the space embracing our moon's orbit, then the body of the sun would completely fill it. And every square mile of that tremendous mass of flame is perpetually pouring forth immense torrents of heat. So gigantic is its energy that it is a fair estimate that the heat which radiates from two square feet only of its heated surface would be sufficient, and more than sufficient, to propel the engines of a huge Atlantic liner in its voyage from New York to Liverpool.

The sun's heat is flung into space with reckless prodigality. It is said that the light and heat daily expended by the solar orb might illuminate and warm 2,000,000,000 planets each as large as our earth. In the light of this truth, the theological theory that the sun was designed to shed its light upon this globe is palpably preposterous. Well may Ball, the astronomer, inquire, as he does in his Earth's Beginning:—

> What would be thought of the prudence of one who, having been endowed with a fortune of ten million pounds, spent one single penny of that vast sum in a profitable manner, and dissipated every other penny and every other pound of his fortune in aimless extravagance? But this is apparently the way in which the sun manages its affairs, so far as our earth is concerned.

And even when we consider the sun's output of energy from the viewpoint of the entire retinue of planets, we discover, according to Dr. Sampson, the Astronomer Royal for Scotland, in his work on The Sun, that "the only portion that produces any known effect is the minute fraction intercepted by the discs of the planets, and this is about the hundred and twenty millionth part of the whole." So far as science can ascertain, the inconceivably vast remainder is utterly wasted.

The mind almost reels when one seriously contemplates the problem of the manner in which the sun's colossal expenditure is sustained. For we cannot escape the conclusion that this prodigious expenditure has been proceeding for untold ages. We know from common experience that, no matter how vast a conflagration may be, it ultimately dies down unless constantly replenished with fresh fuel for burning. Professor Langley informs us that an entirely incredible quantity of fuel would be required were the sun's daily outpouring of heat maintained by processes of combustion. If all the immense coal measures of Britain were completely exhausted, and even if all the vast coal fields of China, America, and all the earth besides were entirely utilized for the purpose of supplying the sun with fuel; and were we to imagine the titanic task of plunging into the sun the whole of the coal reserves of the world in one stupendous effort, this huge mass of highly combustible material would immediately be reduced to ashes, and, doubtless, an unspeakable quantity of heat would be generated. One might conjecture that a mass so vast would at least suffice to sustain the sun's heat for an appreciable period. But it is a sober scientific truth that all our planet's stores of coal, estimated to serve the wants of the human race for centuries to come, which, if consumed at one time on our tiny earth, would cause a conflagration so vast as to be almost inconceivable—this colossal accumulation of coal would, nevertheless, fail to evolve as much heat as the sun normally expends in the tenth part of every single second of its existence. In the course of a few minutes a quantity of heat arises from our potent and majestic luminary, and is urged into space, which is some 5,000 times as great as the totality of heat that has ever been generated, or ever can be generated by the burning of all the coal our globe has at any period possessed. And when we reflect that during long long ages, prior even to the appearance of life on our planet, this boundless prodigality of heat and light has been proceeding, and seems likely to proceed for unspeakable æons of future date, the magnitude of the problem confronting us almost defies the most comprehensive imagination. The sun must have inherited a stupendous fortune to enable it to maintain its splendour through the ages undimmed despite its unrestrained and, apparently, improvident expenditure. How can the sun persistently squander two thousand million times as much heat and light as that which the world receives? And yet the insignificant portion received by our globe is sufficient for our needs in temperate regions, while, in the tropics, the heat is insufferably intense.

A fairly accurate estimate of the daily radiation of the solar orb has been secured through the researches of several scientific investigators. These inquiries have proved both delicate and difficult ; but the results have been fruitful in no small measure. The unit of heat employed for the purpose of determining the temperature of the sun is the quantity essential to raise the temperature of one pound of water one degree Fahrenheit. What is termed the solar constant is the number of heat units which impinge "in one minute, on one square foot of a surface placed at right angles to the sun's rays, and situated at the mean distance of the earth from the sun." After allowing all due deductions for the sum of heat absorbed by our atmosphere, the quantity derived from the sun at its mean distance of 93,000,000 miles is determined. The result thus obtained teaches us that one square foot of the terrestrial surface exposed to the solar beams at right angles, is the recipient during each minute of such exposure, of sufficient heat to exalt the temperature of one pound of water fourteen degrees Fahrenheit. This radiation arrives from the solar surface, and it is mathematically certain that the number of units of heat requisite to furnish this result prove that the total heat units "emerging each minute from a square foot on the sun's surface must be about 640,000."

The meaning of this statement will be clearly seen when we ascertain the amount of coal necessary to evolve the same quantity of heat. It can be conclusively shown that the heat discharged by each square foot of the sun's surface in one minute is equal to that generated by the consumption of forty-six pounds of coal. From this it follows that the annual radiation of one square foot of the solar exterior equals that obtained in the combustion of 11,000 tons of high quality coal. To annex Ball's vivid illustration :—

> If we estimate the annual coal production in Great Britain at 250,000,000 tons, we find that the total heat which this coal can produce is not greater than the annual emission from a square of the sun's surface of which each side is fifty yards. All the coal exported from England in a year does not give as much heat as the sun radiates in the same time from every patch on its surface which is as big as a croquet ground.

(To be continued.) T. F. PALMER.

Freedom.

THE most precious thing that men can have, because with it all other good things are obtainable, is that for which most of us care the least. I mean freedom—freedom to think, freedom to speak, freedom to act, to labour and to rest in whatsoever manner and at whatsoever time we please, provided only that in exercising our freedom we do not interfere with that of others. To have such freedom would be to live naturally, and, therefore, according to the highest physical, mental, and moral laws of our being. Few persons understand this, and for that reason few persons desire the priceless treasure. Most people think that freedom means lawlessness—the absence of all restraint. They think that it would lead to every form of crime—theft, lasciviousness, and bloodshed. They have been dominated by artificial religions and cunningly devised statute laws so long that they have no faith in natural religion and natural laws. They are like a man who has been taught to walk on crutches from infancy, until he has come to believe that crutches are better than legs. Most of us have grown to love creeds more than thought, and to trust the decisions of the Courts more than in the laws of the universe. Many of us have grown to believe that nothing is true except what is decided by the particular Church to which we belong, notwithstanding that almost every doctrine that has been declared true by this authority has been shown by facts to be false. Infallible men, infallible books, or infallible majorities are blindly followed, although they are almost always wrong. He whom the world calls an infidel is more likely to be right than the Pope. The minority is generally nearer to the truth than the majority. And the truth is to be found best of all in facts—the facts of the universe external to us and the facts of our own mentality. Unfortunately, few people know much about either, and so they believe that the individuals who compose society would not know what they ought to do, and would not do it if they did, were it not for statute laws with policemen to enforce them. The next time you see a member of Parliament, a judge, a parson, or a town councillor, gaze upon them studiously, for these constitute the conscience of society ; and when you see a soldier with his gun, and a policeman with his club, mark them well, for they constitute our moral motive power.

Statute law is our conscience. Brute force is our moral motive power. Is it any wonder, then, that we have to watch each other like hawks, for fear of being robbed? or that we can hardly allow our daughters, sisters, and wives to be out after dark, when the real conscience has shrunk into the person of the man who makes our laws for us, for the interest of himself and his friends ; when the still small voice has degenerated into the policeman's club?

This would not be so if people cared for freedom. But they do not. Rather than use their own brains, they prefer that the parson and the lawyer should think for them. It is a bother to think, and it may be expensive. It sometimes costs money, and often costs friends. It sometimes leads to prison, and even to death. It is so peaceful to believe, and so distressing to doubt. Let the parson find the way for me ; I will ask no questions. It is so hard to know how to treat my neighbour. He might get the better of me if I settled our affairs with him alone. Let the lawyers fight it out between them—his lawyer and mine. What the Courts decide will be right.

Is it any wonder that the world is overrun with fools and rogues when most people relegate the whole subject of religion and morals to others? And not only to others, but to those least likely to know anything about them? Those who know least of religion, as a class, are the parsons and priests ; and those who know least of morality, as a class, are the lawyers. Theology is the death of religion, and statute law is a device to escape doing right.

Neither do most people desire freedom of speech. They do not wish him who does think to speak. No sooner does he begin to say what he really thinks than his best friends, as well as his worst foes, try to shut his mouth. They urge him to keep silent for his own sake as well as for the sake of society. There is noone society fears more than he who speaks the truth. There is nothing society fears so much as the truth. And the cause of this dread is that people have no real confidence in the present Church and the present system of society, for it is manifest that the outspoken truth could not injure either true religion or a state of society based on justice, because true religion is devotion to the truth, and just society is fraternity in accordance with the truth.

Strangely enough, and yet not so very strangely, when you consider how both the parsons and the politicians have conspired to stifle thought and manhood, the very victims of our barbarous industrial system do not care for freedom. Here is an agricultural labourer, with a wife and six children. He works hard and cleverly, and gets 18s. a week as wages.

"Are you contented?" I ask him.

Digitized by Google

"Content and thankful," he says.

"But you are very poor."

"It is the will of God."

"But you have to do without many things you want, and your wife and children have barely enough to live on."

"That is true, but I am glad of that, for if we had plenty we might forget God. By-and-bye we shall be in a world of eternal bliss."

"When you are dead?"

"Oh, sir, we shall live for ever in heaven."

"Then it does not matter how much you suffer in this world?"

"No, sir."

"But this great landlord who employs you he is not poor?"

"Oh, no; God has blessed him with the power of getting plenty of money without doing any work."

"But does it never occur to you that you and your fellow-workers produce all the goods, while he and his fellow-idlers get most of the money, and that it is a little queer that the men who make all the goods should not also get all the money?"

"No, sir; I never thought of that. But it must be quite all right because God is good. Besides, I have blessings that he knows nothing of. He has only two children while I have six. He has several fine mansions while we live in a poor hovel, but you know what is said about love in a cottage."

When will such poor fellows learn that contentment under injustice is a crime? Poverty is the mother of every crime and vice. Poverty is a disgrace to every community, because there is not the smallest natural reason for it. And he who is contented so long as his fellow-men are wronged and imbruted is irreligious, immoral, and heartless. If we did not pity him for his ignorance, we should hate him for his cowardice.

And this is what the present Church and State have done for men. They have pushed them down so low in body and mind that the love of freedom is nearly dead—the aspiration to know more and to be more is nearly gone.

But there is much now to look forward to, for this great War has stirred the dry bones of feudalism and monopoly as no mere preaching ever could have done. The brain of the great giant Labour is awaking to the sense of his enormous power by which only can peace again be permanently ensured to a tortured world. And in the coming days when the workers enjoy free access to the soil, and the inestimable boon of their own bank, supplying them with a paper currency based on their own productive power; in that day when man will labour and enjoy the full fruits of his labour, his brain will grow, his heart will grow, his character will grow, his span of life will be happy and prolonged, he will be no longer debased by the sordid industrial struggle of the sorrowful to-day. Then there will be no poems but those of Labour and of Love, because the workers of every nation will have come to recognize that their interests are identical—that he who robs and oppresses any of them is the enemy of all—and that the scourge of War was fabricated solely by the cunning hands of those who wanted to perpetuate industrial slavery.

WHAT IS CAPITAL?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In the Freethinker for January 6, Dr. C. V. Drysdale accuses Major G. O. Warren of having been captured by that "plausible compendium of economic fallacies, Henry George's Progress and Poverty." It would be interesting to learn by what "plausible compendium of economic fallacies" Dr. Drysdale has been captured.

In his letter, Dr. Drysdale defines capital as dwellings, factories, tools, railways, food, etc., and then triumphantly asks "how many people would be employed or able to work at the end of a month if capital were destroyed."

What is a negro slave? A man of the black race. This explanation is on all fours with Dr. Drysdale's explanation of capital. A negro is a negro; only under certain conditions does he become a slave. A cotton spinning machine is a machine for spinning cotton; only under certain conditions does it become capital.

Let me here condense Karl Marx's definition of capital. Capital consists not only of means of subsistence, instruments of labour and raw material; not only of material products, it consists just as much of exchange values. All products of which it consists are commodities. Capital, consequently, is not only a sum of material products, it is a sum of commodities, of exchange values, of social magnitudes. Capital remains the same whether we put cotton in the place of wool, rice in the place of wheat, etc., provided only that the cotton and the rice, the body of capital, have the same exchange value, the same price, as the wool and the wheat in which it was previously embodied. The bodily form of capital may transform itself continually, while capital does not suffer the least alteration. The sum of commodities of exchange values becomes capital when as an independent social power—i.e., as the power of a part of society, it preserves itself and multiplies by exchange with direct living labour power.

It is only the dominion of past accumulated materialized labour over immediate living labour that stamps the accumulated labour with a character of capital.

In conclusion, can Dr. Drysdale explain why, if his explanation of capital be correct, many past systems have not been known as capitalist systems?

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JAN. 10.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Brandes, Braddock, Eager, Lazarnick, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, and Thurlow; Miss Stanley, Miss Kough, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

Thirty new members were admitted for Birmingham, Goldthorpe, Manchester, North London, Nuneaton, and the Parent Society.

Permission was granted for the formation of a new Branch in Nuneaton.

Various items of correspondence were read and dealt with. The adjourned discussion re finance, carried at the Interim Conference, was resumed. Mr. Brandes (South London delegate) presented some suggestions on the matter, and finally the motion of Mr. Samuel, adjourned from the last meeting—"That the Editor be asked to start a Shilling Fund in the Freethinker for the N. S. S."—was carried.

The Secretary reported a successful opening of the afternoon meetings at the West Central Hall, and it was resolved to continue these meetings in London, if halls could be obtained.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

Just as we are going to press, we receive with the greatest regret news of the death of Lance-cpl. L. H. Evans, the only son of Mr. N. J. Evans, of Palmer's Green, N. We regret that considerations of space prevent our inserting a fuller notice in our present issue. We insert this brief note in order to explain its non-appearance to those interested.

Views and Opinions.

Demobilization.

On all sides it is admitted that the difficulties facing the world immediately after peace is proclaimed will be hardly less serious than those fronting it during the War. Getting millions of men back to civilian labour will be no simple task, nor will it be easy to induce contentment with those hundreds of thousands who are in positions of "official" importance because of the War, and will hardly be pleased when they are called on to sink back into a position of unimportance. A uniform—civil or military—has a fatal fascination for many; medals, decorations, and titles are hardly less attractive—even when the latter are scattered about so profusely that one hardly knows whether one's dustman may not be a Knight Commander of something, or one's charwoman a Grand Dame of the Empire. Peace will appear drab to some, tame to others, and the psychology of the after the War period will provide an interesting and a profitable field for study.

Why not the Clergy?

Demobilization of the military and civil forces, organized for the prosecution of the War, will be so great a task that it may well involve reconstruction on many new lines. And if new ventures are to be attempted, the end of the War would be the most favourable occasion. Therefore, we venture on a suggestion which may or may not be adopted by the Government. We have a khaki Army, and we have a "black" Army. The nation is ringing with the deeds of the first, it is more likely to grow vocal over the misdeeds of the second. The first has offered its bodies for the safety of the nation; the other has received a comfortable salary, or, when it has donned khaki—for other purposes than fighting—has received an officer's rank and pay. In pre-war days, many people who were under the delusion that the Black Army was essential to the safety of the nation, have now had their eyes opened. People will, moreover, be prepared for considerable rearrangements. No such favourable movement is likely to present itself again. So, we say, let us demobilize the clergy.

The Black Army.

The Black Army numbers about 50,000 men. At present they are of no "earthly" use. Their true function is a heavenly one. Their real business is to prepare us for the next life; and if people really believed in it, and them, the present would be a very busy time for the clergy. How much money this Army costs, no one can exactly say. It is certainly not less than twenty millions annually; it may easily be half as much again. And they are always clamouring for more. The cry of the "poor clergy" is always with us; and even the Bishop of London once explained that, after paying for food, housing, firing, lighting, and servants, all he had left from his salary was a beggarly twenty-eight hundred a year for, apparently, clothing and pocket-money. Before the War, many of us knew the clergy were of no use; but others were under the delusion that, somehow or other, they helped people to live together peaceably, and stood generally for what was vaguely called the higher things of life. Now everyone knows that is not the case. The clergy are as useless in war as in peace. They cannot pray the world into good behaviour. They cannot pray an opposing army out of existence. They cannot pray for society with any prospect of profit. They can only prey on it, with disastrous results. So, once more, while we are demobilizing the Khaki Army of five millions, let us add the "Black Army" to the number, and demobilize the lot.

Work for the Clergy.

Now, in making this suggestion, we are not deprecating the use this army of educated men might be to the country. We are only desirous of putting them to greater use. Fifty thousand men, giving the whole of their time to the instruction of their fellows on any kind of social topic, would exert an enormous influence for good. And what they taught would not be of so great importance as the kind of subjects to which they were directing attention. The land question, the population question, the marriage question, the relations of employer and employed, sanitation, education—all of these are vastly important subjects, and the really important thing is to get people thinking and talking about them. Set people discussing things, and it will not be long before some solution to every problem will present itself. So, after demobilizing our Black Army, we should do with them exactly as we say we are going to do with the soldiers—draft them into some form of social employment of recognized utility and service. They could help to teach people how to live, instead of explaining to them how to die. They could emphasize the state of London, or Manchester, or Liverpool, instead of the New Jerusalem. Their work would be to train citizens for healthy human intercourse instead of making them candidates for heaven. They would teach people to rely upon their own intelligence and strength instead of upon the expected help of an antiquated tribal fetish. The soldiers will be demobilized when the German, as an enemy, ceases to exist. But the enemy of the clergy, the Devil—or was he their friend?—ceased to exist long ago. Or, if the clergy still have an enemy to fight, it is common sense. And in the name of common sense, we say, let us demobilize the clergy.

In Defence of the Pulpit.

Of course, there may be objection raised to this being done. It may be argued that in demobilizing the clergy we should be inflicting an evil on society instead of removing one. Thus, it was once urged against the Church that it absorbed the best intellect of the nation to the impoverishment of life in other directions. That charge cannot with truth be brought against the Church at present. It may be urged, on the contrary, that the Church to-day, by attracting to its service a class of intellect not the best fitted for serious mental work in either science or social life, relieves the community at large from the direct weight of the burden. In any other walk of life it is clear that nothing like the salaries paid to leaders of the Churches could be earned by them. And there is in addition another aspect to be faced. Most people would admit that were the methods of the pulpit carried into social life the results would be disastrous. The habit of reckless statement, the unqualified condemnation of those who disagree with them, the inattention to facts, and the neglect of careful observation so emphasized by science, all these things are so patent with the clergy, that it would be disastrous to throw men to whom these things apply into the general stream of life. The Church, it may be said, with some justification, by acting as a selective force and confining to the pulpit a type of mind that would scarce be tolerated in either business or scientific circles, is performing a real service to the community. Demobilization might not, if this argument be admitted, then, mean the release of a serviceable body of men, it might only mean the casting adrift of a body of men, the major part of whom are by nature and training unfitted for any better work than the kind they are doing. Society has a certain responsibility towards even the clergy. We find suitable occupations for the mentally afflicted. Have we not some kind of duty towards those who are marked out by nature for the pulpit?

Payment by Results.

In any case, if we cannot demobilize the clergy, why not adopt the principle of payment by results? That would be quite fair to everybody, and the clergy are continually appealing to experience. The Prayer Book of the Church of England provides plenty of cases that could be tested. There are prayers for the sick, for the wounded, for a nation in times of War, for good harvests, for those at sea, etc. If the clergy can produce a beneficial result in any of these cases no one will grudge them either payment or honour. Why not place them in charge of a ward of wounded soldiers—provided the latter could be induced to agree—and then see what benefit their prayers are to the men? Or place the Archbishop of Canterbury in power at the Admiralty, and then note whether there is a marked diminution in the number of vessels lost. There are scores of ways in which we could test the usefulness of the clergy, if we only made up our minds to do so. We need not insist upon success in every case, a fair average would be enough. And if the clergy are honest in their profession of faith they would have no objection. At any rate, it would put the matter on a more satisfactory basis than is the case at present. But one of the two courses should be adopted. Either payment by results or demobilization. The first would be an interesting experiment, the second would throw the "poor clergy" on their own resources. In either case, society would be relieved from the upkeep of a body of men of whose utility no one seems assured, and whose honesty even is often open to serious question.

Pulpit Recklessness.

PREACHERS are unique specimens of humanity, and form an exclusive category. They claim to be ambassadors of a monarch whose very existence is insusceptible of demonstration, with the result that for their ministrations of every kind they are, in reality, responsible only to themselves. Ministers of Christ, they call themselves; but as Christ is their own creation, it follows that their service is rendered only to the Church which appointed them. They pride themselves upon being Heaven's spokesmen, but are merely the expounders of man-made creeds. The other Sunday the Rev. Charles Brown, D.D., of Ferme Park Baptist Church, occupied the pulpit of Westminster Chapel, London, and endeavoured to justify the ways of God with man. As reported in the British Weekly for January 17, he said:—

> The vital question for all of us is, Can you trust God? Can you commit yourself to him with security? Can you believe that, among all convulsion and change, his goodness abides? . . . We must trust God. People are asking to-day in bitterness, "What is God doing?" and they think something has gone wrong with the government of the world.

"We must trust God." Such is the dogmatism of the pulpit. But why must we trust God amid all the abominations and horrors of a world war? Dr. Brown's answer is that the world has always had its full share of suffering and sorrow. On "a green hill far away," two thousand years ago, Jesus was crucified as a common criminal; and it was God who did it. Now listen:—

> What was God doing there? He was saving the world, and he is saving the world to-day. When I think of the great tide of sorrow, growing ever swifter and deeper, my only comfort is that through this agony of war the Divine Father is saving the world. There is no other way of destroying militarism than by taking upon our hearts the burden of it all.

By cruelly murdering his only begotten and beloved Son on Calvary two thousand years ago, we are told, God was saving the world; but saving it from what, and to what end? Can Dr. Brown honestly point to a period of time when the world was in any sense saved? It is true that Europe became nominally Christian under Constantine the Great, and has continued so to this day; but nothing is more absolutety undeniable than that a Christian world is a fundamentally different thing from a saved world. Indeed, Dr. Brown himself tacitly admits that for nineteen centuries God's attempt to save the world was a dismal and total failure, inasmuch as he is still working at the job by means of the most brutal war on record. Clearly the reverend gentleman, if correctly reported, is guilty of using words in the most reckless manner conceivable, and we conclude that he is able to do so simply because the God he pretends to represent exists only in his own imagination.

Dr. Brown is evidently a professional talker who has no inconvenient sense of responsibility. Being simply a product of the human fancy, God never interferes with his self-elected champions, no matter what they may say about him. So the reverend gentleman is allowed to blaspheme with a vengeance:—

> "Why does not God intervene?" you ask. He is intervening. "Why does he allow this war?" He cannot help himself, unless he were to take from man that prerogative of freedom which alone gives value to right-doing.

Is God free? Could he do wrong if he felt inclined? If not, his right-doing possesses no value whatever. The law that applies to man must be equally binding on man's Maker. Dr. Brown deliberately ignores this, and commits himself to the laughably absurd doctrine that man's freedom implies the capacity to do wrong; which means that unless he can tell a lie, his truth speaking can have no value. Of course, this doctrine is a theological subterfuge, resorted to for the express purpose of exonerating the Supreme Being from all blame or responsibility for the evils so prevalent in the world. Very discreetly, the reverend gentleman contents himself with stating without defending the strange doctrine of human free-agency, and then proceeds thus:—

> Amid this awful resurgence of wickedness in the world I still believe that God sitteth on the circle of the earth. I know that in history wrong has sometimes triumphed for a time, but it has ever been the conviction of the best and wisest men that right would ultimately reign. I believe in a God who suffers with his Universe. When we remember the horrors of the world, its sin, shame, and suffering, let us not forget that God is bearing it all.

Why does God sit on the circle of the earth if not to guide its every motion? Why does he sit as King for ever if not to reign over mankind? Why is he supposed to reign at all if not to have his will done both in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth? But Dr. Brown holds that the freedom which he has conferred on man precludes the possibility of his being absolutely supreme in his own Universe.

Dr. Charles Brown belongs to the orthodox school of theology, with all its prejudices and bigotries, and is completely out of touch with the spirit of the age, being one of the kill-joy fraternity. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, however, is a New Theologian of some note, from whom we would naturally expect utterances of a much more liberal and tolerant character. But the fact from which there is no escape is that all divines, in their attitude to outsiders, are significantly alike. The Birmingham Gazette for January 14 contains the report of a sermon which Mr. Thomas recently delivered before the University of Birmingham, in which he deplores the world's tragic alienation from Christ. Even the Church has gone terribly astray, and must be brought back. As in Dr. Brown's discourse, so in Mr. Thomas's, the central thought is that two thousand years ago "One offered himself in lowly life and agonizing death to heal the woes of mankind, and reconcile man to man and all to God," and that now, after so long a time, "men were again reconsidering and accepting the meaning of Christ." According to the testimony of more competent judges, there is no sign whatever of an approaching religious revival; but be that as it may, the fact remains that for fully nineteen hundred years Christ has not succeeded in healing the woes of our race, and that, judging by appearances, he is less likely to succeed now than ever. That Mr. Thomas is not a reliable guide even in plain matters of fact is shown by the following statement:—

> I hope I am not mistakenly sanguine; but I believe that our very scepticisms and agnosticisms are changing their tone and quality. They are becoming modest, and, if not yet believing, willing and even eager to believe.

Either Mr. Thomas is insufficiently acquainted with present-day unbelief or he deliberately misrepresents it. We know some hundreds of Agnostics who are neither eager nor willing to believe, and who, if more modest than their fathers, are more zealous advocates of freedom of thought and expression. Mr. Thomas is an ecclesiastic to the back bone. Whilst fervently hoping that "the mediæval subjection of University life to ecclesiastical authority is gone for ever," he is the sworn enemy of the policy of Secular Education. He says:—

> I believe it were far better for humanity to restore the mediæval relation than to permit the interest of scholarship and education to be subordinated to secular ends. The independence of learning must be jealously safeguarded. It will be safe only when it is inspired throughout by the Christian spirit. Not education only, but every department of life, must respond to the appeal. It was not the business of the Christian Church directly and officially to interfere in activities that were best carried on in unhampered liberty, but it was its business so to inspire every human soul, so to Christianize the functions and activities of all Christians that their life was always flowing out from Christian motives, and measured by Christian standards and permeated by the spirit of Christ.

Mr. Thomas must be perfectly well aware that the Church has always hated and discouraged education as such, and done its utmost to suppress it. The sciences of chemistry, geology, and astronomy in particular, were bitterly denounced and opposed by ecclesiastical authorities, and there are those living to-day who distinctly remember the hostile reception to the Origin of Species on its first appearance less than sixty years ago. The divines were in a state of the utmost frenzy, and the then Bishop of Oxford utilized all his oratorical gifts in the effort to persuade his fellow Christians that it was a work calculated to subvert the Christian religion; and had the Inquisition been still in force, Darwin would have been burnt as the most dangerous of heretics. And yet Mr. Lloyd Thomas would rather see the Spanish Inquisition restored than that our education should be conducted on Secular lines. The age of persecution is past, but the spirit of persecution is still alive. The pulpit is as intolerant as ever, and if it had the power, its intolerance would be as drastically expressed as it used to be six and seven centuries ago.

The Real Burns.

Two Essays. By Professor W. P. Ker, LL.D. Maclehose, 1918.

ROBERT BURNS has been dead over a century, and his fame is far wider and more secure than when he died. His life is now celebrated as an important event, and his poetry is rightly regarded as a glorious contribution to the world's literature. Admittedly, Scotland's greatest poet, he has been subjected to extreme adulation from his countrymen. Had he been a lesser genius than he was, this fulsome praise would have exposed his name to derision.

Professor Ker's essay on Burns will flutter Caledonia's dovecotes. Greatly daring, he transforms Burns from a Scottish singer into a British poet. Burns, he contends, was the poet of a nation whose capital was not Edinburgh, but London. This is a direct challenge to those critics who declare that Burns depends upon dialect, and that when he tried to write English, he fell into mediocrity, fettered by the difficulties of an alien tongue.

This time-honoured contention is part only of the truth, and shows that Burns, like many another classic, is more talked of than read. One or two brief quotations, taken at random from his works, will modify this idea effectually. Take this from a love song:—

> O my luve's like a red, red rose
> That's newly sprung in June!
> O my luve's like the melodie
> That's sweetly played in tune.

Here is another from a battle-hymn, one of the best ever written :—

By Oppression's woes and pains,
By your sons in servile chains,
We will drain our dearest veins,
But they shall be free.
Lay the proud usurper low!
Tyrants fall in every foe!
Liberty's in every blow!
Let us do or die!

How much do these two striking quotations depend on dialect? Or does this?

A fig for those by law protected,
Liberty's a glorious feast.
Courts for cowards were erected,
Churches built to please the priest.

Then turn to those lines which are admitted to be among the very finest that even Burns ever wrote :—

Had we never lov'd sae kindly,
Had we never lov'd sae blindly,
Never met—or never parted—
We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

Do those superb lines derive their force from their one solitary word of dialect? Burns has suffered grievously at the hands of hiccoughing Highlanders and maudlin ministers, but professed critics might well give the corpses of defunct heresies decent burial.

Professor Ker has much to say concerning Burns's political views, but he says little of the poet's views on religion. In view of Christian cant on this subject, this is a pity. For Burns's heresy was "four square to all the winds that blow." Oliver Wendell Holmes, indeed, expressed surprise that puritanical Caledonia could take Robert Burns to her straight-laced bosom without breaking her stays. For Burns, like Paine and Voltaire, was a Deist. Of other religion, saved what flowed from a mild Theism, he scarcely showed a trace. In truth, one can scarcely call it a creed. It was mainly a name for a particular mood of sentimentalism, the expression of a state of indefinite aspiration. The Holy Willies of Orthodoxy have made the basest uses of this emotionalism; but Christians cannot read Burns without unloosening the shackles of their faith. David Hume's young Freethinking contemporary did not merely express his dissent from Calvinism. He struck at the heart of the Christian superstition. Seeing plainly that priests trade on fear, he sounded a true note when he said scornfully :—

The fear o' hell's a hangman's whip
To haud the wretch in order.

How he lashes the rigidly righteous :—

Sae pious and sae holy,
Y've nought to do but mark and tell
Your naeboor's fauts and folly.

And, again :—

Learn three-mile prayers, and half-mile graces,
Wi' weel-spread looves, and lang, wry faces,
Grunt up a solemn, lengthened groan,
And damn all parties but your own,
I'll warrant then ye'er nae deceiver,
A steady, sturdy, staunch believer.

Burns never hesitated to make a frontal attack on religion :—

D'yrmple mild, D'yrmple mild, th' your heart's like a child,
And your life like the new-driven snow,
Yet that winna save ye, auld Satan must have ye
For preaching that three 's ane an' twa.

The "Merciful Great God" of the Christians excites his derision and indignation :—

O Thou wha in the Heavens dost dwell,
Wha, as it pleases best Thysel'
Sends ane to Heaven and ten to Hell,
A' for thy glory,
And no for any guid or ill
They've done afore Thee.

The real Burns is not the popular Burns of the Scottish manse and drawing-room. When the peasant poet was received by the "unco' guid" aristocracy of Edinburgh, he was afloat on a treacherous sea. The company that professed to admire him stood on the land and drank the poor poet's health, and Burns raised his glass and bowed his acknowledgments on his frail raft. In spite of all the glib phrase-making of the critics, Burns belonged to a very different world to that which his patrons inhabited. The insuperable barriers between Burns, the rare genius, and his stupid, if well-meaning, patrons, is not got rid of by pretending that they do not exist.

Like all pioneers, Robert Burns was so much alone. So early was he in the field that he could do little more than anticipate Carlyle's bitter "Exodus from Houndsditch," or his caustic apostrophe to Christ, "Eh, man, ye've had your day!" But what he did was sufficient for his generation. He fought at fearful odds, and as Carlyle says, "Granted the ship comes into harbour with shrouds and tackle damaged, the pilot is blameworthy, but to know how blameworthy, tell us first whether his voyage has been round the globe, or only to Ramsgate and the Isle of Dogs."

The noblest quality in Burns's magnificent poetry is the eternal quality of honest indignation. It comes always with no veil of invention; it is blunt, simple as daily speech, the man himself talking before us. It is this quality that makes his "Jolly Beggars," a poem which stands alone in literature, not only unmatched, but unmatchable. The beggars are not merely rebels; for them the laws and conventions of society have no existence. And so with Robert Burns himself. He rises above the network of clerical authority like a skylark. Every Freethinker will say of him what warm-hearted Burns himself said in his epitaph on his friend, "With such as he, where'er he be, may I be saved or damned."

MIMNERMUS.

No More Miracles.

I MET "Uncle Joe" the other evening coming home from an expedition round the streets of South London in search of food for Sunday's dinner and for the following days, one of which had been arranged by the Food Controller to be "a meatless day."

Uncle Joe, it may be explained, is a conventional Christian. At one time he was a Sunday-school teacher connected with the local church; then he became a churchwarden; but in recent years, under the stress by strain of the great War, he has fallen away from the paths of grace by attending the theatre or the cinema palaces, and getting what relief he was able by a little innocent amusement.

"Well, Uncle," I said, when we met, "how have you got on with regard to food—got any margarine or butter yet?"

"No," he said; "I've been round to about fifteen shops, and they've all sold out."

"Ah," I replied, by way of chaff, "time for some miracles now."

"No, my boy," he answered, "you always will bring that subject up. I have told you over and over again that the day of miracles is over—that the last miracle was performed by Jesus Christ himself—and to-day we have to rely upon human effort and natural forces for all that we get on this earth."

"Yes, Uncle, but what I always find is that you, like so many other Christians, forget what your Bible teaches and what ecclesiastical history has to say on the question. Don't you know that the New Testament says that Paul raised a man from the dead after the death of Jesus, and that hundreds of miracles are alleged to have happened in the early history of the Christian Church? Besides, what do you pray to God for—to stop the War, to turn the hearts of the enemy to a nobler purpose—if you believe that the age of miracles is past?"

"Well," responded Uncle Joe, "it does seem a little bit inconsistent I-know; but who expects consistency in any man to-day?"

"Well, Uncle, you think yourself hard done by because you can't get a little margarine to put on your bread. Now I know a poor woman who has nine children under fifteen, and her husband only earns about two pounds a week—which in war-time means only about a pound—and her children have been out all day waiting in the various queues to get small quantities of tea, sugar, and margarine; while the mother is trying to get a small piece of meat of some sort to stew for Sunday's dinner. Now, I ask you, would not a nice little miracle come in handy for such a poor creature as that?"

"Well, what would you suggest?" said Uncle Joe.

"God used to drop manna from the skies for the benefit of hungry Israelites thousands of years ago, why cannot he drop—I don't suggest legs of beef or shoulders of mutton because, if they hit you, they might put you out of action for a time—but like the fairy in pantomine, he might transform a lot of useless articles into nourishing food for the benefit of starving creatures all over Europe. Could he do that-if he would?"

"Certainly he could do it," said Uncle Joe, "if he chose; but you don't suppose for a moment that God Almighty is going to be dictated to by puny man; certainly not."

"Then God is responsible for the starvation of thousands of innocent women and children in all the so-called civilized nations of the earth to-day."

"How do you make that out?" said Uncle Joe, in a tone bordering on anger. "God did not cause the War; man did that."

"But God did not prevent the War, and therefore he is responsible for it, and you admit that he could if he had chosen. What is the good of you praying to him to stop it now, when he could have done so at the beginning, if it had not met with his approval?"

"You Atheists, I admit," said Uncle Joe, "are so rigidly logical in everything, you leave nothing to faith; it never seems to occur to you that God knows a great deal better than we do what is good for us."

"Do you say that starvation is good for any of us?"

"No, I do not say so. I do not know. But that may be God's way of punishing us for our sins."

"All I can say is, that it is a very cruel method. Our Heavenly Father ought at least to be as humane as the best of our earthly fathers. They would never think of adopting such methods."

"I don't know," responded Uncle Joe. "Some of them would."

"Yes, and they would be prosecuted for cruelty, and get long terms of imprisonment by a magistrate, who would be simply carrying out the feelings and sentiments of an outraged community."

"But let me refer you for a moment to some of the alleged miracles of Jesus. He is said to have fed five thousand hungry people on five loaves and two fishes. Could'nt he do something of that kind now?"

"As I have said," responded Uncle Joe, "he could if he chose."

"But he doesn't choose. Very well. He is alleged to have opened the eyes of the blind. Could he do that now?"

"Of course he could. He is Almighty."

"Very well," he does not do it. Don't say there is no occasion for such a miracle. Look at the thousands of soldiers that have come home from the War—not only blind, but deaf and dumb from shell shock. Cannot he restore sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and speech to the dumb to-day?"

"He could if he chose."

"But he doesn't do it. It is left to the skill of the doctors, and they cannot accomplish such tasks. They cannot perform miracles."

"But they are performing wonders, you will admit. Their skill is marvellous," said Uncle Joe.

"They cannot perform miracles, it is true—they would if they could; they do their best, and they do it all without the aid of the gods. Their methods are purely natural. Men are making the lame to walk by the aid of artificial legs, and artificial arms are being supplied to those who have had the misfortune to lose them."

"Yes, I admit all that," said Uncle Joe, "and I rejoice in their achievements. I have actually seen a man who had lost his nose supplied with an artificial one. War is a terrible thing, but how can we stop it? Christians are as much against war as you are."

"Not quite. Freethinkers are uniformly in favour of peace, and are never in favour of war, except in self-defence, or in defence of unoffending people fighting for their rights against a powerful tyranny. But the Church has always been in favour of war—not one Church, but all the Churches. Read their history. There has never been a war fought that has not had the sanction of the Churches and the approval of the bishops and the clergy—at least not in my time—and, I think, not within living memory."

"But the Churches," said Uncle Joe, with an air of triumph, "are not Christianity."

"Christianity has an existence quite apart from all the Churches."

"Yes, I admit that, but you cannot think of Christianity without thinking of the people who profess it, and they belong, for the most part, to some Church or other, to some sect or other, however obscure and insignificant. Those who belong to no church—are indifferent—they are what I call nothingarians, and, I think, they form the largest part of any community."

"That may be so," responded Uncle Joe, with doubtful acquiescence.

"Well, and now we have discussed these matters, come with me to the Town Hall, and I will find out for you where you can get your margarine and other articles without the performance of any miracles. Come!"

With this exclamation I took "Uncle Joe" by the arm and accompanied him to the office of the Food Inspector, who soon put us on the track of the articles of food he required.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

A Thought from Hippolyte Taine.

UNTIL the age of fiteen I lived in ignorance and tranquillity, I had not yet thought of the future; I knew nothing of it; I was a Christian, and I had never asked myself what this life is worth, where I came from, and what I had to do.....Reason appeared to me like a beacon light, I began to suspect that there was something beyond what I had seen, and to grope as in the darkness. My religious faith was the first thing which fell before this spirit of inquiry. One doubt provoked another; each article of belief dragged another down with it in its fall.....I felt within myself enough honour and strength of will to live as a good man, even after losing my religion, I esteemed my reason too highly to believe in another authority than its own; I refused to recognize rules for my life and the conduct of my thoughts from any other person; I became indignant at the idea of being virtuous through fear and a believer through obedience.

Anno Domini.

I WAS "down on my luck," with no immediate prospects, and being a member of a Christianized nation, I ought to have trusted myself to Providence, and allured consolation by resorting to plagiarized platitudes. I did neither, which to my early ecclesiastic shepherd would seem damning evidence that his prophecy was nearing fulfilment. He had warned me on one occasion when I had asked a rational question (receiving the stereotyped irrational prevarication) that I was "lost," and augured well to deserving a bad and untimely end.

That my end was not near has since been fully evinced, but the times, I must admit, were both bad and untimely. It had been the same for weeks, continually hoping and expecting, and—disappointment. The wearying effects of daily endeavours all coming to naught were gradually transmuting optimism to cynical pessimism. This, in spite of the unassailable reputation I held of being a ridiculous optimist, and I well deserved the appellation, for usually I never found it difficult to be happy-go-lucky. It is easy, however, to show off a Touchstonean levity to patronizing associates, but in strange surroundings, alone and with rapidly dwindling means, the rose-water fragrance of makebelief and illusion no longer charms the drab of cogent circumstances.

I do not think any man can be really optimistic if cast alone with his thoughts when things go against him. He may talk to himself and circumvent facts with admirable subterfuge until he generates consolation—temporarily. I have tried it. I have interrogated my reflection in the mirror to the jingle of a few shillings and coppers—the whole of my financial backing—but the result did not encourage inspiration. Perhaps I ought to have tried the old-fashioned remedy of silent invocation in humble genuflection, but, secretly, I prefer the barbaric simplicity of seeing to whom, or to what, I am appealing.

The day of my story was the culmination of a gathering morbidness. I rose late and did not advance far with my toilet, for after washing myself I lounged all day, collarless, and with slippered feet. I smoked heavily until my tongue became most disagreeably furred, all the while restlessly endeavouring to read and play patience alternately. As a matter of fact, I had resolved not to do any work that day, and at least I was consistent in that.

By way of a brief explanation of my circumstances, I should say that, possessing an artistic temperament, I had centred my attention on advertising as a means of subsistence, but it was clearly becoming evident that nothing short of a Nazarine touch would prove my venture anything but an abortive speculation.

The rain had pelted down all the afternoon, and helped considerably to intensify my splenetic condition; yet, when evening came, I determined to face the aqueous elements and find convivial attraction elsewhere. I soon made ready, and set off with a dogged persistence. The street in which I was staying was a sort of bottle-neck communication, joining up a slum district with the busy thoroughfare of a middle-class neighbourhood.

I had not walked far before my well-worn clothing was reduced to a pitiable appearance. The weather was atrocious, and even in my state of mental insubordination, I recognized the futility of defying the wrath of Jove, so I decided to turn into an ale saloon that I should directly pass. I had been there before, and knew what to expect; but the sin of misfortune is a wonderful leveler. Whatever the conditions, I knew that I should be tolerated and receive a certain kind of welcome.

Through the swing-doors a sanded, uneven-flagged passage led forward to a zinc-topped counter, serving in a crude way—with a ridiculously small enclosure behind—as a bar. Around, there were sprawled two or three coarse-looking men, and an emaciated old woman, whilst the landlord was sitting down, looking lascivious with vulgar prosperity. On one side of the passage was a very small room with "snug" painted on the door, and presumably this retreat was reserved for any "select" company who may call. It is really peculiar how class distinction exists in the most strange and out of way places. Opposite the snug, near the bar, was a much larger room, from which could be heard a babel of voices and snatches of music-hall ditties.

The landlord nodded as I entered, and somewhat counteracted my rancorous mood. I ordered "a steady" (a pint of common beer) as I turned into the large room to join the noisy company, consisting of young people of both sexes, with the exception of a huddled heap in a corner near the door. It was a bundle of degenerate senility—a man about sixty years old—who could tell! The ages of the rest ranged from sixteen to thirty.

I sat down on a form that stretched the length of the room along the wall, and received a tacit recognition from a few of the company, for they were habitues, and I had seen them there before. Probably they now recognized in me a fellow-Bohemian and outcast, and accepted my presence as a charitable reciprocation.

But what a company! Animate frames—draped. Even my apparel made an aristocratic comparison, for filth and rents were complements to their attire, and I felt quite an interloper, wearing a very soiled soft collar. Several of the people were in a partial state of intoxication, but their mirth was innocent—sadly innocent, though ribald. Their world was a remote planet in the effulgent constellation of society. They did not know the other spheres. What instruments had they with which to astronomize; with which to probe the secret of contemporary cosmos? The means, where were they?.....Where? Thumb-marked by chanting parasites and rapacious legislators, what chance had they? Exemplifications;—living monuments of a deific chastity!

A besotted slattern, flushed with voluminous talking and singing, her hair falling in matted lengths over her shoulder, came and sat beside me. She sniggled and ogled stupidly. My acquired sense of respectability revolted; but why? Why should I? The primitive streak was still within me, and it conquered. After all, it was only abstraction that separated us.

The girl was not more than twenty, but her voice was fogged with repeated inebriation. She leered gapingly as I cut some tobacco (I had been forced to economize by using a rank substitute), and presently asked me to buy her a bottle of stout. I did, and it was gone in one drink! But her depravity was insatiable, for next she asked me for a "chew 'o' 'bacca."....To what depths.....!

Those who live in the glass-house of religious jurisprudence will roll their eyes, and denounce my shameful aiding and abetting of such disgraceful morality. But puritan censure was always flaccid and superficial. There is no cavilling in the "backwash" of life. Driven into a state of abject passivity by the flagellation of circumstances, their meagre store of vitality finds expression in sordid extravagance.

I stayed an hour; an hour with unfettered primordialism. Bawling voices crossing the time of a metal-toned piano; freakish laughter and reeking jests. The girl danced up and down the sanded floor presumably imitating some music-hall star. It was mirth and melody to that shrunken crowd. Hellish! you say? Better that than the grind they would go to on the morrow! Convention, propriety and discrimination were discarded. They were automatons of irresponsibility revelling in the freedom of a Bacchanalian licence—just human beings without the veneer.

This, the twentieth century A.D., and still the alliterate combination—parsons and politicians—meddle on! "O Thou, the Omniscient, Omnipotent, and Omnipresent, look down upon these, Thy children, and rejoice!" So chants hypocrisy.

Acid Drops.

Perhaps it was only fitting that the Day of Prayer on January 6 having been ordered by the King, for the Government to issue "Instructions" to the clergy as to prayers and sermons. These "Instructions" were, it appears, issued by Captain Guest, Mr. Lloyd George's Whip and Patronage Secretary. This is all that was needed to make the elaborate farce of a Day of Prayer complete. And what is one to think of a clergy who receive "Instructions" in this manner? If the clergy don't get the contempt of decent men and women, they at least work hard to deserve it.

The clergy are asserting constantly that the World-War will benefit Christianity, but a few of them are beginning to have doubts on the subject. No fewer than seventeen Army chaplains contribute to a volume of essays, of which the scope is indicated by the title, The Church in the Furnace. Freethinkers will smile at the suggestion that the Church, which has consigned so many people to the immortal bonfire, is in the furnace herself.

Canterbury Diocesan Board of Finance has set aside £500 as a fund for war bonuses to curates in the diocese. This special act of Christian charity may cause joy in heaven, but it will bring but little happiness to the numerous poor curates, who will remember, prayerfully, that the Dear Archbishop struggles to keep up appearances on £15,000 yearly, and that the bachelor Bishop of London exists on a paltry £10,000 annually.

At an inquest at Kensington on the Rev. Francis Sparkling it was stated that the deceased had been addicted to drink, and that death was due to chloral poisoning. The restraints of religion are not very evident in this instance.

We are glad to see protests against the compulsory religion of the British Army growing. In the Daily Chronicle of January 16, Miss Winifred Stephens writes a letter in which she says:—

> Our soldiers and sailors are making unspeakable sacrifices for us. Ought we merely for the sake of orthodoxy, which will never save the military situation, to demand from any of them sacrifices of conscience? Ought we to require from the few, who are endowed with the mental activity and the moral courage, necessary for the facing of fundamental problems, the sacrifice of that liberty for the sake of which in the political world they are already risking their lives?
> These were the questions which leapt to my mind when I recently heard how an able officer at the front, after having been twice vainly reprimanded for absence from Church Parade, was summoned to answer for his offence before his superior officers. He frankly explained that, being a convinced agnostic, Church Parade would be for him rank hypocrisy. He was told that if he persisted in his refusal to attend he would be tried by court martial.
> Doubtless this case of a patriotic Englishman, who volunteered on the outbreak of the war, and who has ever since served abroad, having lately been promoted to high rank, is only one out of many.
> Such treatment of those who are fighting for political and national freedom, ever anomalous when we have the French who know nothing of such things for our Allies, grows still more glaring now that we have at our side in the field our American cousins, who would never consent and who would never be asked to submit to such religious tyranny.

It is one of the ironies that, amid all the talk of freedom, men should be compelled to assist at a religious service which so many of them regard as an outrage on common sense, and very few of them attend willingly.

The pill of religion has to be gilded nowadays. Listen to this account from a soldier: "We stroll down to the Y.M.C.A. tent, and have a gossip or a game of cards, meanwhile drinking enormous quantities of tea. We get fairly decent concerts at the Y.M.C.A. Saturday nights. One night we had a miniature bioscope featuring one of the "Exploits of Elaine." What a difference between this alluring picture and the attitude of the clergy in the ages of Faith: "Believe, or be damned."

Booker Washington, the negro educationist, in his Up from Slavery, tells of an old darkie who suddenly stopped work in the cotton field, and, looking towards the skies, said: "O Lawd, de cotton am so grassy, the work am so hard, and the sun am so hot that I believe this darkie am called to preach!"

An Anglican Church correspondent, referring to two extempore prayers, says that "the Almighty was given certain unnecessary pieces of information"; but, surely, the same thing is true of all prayer, whether extempore or not. The Creator is offered the insult of being told what vile, miserable creatures we are, how he has aided us in the past, and what he ought to do for us in the future. Yes, prayer gives God quite unnecessary pieces of information and instruction, and is in its very nature an impertinent but, fortunately, futile attempt to interfere with the course of things. All Christians affect to believe in it, though not one in a thousand ever practices it.

The newly appointed Governor of Jerusalem is the son of the Dean of Rochester, who was for many years vicar of the fashionable London church, St. Peter's, Eaton Square. When he left for Rochester, he said that he held so many offices he scarcely knew who he was. "I am vicar of St. Peter's," he remarked, "I am a surrogate of the Diocese of London, and Rural Dean of Westminster. Until the other day I was an honorary chaplain to the King. For a few more hours I am a Prebendary of St. Paul's." This is a striking example of the way some clerics take up their crosses and follow their Saviour.

The triumph of the Women's Suffrage Movement is a victory for Freethought, and the belated recognition of the rights of women is a tribute to the pioneers from Mary Wollstonecraft to John Stuart Mill. The completeness of the present victory is shown by the attitude of the Bishops in the House of Lords, for these right reverend fathers-in-God have been compelled by the logic of events to admit at last that women are human beings.

Canon J. G. Hannay—"George A. Birmingham"—as reported in the Daily Mail, does not believe that the War has brought any profit to Christianity. "The parsons," he says, "have messed their job":—

> The War had not shown the nation, he said, to be in any way Christianized. This was what had come to the mind of the thinking man in the Army, according to his experience at the front: "If there's one for me it'll hit me, and I don't see that a man's religion makes much odds when there's high explosives knocking around."
> That a man should enjoy shouting "Onward, Christian soldiers," was no kind of evidence that he was a Christian soldier. Some hymns had quite as agreeable tunes as "Keep the home fires burning."
> Religion ought to have made Crusaders of our men. It seemed to have done no such thing. Never was there a greater contrast than between "Tommy," blasphemous and cheerful, and the knight of Mallory's chivalry at prayers before battle in a forest hermit's chapel.

But we only see Mallory's knights through a veil of romance. As a matter of fact, we have no doubt but that the Mediæval Christian knight was just a swashbuckling, foul-mouthed, lecherous ruffian. Our own Richard Cœur de Lion was not a bad specimen of this class.

Rev. Dr. Grtffith Jones says that much damage is being done the Churches and the cause of religion by members stampeding into the country in the case of air-raids. But what are they to do? If "Providence" attended to its business, it would at least see that its supporters were cared for. But it allows German bombs to drop about in the most promiscuous manner. Neither they nor "Providence" seem to pay any more attention to good Churchmen than they do to Atheists. And such gross negligence is quite inexcusable—from the religious point of view.

We take the following from Reynolds' of January 20:—

> Dear Gipsy,—Did you expect anybody to recognize you when you masqueraded in the Honours List of the British Empire Order as Rodney Smith, Esq.? Our old friend Ben Tillett has evolved into Mr. Benjamin Tillett on the Parliamentary Papers. It is very confusing. But now we have found you out. I heartily congratulate you on having collected £23,000 for the Y.M.C.A. huts.

In other words, Gipsy Smith, the vulgar blasphemer, gets—or rather buys—an honour for £23,000 of other people's money!

The minister of Melbourne Hall, Leicester, Rev. B. G. Gibbon, issues a circular to his supporters in which he says he finds "some people in our neighbourhood forsaking God, and renouncing both public worship and private prayer." We are very glad to hear it, and it bears out what we have said concerning the influence of the War on religious beliefs. Mr. Gibbon finds that, so far as the War is concerned, "nothing has happened inconsistent with the government of God as it is explained in the Bible." Naturally; as Heine said of God and foreigners, that's his trade. But even as it stands, Mr. Gibbon should reflect that the government of God as explained in the Bible is no more to the taste of millions than is the government of the Kaiser or the late Czar of Russia.

The appointment of Dr. Henson to the See of Hereford is causing some plain speaking in the press. The Daily News says that the Prime Minister's view is that "he has done the Established Church a signal service by making an appointment which gives much-needed strengthening, both in brain-power and courage, to the Bench of Bishops." The High Churchmen will remember Mr. Lloyd George in their prayers.

The clergy are not exempted from military service for nothing, and they are making the utmost use of their opportunities. In a letter to the President of the Sunday-School Union, the Archbishop of Canterbury writes: "We recognize to the full the vital importance of making right use of this solemn time in all our work with children and young people."

A newspaper paragraph states that a war-shrine at Ramsgate, destroyed by fanatics, has been replaced. How these Christians do love one another!

East Ham Corporation have taken over, and will cultivate, fifteen acres of a cemetery. Time will show whether "consecrated" ground is more productive than other earth.

"The world is a vile place," says Mr. James Douglas The remark is largely true of the Christian world, where bayonets bulk more largely than beatitudes.

Dr. Fort Newton, of the City Temple, London, says that if the Government has the right to conscript a man, it has the right to conscript his conduct. Unfortunately, if bigoted Christians were in the seat of authority, this might mean that men would be frog-marched to a place of worship.

When the War started the clergy and their followers were almost unanimous in describing the Germans as "Atheists" in spite of the fact that every German soldier bears the words "God with us" on part of his uniform, and that for centuries Germany has held a conspicuous place in European religion. Now the clergy are beginning to admit the orthodoxy of the Germans, and speak of her "official pastors." Official! The clergy are the very dutiful servants of the State in most countries.

The late Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, formerly pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and son of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, left estate of the value of £7,173. This sum should be sufficient to keep him out of heaven.

The Headmaster of Rugby, the Rev. A. A. David, deplores that in religious education there is too much insistence on the sufferings of Christ. Surely, to expect cheerfulness in the religion of the Man of Sorrows is as reasonable as to look for icebergs in hell.

The copyright of the popular song, "Eileen Alannah," was sold recently by auction for £1,051. The hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," fetched £235. Secular music appears to be a greater favourite with the public than the sacred variety.

The Irish Times, commenting on the sinking of the hospital ship Rewa by a German submarine, remarks that "It was the will of God that the weather permitted the saving of lives." From which one concludes it was the will of God that the ship should be torpedoed and that four of the crew should be killed. And in that case it would seem that the Germans were carrying out the will of God. We wish it were the will of God that something approaching common sense should enter the heads of his supporters.

For my part, let me have people about me who can smile," declares Sir Leo Money. To arrange this matter satisfactorily, Sir Leo had better avoid the society of folk who worship the Man of Sorrows.

The Westminster Gazette states that a book will shortly be published by "a well-known man who is a self-styled heretic," which deals with the insufficiency of Orthodoxy. Surely, such modesty is unnecessary when Christianity is in the melting-pot.

Lady Byron has avowed herself a Christian in the public press, and has declared that a man who votes against women's right to vote has no right to call himself a Christian. The lady doth protest too much. The Christian Church has always regarded woman as "the weaker vessel," and most advocates of sex equality have been as heterodox as the freethinking Lord Byron, who was an ancestor of her ladyship.

What a plentiful lack of humour some pious folk have! Harry Lauder, writing in the American Magazine on the death of his son, says that he has "two comforts always with me. And those comforts are God and my wife. We wonder if he blushed to make the association.

"A flying machine is a sacred thing," declares Lieut. A. P Thurston, an Air Board expert. We should like to hear the reply of those clergy whose churches have been smashed up by means of these "sacred" machines.

At the trial of Lieut. Aughuet, of the Belgian Army, on a charge of attempted murder, Mr. Justice Darling said that defendant had been acquitted by a court martial "on the plea that the devil counselled him, and that he acted under an irresistible force." This appears to suggest that Satan is still on active service.

In a striking article on "The War and the Churches," the Daily News says the clergy "have made no attempt to bridge the gulf between the warring nations. They have only sent up their cries to God to prove himself a German God, or a British God, a Prussian God, or an Austrian God." This is well put, but the discovery might have been made years ago.

Feltham magistrates have decided that a Mormon elder is a regular minister of religion, and so exempt from military service. The clerical umbrella is quite large enough when it shelters celibate Catholic priests and much-married Mormon elders.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 27, Swansea; February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 27, South Shields; February 3, Failsworth; February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester.

H. WRIGHT.—We have no copies of Facts Worth Knowing in stock. As you say, it was a useful pamphlet.

GUNNER G. LOVELL.—We are sending on a small parcel of literature for reading and distribution amongst your comrades.

PTE. F. PETTIT.—We hope that when this War is over soldiers will insist on their religious—or rather non-religious—opinions being respected. Pleased to know you receive the Freethinker regularly.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—H. H., 5s.; New Reader, 5s.; C. L. Knight (Rhodesia), £2; W. Beeton, 2s. 6d.

E. B.—Evidently a misprint. Thanks for cuttings.

D. G. DOLLERY.—We see nothing either hopeless or despairing in the cause we advocate. We are not hopeless, or we should not be trying to impress people with our views. And we certainly do not despair of either human reason or courage. The way may be hard, and progress not so rapid as one would wish, but progress is made, and that is an inspiration to fresh endeavour.

O. J. ROSS.—We are obliged for copy of your "Lord God" address. Quite a useful propagandist lecture.

W. P. JACOBS writes suggesting the need for an annotated edition of The Rubaiyat, which will explain all the allusive words and phrases used by Omar. Perhaps some of our readers may know of some such edition.

E. A. MACDONALD.—Received and shall appear. Thanks for good wishes.

TAB CAN writes:—"The Divine Comedy—The Hensley Henson row." A distinct hit.

A. MILLER.—Pleased to have your appreciation of last week's "Views."

E. PINDER.—The world would be much surprised if it knew all the Freethinkers abroad; and we can quite believe that John Noble was one of these unknown, or little known, heretics. Glad to have your opinion of the Freethinker as "top-hole."

WOULD Mrs. Hinley kindly communicate with Miss Vance, General Secretary N. S. S.?

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—F. W. Curle, 4s. 6d.; G. Bate, 1s.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Jan. 17) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures at Swansea. The afternoon lecture will be in the Elysium, High Street; in the evening in the Dockers' Hall, same building. The change of halls is due to the Elysium—the larger hall—not being available for both meetings; so friends will have to put up with a little crowding. It was hoped to arrange a debate between Mr. Cohen and a local clergyman during this visit, but the arrangements broke down. We understand, however, that some "official" opposition will be offered at the afternoon meeting. Good opposition is always welcome.

The new Southampton Branch of the N. S. S. made a good start last Sunday with two lectures from Mr. Cohen. There was a fair attendance in the morning, and a good one in the evening. Both lectures were listened to with the utmost appreciation, and there were many requests for an early return visit. There were also a number of new members enrolled. Mr. Rayner, a very old friend of the Movement in Southampton, officiated as chairman on both occasions.

We received a surprise visit last week from Mr. R. H. Rosetti, who was home on leave from the Western Front. His friends will be pleased to know, as we were pleased to learn, and also to see that he was looking quite "fit," although longing to be back once more in the ranks of our Army. Certainly no one will be more pleased than we shall to see him there. We were glad to have from him the same cheerful reports of the progress of freethinking ideas among the soldiers, and some very useful recruits for the Cause should be gained from this source when the War is over.

Mr. Lloyd delivers two lectures to-day (Jan. 27) in the Victoria Hall, Fowler Street, South Shields. The afternoon lecture is at 3, the evening one at 6.30. We hope that Tyneside "saints" will make a special note of these meetings, and bring a Christian friend along with them.

For some time—ever since the War started, in fact—we have made it a practice to send out literature to men at the Front whenever we knew it would be acceptable, and as far as our means permitted. And we have every reason to believe that this literature has been well circulated and well read. Mr. N. L. Evans has now placed at the disposal of the Pioneer Press the sum of £10, to be used in sending literature to the troops, in memory of his son, Lance-cpl. Evans, whose death is regretfully recorded in another column. Lance-cpl. Evans was a very ardent Freethinker, and his father believes that in doing this he is paying a tribute to his son's memory of the kind he would have desired. We shall be glad to have from our readers the names and addresses of any soldiers to whom literature would be acceptable, either for reading or for distribution. We have some names on our list, but are open to receive more.

This from East Africa:—

> DEAR MR. COHEN,—I feel that I must write and express my thanks for the many pleasant hours that the dear old Freethinker has given me, not only here, but also in dear old blighty. I have only just got the July issue—a bit behind times—but welcome all the same, and I notice in your issue of July 22, 1917, that some one has stated that you have to declare a religion on joining up, let me state that you do not. I know from experience that the recruiting authorities try all they can to make you have a myth, but, if you are firm, you need not take one. I, myself, joined up in 1914, and was attested and sworn in as a Freethinker. I have had a good few hard fights to maintain it, but have managed it so far, and always will. But here no one bothers about it at all. You see there are so many religions that if they remembered one, it might prove awkward, so they just let things slide, and the parson is looked on as just one of us.
> As for the idea of God, I do not believe it enters the average Tommy's head. I have seen a few thousands in my time, but have never noticed that religion makes much headway with them, rather the other way about, that Tommy is making too much headway for religion. The way Tommy Atkins looks at the parson is, how many fags has he got, and after that question is answered interest ceases.
> I think I can claim to be the first to introduce the Freethinker into this part of the world, and it is making headway, can always give it away, the fellows are anxious to get it, and while I have been in the Army, I have made that my plan as soon as I have read it to hand it over to my friend.—Yours sincerely, A. MATTHEWS.

The course of lectures at the West Central Hall, Tottenham Court Road, is concluded to-day with an address by Mr. A. D. Howell Smith. The lecture commences at 3.15, and we hope there will be a crowded hall. Admission is free.

Good audiences are still the rule at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, we are pleased to learn, and we hope that local Freethinkers will continue to give the meetings the financial support they deserve. The lecturer this evening (Jan. 27) is Mr. Clifford Williams. His subject is "Freethoaght v. Christianity." The theatre ought to be again well filled.

We have received the following letter from Mr. Verinder, who has acted as chairman of the Committee of Protest in the fight with the L.C.C., and to whose unflagging labours the Committee is so deeply indebted :—

> SIR, — I am asked by the Joint Committee of Protest against Prohibition of Sale of Literature in L.C.C. Parks to send you their grateful thanks for the valuable help you have given them in opening your columns to their appeal for funds. May we also thank those of your readers who so promptly and generously responded? The cheque you have just sent me has enabled us to clear off all our remaining liabilities.
> Following upon the unanimous decision given in our favour by a strong Divisional Court in the case of Rex v. L.C.C. (ex parte Corrie), the Council has granted the permit which Mrs. Corrie asked for, on behalf of the West London Branch of the League of the Blind; and the Parks Committee has drafted Regulations under which permits may be issued to other individuals and associations. Copies of these Regulations may be obtained from the Chief Officer, Parks Department, 11, Regent Street, S.W., 1.
> We believe that the Parks Committee is now honestly desirous of restoring the conditions that existed previous to their unfortunate action at the end of May, 1916, and we are sure that all the Societies interested will do all in their power to make the new arrangements work, as the old ones admittedly did, smoothly and without friction.

The annual meeting of the Leicester Secular Society was held at the Secular Hall on Sunday, January 13, 1918. Mr. Sydney A. Gimson (President) in the chair had an excellent balance-sheet to present to the members, showing an income of £570, which the committee had found no difficulty in spending. Two series of lectures had been given during 1917, and many new members have been made. The Society has forty members serving in the Army, and two have been killed in France. A resolution impressing the importance of confining school instruction to secular subjects only was passed at the meeting. Mr. J. T. Lloyd was present and gave a short address.

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

WE closed the fund rather abruptly last week, in consequence of a note from the Treasurer of the Committee, Mr. F. Verinder, to the effect that enough had been subscribed. The bill from solicitor and counsel proved to be extremely moderate, and the payment by the London County Council of the Committee's costs to the extent of £78 15s. decreased wonderfully the sum to be raised. So the Committee concludes its labours, for the present, having fully achieved its purpose, and cleared itself of all liabilities. But the Committee has decided not to disband, but to keep itself in being in case it is needed. From the Freethinker Fund £41 1s. 8d. was realized, which has been paid over to the treasurer, and for which we hold the receipt. A statement of the Committee's income and expenditure is being prepared, and will be sent to anyone interested in the matter. We have now only to thank our readers for their support, and to congratulate them on the result.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Orb of Day.

II.

ON our planet we are indebted to some mode of combustion for all our artificial heat. The phenomena of burning or combustion occur in consequence of the chemical union between the oxygen of the surrounding atmosphere and carbon, or some other inflammable substance. Hence, a definite quantity of heat is evolved from a definite quantity of combustible material. Obviously, if the sun's heat were maintained in this manner its heat and effulgence would soon expire. The sun is composed of many chemical elements, but even if we were to assume that the solar orb is made up of oxygen and hydrogen in proportions in which they combine to form water on our globe, their thermal powers would prove hopelessly insufficient for this purpose. It has been ascertained by means of experiment that the sum of heat generated by the union of definite weights of oxygen and hydrogen will exceed that evolved through the combustion of corresponding weights of any other substances. Were then, the solar mass thus constituted, it is known how large a percentage of the sun's volume would be compelled to combine each hour to produce the quantity of heat hourly radiated by that orb. This calculation discloses the fact that the heat of our luminary, were it sustained by combustion, would be exhausted in the course of 3,000 years. This result places the hypothesis of combustion completely out of court.

That bodies which yield heat must ultimately contract appears to be a principle of universal application. The sun perpetually occupied as it is in pouring forth heat into space must consequently undergo a diminution in bulk. But solar contraction proceeds so slowly in comparison with the sun's enormous diameter of 863,000 miles, that in 40,000 years it has probably decreased nearly 4,000 miles only. This diminution in an orb so vast could only be detected by delicate telescopic measurement. As a matter of fact, were two suns suspended in the sky, one with a diameter of 863,000 miles, and the other with a disc measuring 859,000 miles, no difference could be established by any ordinary test.

Helmholtz contended that this lessening of the solar diameter, which appears to proceed at the rate of sixteen inches daily, completely accounts for the sustentation of the sun's radiation. The enormous sum of heat thus evolved will enable the sun to send forth his heat for countless ages to come. But there is unquestionably a limit to this constant contraction, for were it continued indefinitely the sun would shrink to a mere speck. So far as science can determine, the solar globe is a vaporous body. Neither the telescope nor the photograph reveals anything save volumes of gas in which clouds and vapours are suspended. The temperature of these outer gaseous regions, although immensely high, is probably feeble in comparison with that of the solar centre. This intense internal heat would not merely melt but immediately vaporize the most refractory substances. But it is important to remember that the stupendous condensing pressure to which these solar substances are subjected must so compress them that their density is probably as great as the density of any terrestrial material. Indeed, our terrestrial terms—gases, liquids, and solids—lose all those distinctions so familiar to us, when related to substances subjected to such pressure as prevails in the solar interior.

A far-reaching factor in the maintenance of the sun's heat is the force of gravitation. When attracted by the earth a body falls towards it, and such a body, when falling vertically, commences with a velocity of about 32 feet per second. In the vicinity of the sun, however, owing to that globe's vastly greater mass, the gravitational pull is more than twenty-seven times as large as terrestrial gravitation at our earth's surface. Therefore the solar luminary will impart to any molecule near its surface a velocity of some 864 feet per second, and any body, big or little, will tend to approach the sun at this speed. It is immaterial at what velocities particles situated in the sun's neighbourhood are moving, or whether they are travelling to the right or left of the solar surface, upwards or downwards, or even when deflected by collisions with other molecules, the attraction of the sun's mass will tend to drag them towards him with a velocity of 864 feet per second. The velocity of the particles will, therefore, be accelerated. Thus the decision is reached that "the gain of energy by the molecules through gravitation towards the sun compensates for their losses in virtue of radiation." These considerations are held to remove the main difficulty concerning the sun's ability to sustain his tremendous outflow of heat.

Various methods have been adopted for determining the sun's remoteness and mass. But, perhaps, the gravitational process has most to commend it. The solar diameter must be many thousands of times that of our planet. And, although the sun is largely composed of vaporous matter, its mass is necessarily hugely superior to our earth's mass. Having secured the requisite knowledge of the leading physical characteristics of the solar globe, an estimate may be formed of its mass. This ascertained, startling as it may appear, the sun's distance from the earth is at once revealed.

Beginning with a knowledge of the earth's weight, our neighbouring planets, Mars and Venus, aid us in estimating the solar mass. Mars wanders round the sun in an ellipse beyond the earth's orbit. Now, were Mars the only member of the sun's family of worlds, his path would remain unchanged from century to century as he journeys around the solar orb. The other planetary bodies, however, produce perturbations in the orbit pursued by Mars, and in these the earth participates. The sun is, of course, the chief attraction which retains Mars in his orbit; but the earth also exercises an influence in deflecting the ruddy planet from the path it would otherwise pursue. The perturbations to which Mars is subjected prove that our globe's attraction is distinctly appreciable.

Were Mars influenced by the sun's attraction exclusively, the planet would move in an ellipse around its primary. But owing to the disturbances set up by the earth—and these alone we now consider, though several others are involved—the orbit of Mars is really one of considerable eccentricity. As a consequence, the distance of Mars from the sun varies to a greater degree than the distances presented by Venus and Jupiter.

In 1877 and 1892, Mars stood in opposition to the earth at a time when that planet was at perihelion—in that part of its orbit which lies nearest to the sun—and it sparkled in the sky with a brilliant red light. Without entering into complicated mathematical details, we may safely assert that it has been satisfactorily shown that the earth's mass is utterly insignificant when compared with that of the sun. If we assume provisionally that the solar mass is 100,000 times that of our globe, a calculation may be made on this assumption as to the extent of the earth's perturbing influences on Mars. Investigation, however, demonstrates that the earth's attraction causes a much smaller disturbance than that demanded if the sun is only 100,000 times the mass of the earth. Thus far, observations have not been sufficiently prolonged to weigh the sun quite accurately by this method. But there is no question that the earth's mass forms about 1-324,000th part of that of the solar globe. Moreover, once the gravitational pull of the sun on our earth and the other bodies of the solar system has been determined, the precise distance of our luminary stands revealed.

As we have seen, the mathematical astronomer, when he wishes to weigh celestial globes, must ascertain the attraction exerted by the various bodies on each other. This gravitational pull is proportional to the mass of the attracting body. The term "mass" is equivalent to quantity of matter, and thus, in ordinary circumstances, may be regarded as weight. And the astronomer really weighs a planet or sun on the same principle as a salesman when he weighs a ham in a spring balance As Professor Newcomb puts it:—

> When the butcher picks the ham up, he feels the pull of the ham towards the earth. When he hangs it on the hook, this pull is transferred from his hand to the spring of the balance. The stronger the pull, the further the spring is pulled down. What he reads on the scale is the strength of the pull. You know that this pull is simply the attraction of the earth on the ham. But, by a universal law of force, the ham attracts the earth exactly as much as the earth does the ham. So what the butcher really does is to find out how much or how strongly the ham attracts the earth, and he calls that pull the weight of the ham. On the same principle, the astronomer finds the weight of a body by finding how strong is its attractive pull on some other body.

Perhaps it will be well to point out the distinction between mass and weight, as the inability to grasp this difference has proved the source of much metaphysical confusion. The weight of substances is subject to variation. An object which weighs thirty pounds in London would weigh an extra ounce in Greenland, and nearly an ounce less than thirty pounds at the equator. These fluctuations are due to the fact that our planet is not a perfect sphere. Weight is entirely a question of gravity; and as the moon is a smaller and lighter orb than the earth, a body weighing thirty pounds in London would weigh five pounds only on our satellite. For similar reasons, an object weighting thirty pounds on our own globe would, owing to the gigantic gravitational pull of the sun, attain a weight of 800 pounds on that luminary. Thus, the astronomer does not refer to the weight of a body, but to its mass. The weight is relative only, but the mass is a constant quantity.

Although the exact distance of the sun is not yet known, the man of science is steadily nearing a definite determination of its remoteness in space. Measurement by parallax—the determination of the sun's distance by triangulation—yields a distance of 92,908,000 miles. Observations of the lunar motions give a distance of 92,008,000; the earth's mass returns a result of 93,113,000 miles; while the measurement obtained from the velocity of light furnishes a total of 93,075,000 miles. Allowing for the magnitude of the task, the close agreement among the figures obtained through methods so widely divergent serves as a guarantee for the general soundness of astronomical conclusions. Again, the wonderful accuracy with which solar and lunar eclipses, and various other celestial and terrestrial phenomena, are predicted many months, or even years, in advance of their occurrence, necessitate the conclusion that the science of astronomy is certain in the course of centuries to become perfectly exact in all its multitudinous departments.

The Cairn Revisited

ON

"Thanksgiving Day," January 6, 1918.

We had left a Freethinker in the canister in the Cairn. The "Visitors Book" acclaimed the fact that, in the interval, quite a party had been there. One had written on the margin of the lonely pioneer journal: "Such papers as this are got up for a purpose; so I leave this copy here in case of extreme emergency." What delicate sarcasm! what magnanimity! Above all, what uncanny acuteness in the inference that such papers were "got up" for a "purpose"? What could one write in reply but "Thanks, awfully, old man!" And on the book we wrote our—

Digitized by Google

"THANKSGIVING."

From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be,—
That no life lives for ever,
That dead men rise up never,
That even the weariest river
Must somewhere find the sea.

—Swinburne.

After which we felt comforted, descended a little, and sat in the lee of an ancient whin (furze) that sighed in soothing sympathy in the boundless awe and liberty of the moors. The low brow, and pitted eyes, and broken semblance of the ancient face in stone was in our thoughts, and seemed to whisper in the wind. And our mother—that most mellow, most loving heart of humankind—we felt, ought to have approached us over the bleached and pathless heath, out of the mists of many years, and murmured to us gently again as in the long ago! But, no; only the memory. But the memory was divine! The moor-fowl derided our sweetly serious musings. They rather deprecated our visit, and flew round us all too near. Why, our large walking-stick might have been a gun! Their pretty breasts were made to receive the hissing hail. So thinks the sportsman, secure at the right end of his weapon. "Bick, bick, birr!" "Hurry up! Hurry up!" "Be quiet! be quiet!" "Huh!" "Scut!" in throaty dissonance, but in the true language of Nature and the wilds. What a friend they had in us; but they were right to be wary. What a friend man has in the Freethinker; but he is timid as the birds, or savage as the slayer. The visitors to the Cairn will find that not only the paper has been there, but the Freethinker himself; and in time they may learn the significance of that.

On the sea, past black and lowering clouds, fell a faint glow of dull silver—a little hope in a murky world of despair. This also is significant.

FREETHOUGHT AND BIRTH CONTROL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—May I suggest to your readers interested in the recent Malthusian controversy appearing in your columns the desirability of reading Malthus on the Principles of Population first hand. The present writer, in reading Malthus, found many of the misconceptions due to deriving opinions second hand disappear, notably, the very prevalent idea that the Malthusian doctrine is advocated with a view to bolstering up the privileges of the wealthy classes. This view, I think, will be found untenable. Mr. Henry George's famous book, Progress and Poverty, contains, probably, the best attempt at refutation extant, and the book is well worth its place on any Freethinker's bookshelf. Although a student and admirer of Henry George, I think he failed to overthrow the Malthusian doctrine. Your correspondent, Robert Arch's, reference to Charles Bradlaugh's inability to understand Socialism is the difficulty of many, as there seem to be as many brands of this creed as of Christianity. Bradlaugh, however, was not isolated in that respect among the intellectuals of Freethought—Huxley, Mill, Ingersoll, and Foote, to name a few were in the same dilemma. Marcus Aurelius's advice given on the frontispiece of Poogress and Poverty—"Make for thyself a definition of the thing that is presented to thee so as to see distinctly what kind of a thing it is in its substance, in its nudity, in its complete entirety," is sadly needed advice to the people who call themselves Socialists. But if it were understood, would not Socialism, or any reform, in the words of Mill—"let slip the reins that hitherto restrained population," and an equality of misery be the result. At the same time, Malthusians should not forget that the law of rent is equally with the law of population a barrier to economic progress, and if birth control resulted in economic betterment, would it not merely let slip the reins that hitherto restrained the cupidity of the landowners? I have no doubt that the Malthusian doctrine, as Dr. Drysdale puts it, is destructive of the myths of theology and of Socialism as commonly understood. Malthusianism seems to have received its recent impetus and revival from the present War, which, probably, would not have occurred had Germany only half her present population.

S. H. LAYCOCK.

SIR,—I have been intensely interested in the correspondence circling round Malthus's doctrine of limitation and its application or opposition to Socialism.

The disciples of Malthus have been most emphatic in their asserting of the soundness of his doctrine. But what surprises one is that not one writer has, so far, pleaded for limitation of the family on moral grounds. Robert Arch accepts the doctrine with reservation: it is good and useful for some—those who can afford to purchase preventatives—but for "the poor," whom, he says, have but two pleasures, "convivial drinking" and "connubial intercourse," and cannot afford the preventatives, to go to them with the propaganda is vain and useless.

But does it not occur to these correspondents that it is time connubial intercourse was lifted a little higher; that it ceased to be looked upon as a pleasure, and that it became what it is—simply a creative function? Cannot the Malthus disciples weave into their propaganda the fact that it is hurtful to the parents' health, and to their children's health, that intercourse should be indulged in indiscriminately? I think so.

Is it not time the followers of Malthus lifted their doctrine a little higher, and commenced to teach that sexual intercourse, used for any purpose but its true one, is a violation of Nature's law, and therefore immoral? The Socialist State of my dreams is peopled by men and women all accepting that.

ALICE PEACHEY.

SIR,—While agreeing in the main with Mr. Arch's letter, there are a few points that seem to call for criticism. By inference, we are left to understand that birth-restriction, as it operates amongst the upper and middle classes, is highly commendable; but for the lower classes, Socialism is the only cure for their ills. The statement that their "pleasures" are limited to "convivial drinking and connubial intercourse" is surely a trifle overdrawn. It is true that individuals may be found in this class of whom this may be said without fear of contradiction; but this type is to be found in every class of society. Generally speaking, this class has, I believe, hopes and aspirations in common with the rest of humanity that raises it above the level of the brute. To those of this class possessing such hopes the value of the Malthusian teaching compares more than favourably with that of the Socialist for this reason—that it offers an immediate improvement in the economic condition of the individual; or, at any rate, shows him how he may strengthen his position in the struggle with the forces that threaten to enslave him by restricting his offspring. Compare this with the prospect of the ideal State that is to be realized in the distant future. He and his offspring will all be dead, and it is not to be wondered at if some of us regard the result of Malthusian teaching among these people as being capable of producing something more tangible than "vain talk." Further, the degree of success with which the Malthusian meets will be shared in by the Socialist, who will find minds better fitted to grasp and grapple with the economic evils as they are exposed to them. On these grounds, it appears a little premature for the Socialist to indulge in mud-slinging.

Digitized by Google

The possibilities in food production may be all he claims for them; but people desire to obtain the best standard of life for the present, and they can't exist on possibilities. I agree with Mr. Arch that Malthusianism is not destructive of Socialism, but can see no reason for decrying the doctrine because an individual here and there uses it as a weapon against Socialism.

J. GRAHAM.

[We have received other letters on this topic, including a reply from Dr. Drysdale, which we are compelled to hold over until next week.—ED.]

A PLEA FOR JUSTICE.

SIR,—Now that some Conscientious Objectors are being released from prison, may I crave your space in order to give publicity to the case of Emanuel Ribeiro?

Ribeiro had struggled for a number of years to bring up six children, and in the process he developed certain unfashionable ideas, while his thoughts, at any rate, if not his actions, were allowed to run along on free lines until the War came. It is almost superfluous to mention that he was for fifteen years an opponent, and a very forceful opponent, to all and every condition which makes for war. At any rate, he thought that, as he pleaded as a Conscientious Objector, he might have been allowed some consideration; but he was too uncompromising. Arrested and handed over on Jan. 17, he was sent to Bury Barracks, where they put food before him; but, disliking and disagreeing with everything pertaining to the glory of war, he declined. From there he was removed to where he is now, and forcibly fed. For twelve long months he has endured this treatment, and he is allowed to see no one but his wife and an Army "chaplain," whom Ribeiro has sent about his business, but who insisted on coming, until Ribeiro wrote to him, politely but firmly, telling him he had no use for him.

I would say that this man, an admirer of Ferrer and a descendant of the people who produced Ferrer—or, perhaps, it would be better to say that he is a descendant of the consequences of the Spanish Inquisition—is determined that nothing, nothing, can break him. No one can buy him, and he is prepared to suffer, and maybe die, for the principles he holds dear.

These facts have been published in the Guardian, Labour Leader, etc. One man, one woman, and six bright, intelligent little children going through these tortures because the father has a conscience and officialdom has none! He desires no advertisement. All he wants is freedom of thought. Ribeiro has shown his adherence to principle. It is for the Government to see that justice is done.

THE EVIDENCE OF THE CHURCHES.

SIR,—I asked the following clergymen if they could give me any evidence for the existence of God.

The Archbishop of Canterbury answered: "Demonstration in these matters is not to be looked for."

The Rev. E. A. Burroughs: "It is not much use discussing questions of colour with the colour-blind."

Father Bernard Vaughan: "I see God in everything here, and hope to see everything in God hereafter, the difference between us is the difference between sight and blindness."

The Natural Religion, p. 56, by the Rev. Vernon Staley, with a preface by the Rev. J. R. Illingworth, M.A., Bampton Lecturer: "In the ordinary acceptation of the word, it may be granted that there is no absolutely convincing proof of God's existence. It may be doubted if any actual demonstration of the existence of a Divine Being can be adduced."

Lord Hugh Cecil says: "Belief in Hell brings before us God once more as the Father of all mercies, not in spite of, but because, he is the Architect of Hell."

Away with such debasing superstition.

E. C. F. JAMES.

A new book bears the title, God and the Soldier, and professes to give an account of the religion of the fighting men "as interpreted by two famous preachers." We should greatly prefer to read Atkins's own account of his religious views.

Obituary.

Peculiarly sad circumstances attended the death of Lance-cpl. L. H. Evans, the only son of Mr. N. J. Evans, of Palmer's Green, N. A delicate boy from his birth, it was only by the exercise of the greatest care that he reached manhood, and those who knew him were greatly surprised that a medical officer should ever have passed him for general service. For about twelve months of his Army life he was stationed on the South coast, and, being fortunate enough to be under the command of considerate and humane officers, suffered no ill. Then he was transferred to a Scottish regiment, and sent to the South-West of Ireland. Here he contracted a cold, but was ordered abroad, and towards the end of December came home on embarkation leave. He reached home very ill, and was taken—against his father's wishes—to the Edmonton Military Hospital. There, after three or four days, the doctor diagnosed double pneumonia, which eventuated in death on January 8. A sincere and earnest Freethinker, he could claim among his converts his own father. Quiet and retiring in disposition, and of studious habits, he never missed a chance of dropping a word in season for Freethought. His opinions were formed slowly, but once formed, were clear and definite. At the hospital he faced his doom with all the courage of a soldier on the battle-field. He was conscious to within five minutes of his death, and a few hours before he died said, "I will fight to the last gasp." He was cremated, in accordance with his own desire, at Golder's Green on January 11. One cannot help feeling that the placing of of a man like L. H. Evans, with so delicate a constitution, was a blunder. His power of vital resistance was small, and he was certain to fall before the first assault on his health. We extend our sincere sympathy to his father, whom death has robbed of a son, a companion, and a friend.

Society News.

West Central Hall, London.—Mr. Lloyd was in his best form on Sunday afternoon, January 20, and delivered a most inspiring lecture. Opposition was furnished by Mr. Noah Bailey of Christian Evidence notoriety, who adopted the well-known Christian Evidence tactics of partial quotation. These were instantly demolished by Mr. Lloyd, whose wide-reading and excellent memory, make him more than equal to such attempts. The chair was taken by Dr. Binnie Dunlop. —E. M. V.

North London Branch N.S.S.—In spite of very bad weather there was a large gathering at the St. Pancras Reform Club on Thursday to hear the debate between Mr. Collette Jones and Mr. Horace Leaf. Mr. Leaf, though an excellent speaker and practised debater, completely failed to establish the contention that man survived death, and evaded the points put forward by Mr. Jones. On Sunday Mr. Miller delivered an excellent address on the "Religion of Russia and the Revolution," which was followed with great interest. To-day, January 27, Mr. H. V. Storey is enquiring "What is Now the Chief Duty of the Freethought Party?" and, as opinions may differ widely on this subject, we hope for a good attendance and an excellent open debate —H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec.

Manchester Branch N. S. S.—Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner delivered two lectures here on Sunday last to a highly appreciative audience, which included several of the old followers of Charles Bradlaugh. In the evening, interest was added to the proceedings by Mrs. Bonner "naming" a two-months'-old little girl. We wish Rosa Jean Foster, the little lady in question, every success in her future life. There was a good sale of literature, and several applications for membership.—H. BLACK, Hon. Sec.

THE CHURCH'S LOSS.

Colonel: "You're a thorough bad egg, your conduct's outrageous. How you ever came to be an officer, I don't know."

Subaltern (bitterly): "No, sir. If it hadn't been for this beastly War, I should have been in Holy Orders long ago."

Views and Opinions.

Wanted, an Epidemic.

If honesty of speech and sanity of thought were to become epidemic on the widest conceivable scale, how long would organized Christianity endure? The period would hardly be a lengthy one. For Christianity persists in this country because clear thinking and honest speaking so seldom run together. On the one side we have those who never subject their religious beliefs to a careful examination, and so do not feel how indefensible they are; and on the other hand we have those who seek to veil their dissent from Christianity by language which conceals rather than reveals their true opinions. A belief in Deity means a belief in a vague abstraction which bears no reasonable relation to what people understand by God. Faith in Christ means a belief that he was a good man, a well-intentioned social reformer. Or people say they believe in religion, but not in theology; in Christianity, but not in the Churches. And so on through a number of formulæ, all of which serve to disguise the fact that, while there is no real belief left, there is wanting the courage to avow the fact.

Some Questions of "Ignotus."

There is not, nor is there likely to be, an epidemic of clear thinking and honest speaking in relation to religion; but, on the whole, the complaint grows. And there is an instance before us while we write, which, indeed, is the cause of our writing. For some time past the Manchester City News has made a practice of publishing some exceedingly well-written articles on religious subjects by a writer who veils his personality under the pen-name of "Ignotus." These articles have attracted much attention, and they are now reprinted in book form.[1] No claim to originality is made by "Ignotus." It expresses, says the author, "all the doubts, fears, surmisings, defiances, excuses, surrenders, that are associated with the many religions of mankind." The value of the book is that it is symptomatic. All that "Ignotus" says has been said over and over again in these pages in an even more drastic and less compromising form. The appearance of these articles in the columns of a daily paper, with their subsequent reissue in book form, is evidence of the growth of our opinions and of the efficacy of our propaganda. For the newspaper press is abnormally sensitive to the pressure of public opinion. It publishes only what is more or less acceptable to its readers; and the real success of our persistent work is seen, not so much in actual organization, as in the extent to which we force the outside world to adopt the main ideas for which Freeth nkers have fought and suffered.

Miracles.

The Churches are empty, and they are empty because people have lost, or are losing, faith in those things for which the Churches stand. That is the burden of The Questions of Ignotus, and in defence of his thesis he brings an unanswerable indictment against current Christianity. Here is a specimen of "Ignotus" in his assault on the belief in miracles:—

> A miracle, despite all the arguments of modern apologists, must be supernatural.....Abandon that claim, and what remains? Why trouble to talk about miracles at all? Why declare that Moses, Aaron, Elijah, Job, and even the Messiah himself, and all his Apostles, were different from other men if they could not do more than other men?.....As long as superstition exists, miracles linger. When science comes in, miracles go out.

Now, that is a good thumping knock at miracles, and it is one to which the Churches have really no reply. Two or three writers do attempt to reply to "Ignotus," and these are published with the original articles. But they are wide of the mark. For they fail to realize that neither the acceptance nor the rejection of miracles is a question of evidence. It is only a matter of historical psychology. Given a certain low stage of culture and belief in the miraculous is universal. As Spinoza said, anything is possible because nothing is certain. With advancing certainty the realm of possibility contracts. To-day we know why people believed in miracles. We know also why they outgrew the belief. We do not argue that dead men were not brought to life, or that water was not turned into wine. We know such things never did and never will happen. As "Ignotus" says, "Common sense gives the death-blow to the supernatural, and grown men emerge from dim superstitions and the mystery of the marvellous just as children grow too wise for fairydom." * * *

The Truth About Religion.

The Questions of Ignotus does not claim to be a systematic treatise on religion, but there is plenty of evidence that the author has read widely and thoroughly. Witness the following on the origin of religion:—

> The religion of primitive man originated mainly, if not wholly in fear. He experienced pain, he beheld the mystery of death; he wondered whence the one pro> ceeded and how it might be averted; and he dimly speculated on the meaning of death, and the possibility of an after existence with rewards and punishments. He seemed to be the sport of gods and demons. Gradually a crude system of ethics was evolved, and in his desire to placate the demons and win the favour of the gods he decided on a course of life which he deemed would be pleasing to them.....If he thought the gods and demons would delight in blood, he gave these blood; preferably that of his enemies or of those who did not think as he did."

That kind of writing is much to be preferred to the vague foolishness written about man's yearning for companionship with God. Fear and ignorance are the true mother of the gods of primitive life, and our own gods, howsoever refined, are their lineal descendants, and have no better claim to reality. And he who knows how the gods came into existence is in no doubt as to the conditions of their departure. That which ignorance breeds knowledge destroys. The tree of knowledge was the only one, the fruit of which God commanded man not to eat. To eat of that tree is always fatal—to the gods.

An Exchange of Errors.

But while quite appreciating much that "Ignotus" writes, we do not at all appreciate the distinction he draws between religion and theology, nor his laudation of an ideal Christianity "as taught in Galilee." There can be no religion without a theology, that is, if religion is to be of use to anyone. If religion consists in the belief in God and a future life, theology is, after all, only a reasoned statement of man's assumed relations to God and a future state, and if he believes in these things, man is certain to argue them out, and in that case we have a theology. And the ideal, moralizing Christianity of Galilee, which could "unite in morals, virtue, and hopes the whole rational world," is as much a myth as anything that "Ignotus" throws overboard. Putting on one side the fact that the Jesus Christ of the New Testament is an obviously mythical figure, the purpose of primitive Christianity was as far as is possible from that of uniting people in virtue and hopes and rational endeavour. The Jesus of the New Testament is saturated in supernaturalism. He is supernaturally born, he works miracles, he believes that epilepsy and insanity are caused by supernatural agency, he has supernatural visitations, and his aim is to save men from the terrors of a supernatural world. There was not a superstition of the ancient world against which early Christianity set itself. It accepted all, and it strengthened many. The Christianity which makes much of a moral life and of social Christianity is not primitive at all. It is a concession to modern forces too strong for Christianity to altogether crush. If "common sense gives the death-blow to the supernatural," this is as true of the supernatural New Testament Jesus as of other supernaturalisms. And once this goes, we have no other Jesus and no other primitive Christianity that the world will trouble about for long.

A Defence of Thomas Paine.

"Ignotus" has a very interesting chapter on Foreign Missions, which contains a deserved condemnation on this greatest of modern Christian impostures. And there is a quiet humour in his pointing out the folly of sending missionaries to convert Jews abroad when we have so many at home, with that "very obstinate case," the Chief Rabbi. There is also a fine defence of Thomas Paine, and a rebuke to the slanders on great Freethinkers, which we cannot forbear quoting:—

> Think of the lies that have been built up on the dead bodies of renowned unbelievers. Think of the slanders on dying men—how Voltaire passed away in a torment of remorse; how Paine died drunk and blaspheming; how Renan recanted; how Huxley repented in his last hours of all that he had said and done in his life of thought and research.....I think of Thomas Paine..... I wonder what foul deeds this miscreant committed? It happens that I have his biography before me, and I find that he was a humanitarian, a hero on the battlefield, a valiant reformer, a high-minded philosopher, a self-denying practitioner of the Golden Rule, one who loved his neighbour, and devoted his strength to, and risked his life for, his fellow-men.....Paine was the author of the sublime appeal to the American nation to abolish slavery, and he fought heroically that the black man's fetters should be struck off.....But he wrote the Age of Reason, and "Tom" Paine, the righteous man, has ever since been marked out for unsparing condemnation by other righteous men, who forgot the Christian precepts of mercy, toleration, and forgiveness.

We know not by what right mercy, toleration, and forgiveness are called Christian precepts. Christians did not originate them, and it has practised them even less than other religions that might be named. But we are left wondering why a man, such as "Ignotus," who has clearly surrendered everything distinctively Christian, should still cling to the name! Far better to make a clear break, and join the growing army of men and women who find in humanity the inspiration for, and the reward of, their finest endeavours.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Newest Apologetic.

I.

THERE is evidently a strong feeling abroad among Christian teachers that their religion stands in great need at present of a fresh defence. No apologia of the past meets the requirements of to-day. Theological defenders, like the late Professor A. B. Bruce, and philanthropic champions, like Mr. C. L. Brace, author of the once popular work, Gesta Christi, are now completely out of date, and there is a general cry for some effective confutation of the anti-Christian arguments which now seem to be exerting such a mighty influence throughout the length and breadth of Christendom. In our own land, in particular, this need is most keenly felt; and we are informed that, at the instance of the Christian Evidence Society, a series of evidential books is being drawn up, one of which, The Achievements of Christianity, by the Rev. J. K. Mozley, B.D., and published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, is now in our hands. This little volume, of less than a hundred pages, is described as a popular but scholarly answer to the question: "Has the World Been Made Better by Christianity?" The author bears an honoured name in the theological world; and in a short review in the Church Times it was pronounced an exceptionally able and efficient piece of work. It must be candidly admitted that Mr. Mozley is, on the whole, one of the fairest apologists we have ever come across; and yet there is no escape from the impression that he is playing the part of a special pleader who is professionally holding a brief for Christianity. He warns us against expecting a perfect apologetic on the score that the Christian record is woefully incomplete, as well as "far too complex to allow, even within its limits, of the immediate emergence of an apologia for the Christian faith." He tells us that the historical reforms, which in Gesta Christi are proudly recited as directly due to Christianity, "certainly look well on paper," but fail to carry conviction to any fair-minded reader. Side by side with such vaunted reforms the Christian Church must shoulder the burdens of religious intolerance, the Inquisition, the religious wars, and, in fact, all the things done by Christians which appear specially scandalous." Mr. Mozley is also much juster in his reference to the pre-Christian Pagan world than most of his brethren. He says:—

> There has been a reaction from the picture drawn by Matthew Arnold, how:
> On that hard Pagan world disgust
> And secret loathing fell;
> Deep weariness and sated lust
> Made human life a hell—
> and there has been a tendency to insist on the amount of solid personal worth and quiet domestic happiness to be found in the Empire, especially in the provinces, which were less corrupt than Rome.

We desire to give Mr. Mozley due credit for the fairness he displays, however reluctantly. It is truly refreshing to find him characterizing as "over-lavish" Brace's ascription to Christianity of "improvements and humanities which any unbeliever in Christianity, who at the same time confessed himself a believer in progress, could easily attribute to the tendency of the human heart to improve." Again, one rejoices at the frank admission that "the sharp divergence sometimes drawn between the Christian spirit and the Christian Church may be held to lead to the conclusion that the Christian spirit is only a specialized representation of the universal spirit of kindness and benevolence." We congratulate Mr. Mozley on his candour and courage, and only regret the absence of such noble qualities from the works of most other apologists.

At the same time, our own sense of fairness compels us to declare that our author's fairness is more apparent than real. Take the following sample:—

> It was in virtue of the faith of Christ, and of that alone, that the position of women was bettered, and respect for women increased, in the later Roman Empire and in the dark ages that followed, that the exposition of children was fiercely combated, and that slavery was practically extinct in Europe by the fourteenth century (pp. xiii., xiv.).

We deliberately contend that on those three points Mr. Mozley is entirely mistaken. On the subject of slavery he is altogether at sea. We do not know what he means by saying "that slavery was practically extinct in Europe by the fourteenth century" in virtue of the faith of Chrtst. By the fourteenth century it is true that a great change had taken place; but all available evidence clearly shows that it was a transition from one name to another rather than from one state to another; and in any case, the faith of Christ in no sense contributed to the change. It is true that in the fourteenth century there were nominally very few slaves in Europe, but that is chiefly because slaves were then called serfs. It is also true that the Church was instrumental in effecting some degree of improvement in the condition of both slaves and serfs, but she was inspired more by economic and political than by religious motives. There may be some technical justification of Mr. Mozley's statement; but from the purely religious point of view there is nothing that can be said in its favour. And in the securing of any improvements in the social life of Europe from the fourteenth century onward, we have to apportion due credit to the influence of the renaissance, which was largely of an anti-Christian character. But we shall return to this point in a future article.

Mr. Mozley asserts that under Christianity "the position of slaves was made more tolerable, and freedom was more easily won"; but Roman historians testify that in some respects the lot of the slave grew worse. Lecky says that for some centuries there were more slaves under Christian rule than there had been under Paganism. What Mr. Mozley fails to mention is that even under the Republic it had been customary to grant certain slaves their liberty, and that under the Empire the freedmen rose steadily in influence and were held in high esteem. They often "obtained provincial governments, and were appointed to offices in the imperial household which virtually placed them at the head of administrative departments. As Dr. J. K. Ingram well says:—

> Freedmen of humble rank filled the minor offices in the administrative service, in the city cohorts, and in the army; and we shall find that they entered largely into the trades and professions when free labour began to revive. They appeared also in literature; we hear of several historical and biographical memoirs by freedmen under the Republic and the early Empire; many of them were professors of grammar and the kindred arts, as Tiro, the amenuensis of Cicero, and Hyginus, the librarian of Augustus; and names of a higher order are those of Livius Andronicus, Caecilius, Statius, Terence, Publius Syrus, Phaedrus, and Epictetus (Encyclopædia Britannica, Tenth Edition, vol. xxii., p. 133).

Under the Empire, in particular, in the second century of our era, the institution of slavery was condemned by emperors and philosophers alike, as contrary to nature. Seneca denounced it in the name of reason and humanity. He laid it down as a rule that slaves should be treated as "humble friends." Dio Chrysostom, Trajan's adviser, was a Greek writer, and was in full agreement with Seneca on the subject. The Pagan emperors, Nero, Diocletian, Hadrian, Antoninus, Pius, and others, showed their appreciation of the teaching of the philosophers by legislating in favour of the slaves and against the cruel tyranny of many of their masters. Indeed, it is incontrovertible that the trend of the Empire was towards liberty, and that some of the Pagan emperors went as near the abolition of slavery as it was possible for them, in the circumstances, to go. This is candidly admitted in Dr. Ingram's article just referred to. Now what a striking contrast there is between the Pagan attitude to slavery and the Christian. As late as the nineteenth century, Christian divines defended slavery in the name of God; and in the United States of America it was not abolished till the latter half of that same century, and then only in spite of the most determined opposition of the Christian Churches. Presbyterian Synods and assemblies, Wesleyan Conferences, and Baptist Unions passed resolutions in which slavery was justified as a divinely ordained institution.

Is it not absolutely undeniable, then, that the emancipation of the slaves cannot legitimately be claimed as one of the superb achievements of Christianity? Indeed, Mr. Mozley does not even attempt to prove that it can, but contents himself with the bare assertion that such it was. We claim it as one of the most brilliant triumphs of Humanism, which for several centuries has been slowly undermining the Christian faith.

J. T. LLOYD.

Wilfred Gibson.

> In our fat England the gardener, Time, is playing all sorts of delicate freaks in the hues and traceries of the flower of life, and shall we not note them?—George Meredith.

So many people, not wholly illiterate, believe that in the scientific and commercial age in which we live, good poetry is impossible, and the poets themselves help this delusion by seeking their subjects from the past. Instead of drawing inspiration from the world around them, they find subjects in classic literature or mediæval legends. Thus we have the sham antique school of poetry, which appeals far more widely to readers than the work of those poets who have embodied in their verse the new material gathered by science, or have expressed the new conditions of industrialism. The average writer of to-day maintains usually a high level, and this is saying much, for poetry is not so easy as it once was. The public is more exacting, and will not tolerate a singer who merely chants in mellifluous accents that the sky is blue or that the grass is green.

Among the singers who have responded to contemporary impressions, Mr. Wilfred Gibson's work arouses our curiosity. In his books, Daily Bread, Fires, and Womenkind (Elkin Matthews), he draws his material from everyday life, and succeeds admirably in infusing the spirit of poetry into the most unpromising phases of industrialism. The area of proletarian labour is almost an untilled field so far as the muses are concerned, and a successful attempt to deal with it as literature deserves encouragement. Indeed, the singer who can transmute the dross of the unpoetical into the pure gold of poetry has adventured to some purpose. Add to this that Mr. Gibson succeeds in endowing the commonest things, the most trifling actions, with a new dignity. It is only a high imagination which can so relate and ennoble things, and the mere fact that he has relied upon life itself, instead of picturesque association and pasteboard romance, is worthy of commendation. Like Walt Whitman, he does not hold to the theory that the tunes and cadences of other centuries are better fitted to express modern thought and feeling than music made to-day. A poet who sings of the flower-seller in the streets, of the printer at his trade, of the charwoman at her work, is somewhat of a novelty among the poetasters of the day.

According to the popular standard, the sword is more poetical than the rifle. Cavalry may be mentioned, but to introduce torpedo boats into poetry is to attempt too much. That a poet should use astronomy is taken for granted, but that he should sing of biology and chemistry is rank heresy. There is real need for contemporary poets bold enough to bridge the gulf between literature and life. Attempts to reflect contemporary life have been made many times. Years ago Walt Whitman made his hearers thrill with his realistic impressions of phases of American life. Tennyson, too, tried to reproduce contemporary thought in his clear-cut verse, as did Sully Prudhomme in France. Passages from In Memoriam and The Two Voices, as well as from La Bonheur and La Justice, express scientific theories or metaphysical arguments as accurately as a treatise, and prove that it is unnecessary to be false in order to be poetical. What beauty and force the metaphors of science may give to literature has been shown abundantly by Maeterlinck, but it requires a master hand to use the crude material of life or science. The average poet masks his incapacity by using words and thoughts which he knows are poetical because poets have used them for generations.

Mr. Gibson's muse deals with social life, and a large number of his verses record the struggles of the workers. A poem in Fires portrays the emotions of a sweated printer:—

> He was so dazed that he could hardly keep
> His hands from going through the pantomime
> Of keeping even sheets in his machine—
> The sleek machine, that, day and night,
> Through those glaring, flaring hours
> In the incandescent light,
> Printed children's picture books.

In another vein the poet gives us a realistic and humorous portrait of an old charwoman:—

> Suckler of a score or so of children—
> "Children! Bless you! Why, I've buried six, sir."
> Who, in forty years, wore out three husbands,
> And one everlasting, shameless bonnet.

A finer example of Mr. Gibson's method is found in Geraniums, which depicts an old street flower seller, and the emotions roused in the poet by the blazing red of the blossoms against the black background of a London night:—

> And yet to-morrow will those blooms be dead,
> With all their lively beauty; and to-morrow
> May end the light lusts and the heavy sorrow
> Of that old body with the nodding head.
> The last oath muttered, the last pint drained deep,
> She'll sink, as Cleopatra sank, to sleep,
> Nor need to barter blossoms for a bed.

Mr. Gibson does not restrict himself to phases of metropolitan life. There is a fine piece of tragedy in The Night Shift, in which a collier's wife, who has given birth to a child, has delirious premonitions of disaster to her husband. The mother speaks:—

> There's no hope,
> For she hears something—
> Something that I cannot.
> The wife's heart hears
> What the old mother's may not,
> Because it beats too loudly.

This is weighty and significant work. Mr. Gibson has done well, for he has attempted to extend the bounds of poetry, the finest flower of the literary art. Maybe he occasionally passes over the boundary of poetry into prose, and even into the prosaic, in his free use of the unconventional. He is not the "Bobby Burns to sing the song of steam," whom Kipling calls for. He is not a poet of the people like Beranger, or a writer of music-hall songs. But he differs from most literary men in that he has caught a glimpse of the new poetry which our time demands. His success should stimulate our poets to develop the deeper meaning and hidden beauty of contemporary life until we all feel—

> The mighty being is awake,
> And doth with his eternal motion, make
> A sound like thunder, everlastingly.

There is room for the Jean Francois Millet of literature, the Millet who will paint many other things beside "The Angelus." The poet who could sing of the life of our great cities with imaginative power, intellectual energy, and with wide sympathies, will inscribe his name among the great writers, for he would have modern life for his inheritance, "New and yet old as the foundations of the earth."

The unthinking and uncritical amiability of the modern newspapers, which find great poets are as common as roses in June, does a heavy disservice to literature. We are, in the words of Henry James, "a generation so smothered in quantity and number, that discrimination, under the gasp, has neither air to breathe nor room to turn round." A generation ago William Ernest Henley was scorned and insulted because he chanted the glories of the greatest city of the world. To-day he would be overwhelmed in a flood of flattery needlessly poured forth for the sapping and destruction of his genius. The poet should work his hardest for the present, and for the rest await in confidence the verdict of posterity.

MIMNERMUS.

Thomas Paine.

THOMAS PAINE was born in England on January 29, 1737, and is best known to the world as the author of a book of which most people have heard, but comparatively few have read. For over one hundred years The Age of Reason has been selling by a few thousand copies annually, though few Christians have read it, and most parsons denounce it as blasphemous, and its author as a rabid Atheist, without having ascertained, the contents of the one, or the beliefs and character of the other. As a matter of fact, Paine had a stronger belief in God and immortality than many a preacher in orthodox pulpits to-day, and it would not be easy to differentiate his religious views from those of the new Bishop of Hereford.

We are not, therefore, concerned with the religious views of Paine so much as with his political views and the great work he did for the achievement of liberty. In 1774, the American War of Independence was fast approaching, although the colonists were still loyal to the English monarchy, and had hardly begun to think of the rights of man. Then Thomas Paine arrived and wrote Common Sense, the first of that wonderful series of revolutionary tracts called Crises, which spread like wildfire through the country, stimulating the courage and endurance of the soldiers, and inspiring the American public with renewed confidence.

It is well known that he also assisted Thomas Jefferson in drawing up the celebrated Declaration of American Independence, and it is to the lasting shame of Washington, who owed him so much, that he yielded so easily to religious prejudice and neglected the author of Common Sense because he afterwards wrote The Age of Reason.

In 1787, Paine went to France, where he took an active part in the Revolution, for unlike La Fayette, who said, "Wherever liberty is, there is my country"; Paine said, "Wherever liberty is not, there is my country." He was elected as a member of the House of Deputies, and in one of the reactions of those stormy times he was thrown into the Bastille, where he wrote the second part of The Age of Reason while actually under the shadow of the guillotine, from which he escaped by the accidental chalking of the door of his cell on the inside instead of on the outside. Had he then been engaged in writing a defence of the verbal inspiration of the Bible, this escape would have been hailed by Christians as a striking proof of Divine interference and special protection of the righteous.

Some time afterwards he returned to England, and in 1802 he went back to America and lived in and about New York till his death in 1809 at the age of seventy-two.

Now the chief characteristics of Thomas Paine were his love of liberty, his stainless integrity, and his devotion to the welfare of his fellow-men; yet everything has been done by the Church to brand him as a corrupter of youth, to conceal his great services to humanity, and to cheat him of the gratitude of posterity. The ordinary man lives only for the petty interests of himself, and the small circle in which he moves. All his little thoughts are about his little self and his little prospects. He wonders how much money he can make in the next six months, by hook or by crook. He carefully considers everything he says or does, solely in the light of what effect it will have on his own little prospects, and is, therefore, orthodox in his social and religious sentiments. It does not pay to think, speak, or act differently from the "respectable" people around him—to think out and follow the truth when the conclusions it leads to are unpopular. Such men have no beliefs worth considering, and would abandon whatever principles they profess for a mess of pottage at any time. Men whose whole philosophy of life is contained in looking after number one, and who make use of religion to get on in business and society. And nine out of ten of such people will tell you that "Tom" Paine was a blasphemer and a very dangerous character. Yet Thomas Paine never considered his personal interests where any large social question was at stake. He was capable of rising above his personal affairs, and becoming one in whom the interests of the workers found a voice, a hand, and a heart.

I do not say that he was not pursuing his own happiness in acting thus, but his kind of selfishness which finds gratification in promoting the happiness of the downtrodden, is miles above the catchpenny greed that would let his fellow-men go to the Devil rather than spend a dollar or an hour's work in trying to save them. In time of war some men risk their lives and limbs, while others lend their money at a high rate of interest. Thomas Paine was one who freely risked his life in the cause of human freedom, and he is maligned by many whose patriotic zeal takes the form of patting the soldiers on the back and making a big fortune out of a contract for their supplies. But there is one thing in the life of Thomas Paine to which I would specially direct the attention of Freethinkers. Many of them confine their attention to the discussion of purely religious questions, and ignore the social problem that is now forcing itself to the front, just as the question of American independence forced itself to the front in the days of Thomas Paine.

More Freethinkers to-day are, I think, engaged in trying to demolish Calvinism than in trying to abolish industrial slavery; to destroy the Church than to destroy the infamous monopolies of banking and land which impoverish and imbrute the workers. I do not wish to underrate the importance of destroying the popular beliefs in an omnipotent and good God, or in a future heaven of eternal bliss, because these two great superstitions have been such strong bulwarks against popular discontent with unjust conditions of life. But many Freethinkers do not seem to understand that there are economic and political superstitions just as baneful as any religious superstitions can possibly be. Thus we have British and German Freethinkers who are firm believers in royalty, a landed aristocracy, and the secret diplomacy of an aristocratic Foreign Office; and we have French and American Freethinkers so steeped in economic superstition that they think the bottom would fall out of the universe if there were no monopoly of land or banking, so that nobody could take any wealth without doing some useful work.

Most of Thomas Paine's life was spent in fighting against political superstition, and it seems to me that there is a great incongruity between this man whom Freethinkers so much admire and many Freethinkers themselves.

Many a Freethinker to-day is heartily in agreement with the monopolists who enjoy great unearned incomes at the expense of the workers, and the laws which make that sort of thing not only possible but respectable. But Thomas Paine would never have been content to see a great social struggle going on between the toiling, defrauded, and degraded workers and the wealthy idlers, while he spent all his time and energy in exposing and agitating against a decrepit religious system. When Camille Jordan made a report against the priests, public worship, and church bells, Paine wrote to him as follows:

> It is want of feeling to talk of priests and bells while infants are perishing, and aged and infirm poor in the streets, from want of necessaries. The abundance that France produces is sufficient for every want, if rightly applied; but priests and bells, like articles of luxury, ought to be the least articles of consideration.

These words ought to ring in every Freethinker's ears. I believe in fighting against the Church, because she is hand in glove with the monopolists; but the sewing women and half-starved children and underpaid workers in every trade are matters of far more pressing concern than all the false religious creeds. And the Freethinker who is content to hold aloof from the present struggle for industrial freedom and general wealth has no right to call himself a follower of Thomas Paine.

If the Church did not stand in the way of the abolition of poverty, by enfeebling the minds of the workers and supporting every form of legal chicanery, I would not bother my head about her. And I want to see the day when the professed admirers of Thomas Paine will love their fellow-men more than they hate Calvinism, and fight against the Church, not so much because she teaches belief in fables, as because she helps to enslave the workers.

Shortly before his death, Paine wrote to a friend as follows :—

> A thousand years hence, perhaps in less, America may be what England is now. The innocence of her character, that won the hearts of all nations in her favour, may sound like a romance, and her inimitable virtue as if it had never been. The ruins of that liberty, which thousands bled to obtain, may just furnish materials for a village tale, or extort a sigh from rustic sensibility; while the fashionable of that day, enveloped in dissipation, shall deride the principle and deny the fact.

Little more than one-tenth of a thousand years has passed since those words were written, and they are nearly fulfilled. The American "fashionables" of to-day, "enveloped in dissipation," care nothing for equal rights; they do deride the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and deny the fact that all men should be free and equal as to opportunities and rights. In the wide territory of the United States, where there is ample room for the whole population of the world, there is poverty as widespread and slums as squalid as any to be found in England.

To free humanity from all that is false and tyrannous in economics, politics, and religion was the life-work of Thomas Paine, and it should be that of every Freethinker.

It is a good thing to drive away the bats and moles of mediæval Christianity, but it seems to me even a better thing to exterminate the modern economic rats which threaten to destroy the ship of State. Let us not only cease to bow down to Jehovah, but also emancipate ourselves from the bondage of the landlord, the money monopolist, and their obsequious servant, the politician.

G. O. WARREN.

[We do not care to comment on a contributor's article, but we feel that Major Warren has, quite unintentionally, done Freethinkers an injustice. Freethinkers do not, as a rule, any more than did Thomas Paine, "stand aloof" from political and social work. They are, in fact, amongst the keenest workers in the country in all advanced social and political work. Major Warren himself is evidence of this. What the convinced and informed Freethinker realizes, is exactly what Paine realized—the Age of Reason must precede the Rights of Man. Mental Freedom is the only guarantee of any other freedom worth having.—ED]

The Scottish Oath.

THE administration of the Scottish Oath in Courts of Justice sometimes causes a good deal of merriment. On one occasion a Baillie in a County Court requested a female witness to swear, and went on encouragingly, "I swear by the Almighty God," but the witness only smiled and nodded her head. "You are to take the oath," explained the officer in attendance, to which the woman replied with another and more emphatic nod. "Say, I swear by the Almighty God."

"Yes," was the immediate rejoinder of the witness

"No, no," expostulated the officer, "repeat the words after his Honour."

This was acknowledged by a third nod, and after explanation, the exact words were at last, to the great relief of the Court, repeated by the witness, and the case proceeded with.

On another occasion, a witness varied the final part of the oath, which calls for "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," by repeating softly "and anything but the truth," which, after all, considering the quality of her evidence, was the more correct rendering of the oath so far as this witness was concerned.

Snow Waters.

A COLD title for the time of the year, but everything in its season, and some things are always in season. A draught from a crystal streamlet that came laughing and tinkling from under its coverlet of snow inspired this pencilling. High up in the hilly neighbourhood are the reservoirs—natural and artificial. What sojourn, in what solitudes, what oozings—slow dropping "seepings" in the brown, old earth, what refinements in the chemistry of Nature, what maturings in the cellars of Time, ere those precious but plentiful drops distil from the domestic tap! Let us be thankful—not to God, but man—to Mother Nature, if we will have a deity.

As fine, and as far come, and as necessary, and, "thank God," as plentiful as the mountain dews, are the wise words of the wisest man. The hills are brown and solemn, almost sad in their eternal immobility and indifference, varied with sprawling patches of slowly melting snow, or in further recesses and higher eminences under the hasty driving mist, gloomy and forbidding in black and shaggy heath. Out of such unpromising material man has created fields and gardens. He had to. Direst necessity was the mother of all his inventions. Coarsened with the coarseness of his toil, he yet made refinement possible. Refinement enjoys, but is not too grateful for his gifts; and brawny labour still digs and hews more than its share, because the light it has created has never yet illumined its own brain. Who will pioneer for the pioneer?

A man loses himself on these moors—and finds himself. He thinks of the food and the home comforts awaiting him. No superflux from any Garden of Eden, but wrung by horny hands from the stubborn clod. And a man, if he be not a worker, and have a little sense of justice, feels small and mean and contemptible; and yet feels not so small and mean and grovelling as the worker himself, so unconscious of his kingship.

As Mark Twain said, these thoughts sadden me. I will to bed. But who has not at sometime looked in that faithful mirror of King Lear and learned, for the moment at least, its salutary lesson. Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel.

Such are the waters of wisdom, even if they be snow waters.

Such is the Sermon of the Mount. There are other considerations; not so wise, perhaps, if more persuasive. Change is required. Up here one doffs the gas-mask of convention, and, gasping, gladly gulps the free untrammelled air. One has left behind the little hates and hypocrisies still inseparable from communal life; the flattery, familiarity, contempt, disdain. One thinks of that little swaggering patriotic Hun-exterminator, elevated with something less innocuous than snow water, how it cheeks up, half-drunk, to one wholly sober; who tells you what he would do with you if you were a German, and, even as a true-born Britisher, you don't feel quite safe before such indiscriminating zeal. Apart from nationality, there are all sorts of curious animals in our streets. It would be of such that G. W. Foote was thinking when he said (in almost his last, if not his very last lecture), "They say God made man! Well, if he did, it was not always a very creditable piece of work! .....But when he made Shakespeare, one might say, well done, Boss! you've done something at last that does you credit." The abnormal are still more abnormal in these abnormal times; and sometimes the solitude is the only sanctuary. Miles of moorland have been traversed; and followed afar over snowdrift and heath the windings and undulations of an interminable weather and time-beaten boundary wall; past the still wood, bearing traces of savage storms; beyond and below the inclement seas, where insect man, swift or slow in his craft of destruction or commerce, ploughs the wave. Storm clouds are gathering behind the wind; there is a new menace in the hills; a roadway is reached; the sun sets on civilization—a sweet radiance in the sullen cloud—at least, the sunset was civilized.

ANDREW MILLAR.

Acid Drops.

The truth about the soldiers' attitude to religion is leaking out slowly, and it is found to be something radically different from what the Bishop of London and Dr. Horton declared that it was some three years ago. The godliness of the young fellows at the Front impressed his lordship so favourably that for weeks after his visit he could speak of nothing else, while Dr. Horton, judging only on hearsay, was astounded at the almost incredible work of grace going on daily on the fields of battle." "There is no Atheist in the Trenches," he kept on repeating, believing it to be true, no doubt, with as little evidence as he believed in the reality of the angels of Mons.

But both the Bishop of London and the Hampstead divine were absolutely wrong. Three books have recently been published in which the true state of affairs is honestly but sorrowfully presented, namely, The Church in the Furnace, being essays by Seventeen Temporary Church of England Chaplains on active service in France and Flanders; Can England's Church win England's Manhood? by an Army Chaplain; and As Tommy Sees Us: a Book for Church Folk, by the Rev. A. H. Gray, a Presbyterian chaplain. The Church of England chaplains have been "simply staggered" by the fact that, "while an overwhelming majority claim a nominal connection with the Anglican Church, the things for which she stands mean little or nothing to them." The opinion courageously expressed is that the Church, as at present constituted, is incapable of winning the respect and allegiance of thoughtful young men.

> On the whole, the average male Britisher of to-day has not much respect for the Church. He does not like or admire the Church. He does not belong to it, and does not want it. It is not among the national institutions that stir his pride. He neither fears nor loves it. It has for him no voice of authority .....To his virile nature it makes no impressive appeal.

Lo and behold, that revival of religion, once so confidently spoken of, has completely vanished from the earth. It began in Great Britain. Those in the South of the island declared that it was manifesting itself most gloriously in the North, while those in the North had not felt it, but were quite sure that the South was ablaze under its glorious influence. Further inquiry disclosed the fact that it was in France, not in our land at all, that the Holy Ghost was performing his mighty miracles. Then it was discovered, chiefly by Dr. Horton in Hampstead, that the real religious revival was to be seen among our own soldiers in France and Flanders. And now, at last, we are authoritatively told that, on the whole, British soldiers are not religiously inclined, but look down with something like contempt upon the Church and her services. What a stupendous amount of lying the men of God indulge in so long as they can with comparative safety do so.

The Spaniard who escaped from prison and took sanctuary at the Spanish Embassy has been returned to gaol with compliments. In the Ages of Faith the Church gave sanctuary to outlaws, and the secular authorities were powerless to reclaim them. Nowadays, the Church offers sanctuary to her own clergy, and all the king's horses and all the king's men cannot get these men into the Army.

The Young Men's Christian Association is still advertising for bagatelle boards, athletic outfits, music, musical instruments, and other articles for providing amusement. Obviously, the pill of religion wants heavily coating in these days.

The Rev. John Godsall Prentice, Rector of Tollerton, Notts, has been sentenced to six weeks' hard labour for defrauding the Church Army. The restraints of Christianity are not conspicuous in this instance.

A London newspaper suggests that "beef, beer, and the Bible made England." It is customary in religious circles to place this responsibility on the deity.

The American Young Men's Christian Association is just as secularistic as the native organization. It has opened an "inn" for American officers at Cavendish Square, London.

The pious Daily News published recently a lengthy leading article on "Our Daily Bread." It is significant that no mention was made of the Lord's Prayer.

The Salvation Army knows how to combine the advantages of Christianity and commercialism, and is now advertising for waste paper. Religion is supposed to be "without money and without price"; but waste paper is now fetching record prices.

We were pleased to see the following in the Ayrshire Post for January 18:—

> So we are being warned that the decisive factor in winning the war will be food. And that is what the glory and greatness of war comes to in the face of hard facts. Can the Germans and Austrians starve the women and children of the Allies until they bring the men-folk to peace? Can the Allies starve the women and children belonging to the enemy until he sues for peace? So much for the chivalry and greatness of modern war! A competition as to which can starve the other soonest! If hard facts like these don't disgust the world with militarism, and show it for the mean, brutal thing it is, nothing will.

It was given as a quotation, and as "worth producing." All that was wanted was the acknowledgment of its being an excerpt from our "Views and Opinions."

Owing to a printer's error, a provincial paper reported recently that "a god weighing thirty pounds has been caught at Lynmouth, Devon." Pious readers may have thought this had some association with the overdue revival of religion

The opposition against Dr. Henson's election to the bishopric of Hereford has fizzled out ignominiously, for Dr. Henson has scored effectively over the heresy-hunters by giving an assurance of his belief in the Apostles' Creed. As the position carries with it a salary of £4,200 yearly, the new Bishop has weighty reasons for his belief.

Dean Inge declares that the arguments presented for birth control are unanswerable. He would do well to press this view on his clerical colleagues, for the clergy observe the divine injunction to "increase and multiply."

A writer in the Daily Chronicle has been quoting Lord Wolsely on the Chinese: "To me they are the most remarkable race on earth, and I have always thought and still believe them to be the coming rulers of the world. They only want a Chinese Peter the Great or Napoleon to make them so. They have every quality required for the good soldier and sailor." We commend this to insular, ignorant Britishers, who regard the Chinese as "scum." The Chinese are neither Christian nor are they consumed with lust for dominion. Their love of peace is a reproach to Christian Europe.

Many of us have suffered from heartache on reading the reports of "charitable" societies at the beginning of this year. The conditions they reveal of the silent, subdued poor are the most eloquent condemnation of Christianity that can be found. Oh, for the reign of Humanism!

It has been decided to erect a chapel in St. Paul's Cathedral in memory of Lord Kitchener. How the dear clergy do love to exploit notable men in the interest of the Church.

The recent Intercession service have not affected seriously the playfulness of Providence. Floods have occurred in many parts of the country, many rivers have overflowed their banks, and thousands of acres of land inundated.

The recent very inclement weather has produced evidence tending to show that, in Scotland, the temperature of hell has been reduced to less than normal. Upon more than one occasion recently a Scot has been heard to remark: "It's hellish cauld."

Freethinkers are the last people to minimize or ignore social evils, but the attitude of the clergy to these things is deplorable. Very much that we hear from them about other members of the community deserves to be denounced as unpatriotic, ungrateful, and graceless abuse. These men cannot deny that the land they censoriously sit in judgment upon has been very kind to them; but their attitude to their own land is very much like that of the unspeakable cad who could bring himself to parade the fact that his mother is given to drink and shoplifting.

Government departments will have to look to their laurels as generous exporters of paper. It is reported that the National Bible Society of Scotland in 1917 "distributed 2,880,870 Scriptures in Belgium, Brazil, China, France, Japan, Korea, Spain, and in the homelands."

The following is from Punch: "Lady (displaying costume in which she is to appear as the Queen of Sheba in 'Biblical Beauties' tableaux at Charity Matinee). 'Rather sweet, isn't it?' Friend: 'My, dear, absolutely topping. It makes me feel I ought to be doing war work too.'"

"In an avalanche which has occurred in the Nugata Province of Japan thirty-two houses and 173 persons were buried." This should stimulate Christian missions to Japan. "He doeth all things well."

Les Nouvelles reports that a number of Allied aeroplanes flew over large areas of occupied Belgium and dropped copies of President Wilson's famous speech to Congress. At Liege, thousands of these copies were picked up. This will give the Germans another reason for thinking that the Allies are Atheists. The supreme authority with the Germans is the Word of God, which they are asked to discard for the word of Wilson.

In a weekly paper we read that a cinema has been secured for use in the camps surrounding the Holy City. We wonder whether Saturday or Sunday will be selected by the regulators of people's morals there as the day upon which the cinema is to be prohibited?

The Marquis of Tavistock says he is afraid Christian people are sometimes snobs. The "sometimes" strikes us as modest. We have seldom met a sincere Christian who was not a "spiritual" snob. And those who are not sincere are simply humbugs. Christianity, as a matter of fact, breeds intellectual snobbery, and encourages, by its terrorism, hypocrisy. We quite agree, however, with another remark made by the Marquis. "So long as a boy is a sportsman and plays the game, it does not matter if he is not religious." That hits the nail on the head. A decent person can do without religion; and if he is not decent, religion will be very little help.

The Bishop of Exeter is distressed. He finds there is a tendency to treat Christianity with contempt. People no longer love to read their Bibles, or look forward to Sunday to come and pray to God. Worse than all, the Trade Unions "would not hold out a finger to save religious education." Naturally, therefore, the Bishop is distressed. He sees himself left with a shopful of unsaleable goods, and the refusal of the Trades Unions to help religious education means that he cannot count on being able to breed customers who might one day purchase his stock.

Sir Arthur Yapp has been subjected to much heckling at the meetings he has addressed on the subject of food economy. He will not find his present work so easy as when he used to talk of the "Bread of Life" to devout congregations.

"The gospel of the New Testament was a gospel of revolution," says the Daily News. It forgot to add that it was also twenty centuries out of date.

"All great truths begin in blasphemy" is a sentence which occurs in a new play produced at the London Coliseum. This is almost a truism; but, unfortunately, it is one that many repeat without in the least learning toleration for new ideas.

Into the melting-pot, say many, with monarchies, secret treaties, matrimonial misfits, and Holy Writ; and now some dreadful person in the Commonwealth proposes to throw in the Bishop's gaiters! Revolution can hardly go as far as this. The Manchester Guardian, in a leading article, makes a stand against such a painful innovation. "Surely if there be any offence in a Bishop, it is not in his gaiters, which are often the best of him"; and the editorial ends: "Abolish the Bishop, if necessary, but before he goes let us find someone to wear his gaiters." These pleasantries appear in the first number of the Guardian at its increased price of three-halfpence, and as long as they can be continued no one is likely to grudge the extra halfpenny.

Miss Lena Ashwell, we read, has been saying, "Thank God for the queues." We think that this particular type of religious fervour can safely be left to the Bishop of London. We could have understood it if she had been referring to the theatre queues.

How To Do It.

WE are out for another thousand new readers, and by some means or another we mean to get them. But we cannot get them without the help of those readers we already have. Therefore, here are a few suggestions as to how it may be done:—

1. Show or lend your own copy to a friend.
2. Take an extra copy for posting to a likely new subscriber, or send on your own when done with.
3. Get your newsagent to display a copy along with his other journals and newspapers.
4. Send us the names of addresses of those to whom you think specimen copies of this paper would be acceptable.
5. Get copies into clubs and reading-rooms wherever possible. There is no reason why the Freethinker should not have all the publicity that is given to other papers.

Any or all of these plans may be adopted, and they nearly always result in new subscribers. We are fighting to keep the Freethinker at the same size and price for the duration of the War, and an increased circulation is the best way of meeting the steadily increasing cost of production.

So let us have that thousand new readers as soon as possible. And when we have then we will cease troubling for more for—well, for at least a month.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester; March 3, Sheffield; March 24, Manchester; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 3, Failsworth; February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—R. Allen (N.Z.), £1 10s.; J De B. and Wife, £1 1s.

A. G. ROYSTON.—Thanks for efforts to promote Freethinker circulation. We have handed your subscription to Miss Vance, who will send your membership form.

A. V. EVANS.—Murray's edition of the Origin of Species is published at 2s. 6d.

T. C. PERKINS.—We will look up the matter, and see if we can find any record. Up to the present we have not been able to find what you require. The Act is only another illustration of religious bigotry. Pleased you think the Freethinker the best twopennyworth published. So do we.

C. PINWELL.—A discussion on Socialism v. Malthusianism is a little outside the scope of the Freethinker.

F. C. W.—Not at all a bad idea—that of publishing letters which our "free press" refuses to insert. We are quite in accord with you on the subject of flogging. To flog children in order to make them kind to animals is about as absurd a policy as one could imagine. It is quite equal to those amongst us who hold that war civilizes.

EMBRYO FREETHINKER.—Naturally, we quite agree with what you say about the religion, or rather the non-religion, of the average soldier. We also agree that large numbers of people are terrorized into silence concerning religion by public opinion. The world lacks moral courage most of all. An hour of moral courage and mental honesty, were it universal, would end the reign of the Churches—and a great many other things as well.

W. L.—Suppose God does bring good out of evil, that doesn't make the evil less real. The question to be met is why God permits evil at all. To argue that it is his way of getting good doesn't meet the issue. It leaves us wondering at the blundering of God and the stupidity of man.

B. EVANS.—Certainly we will come to Pontypridd or Aberdare if a hall can be secured. There is no reason why there should not be a strong Branch of the N. S. S. in both places. There are plenty of Freethinkers there; of that we are quite sure.

MR. J. PARSONS.—We know nothing of Corporal John Roberts, or his alleged conversion from Atheism to Christianity. But as John Roberts says he was a speaker for the National Secular Society, we can only say that he has a lively imagination. That statement we know to be a pure falsehood.

STOKER W. PALMER.—Literature for distribution is being sent. As you are home on leave, we are sending to your home address.

ONE of our readers asks for the name of a soldier, on service, to whom a weekly copy of this paper would be acceptable. Please write this office.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Monday evening's air-raid has interfered somewhat with this week's paper. On returning home from Swansea on Monday late in the afternoon, Mr. Cohen dealt with a number of letters that had been sent down from the office, and posted so that it should be delivered early in the morning. The letter was not delivered, and a number of paragraphs and replies to correspondents that should have appeared are omitted. Most of the paragraphs deal with letters received on Saturday and Monday. Tuesday's post is also disorganized. Some may be dealt with next week.

Mr. Cohen had two fine meetings at Swansea last Sunday. The hall in the evening was too full for comfort, but better that than empty. The proceedings were made the more interesting by some courteous and pertinent criticisms by two clergymen, and the lecturer's replies were accepted with much appreciation and applause by the audience. Food is not so plentiful at Swansea as it might be, but we were pleased to see the enthusiasm for Freethought stronger than ever. We have great hopes of young South Wales.

This evening (February 3) Mr. Cohen lectures at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham. His subject is "Christianity and the Logic of Life," and if ever Christianity was being hammered by the logic of events it is now. Mr. Partridge, the Secretary, writes that he is expecting a "bumper house." We hope that the expectation will be realized, although, judging by previous experience, we have little fear on that head.

A letter from Mr. Wildman, Secretary of the Southampton Branch of the N.S.S., was recently sent to the General Purposes Committee of the Council asking that the Freethinker he placed in the Public Library. This was refused, but on the matter coming before the Libraries' Committee, Mr. Howard strongly objected tc this refusal on the quite proper ground that the paper represented the opinions of a section of the ratepayers, aad the Freethinker had as much right to be in the Library as any other journal. Finally, a resolution was moved and carried that the Freethinker be purchased for six months in order to see whether there was any demand for it. We have no doubt that the demand will quite justify the purchase, and we congratulate the majority of the Libraries' Committee on its sense of justice.

The death of Lance cpl. Evans, noted in our last issue, had a sad sequel the other day. It is pretty obvious to those who know the facts of the case that this young man was physically quite unfitted for the Army. Application had been made to the local tribunal for exemption, in the days when tribunals were less careful than at present, and refused. Overwrought by his son's death, the father made his appearance before the tribunal, and told the members that but for their action his son would be alive to-day. The chairman told him to "get out" and, says the local paper, assisted the caretaker to forcibly eject him. It was, of course, quite useless going to the tribunal on such an errand; but those who bear in mind the now admitted fact that thousands of men were passed into the Army who were quite unfitted for the life will have considerable sympathy in this case.

There is a good report of Mr. Cohen's recent lectures at Southampton in the local Times for January 26. The reporter notes that "the meetings were of a very successful character, being well attended, and the lecturer made an excellent impression by a masterly exposition of his subjects, an evidently wide reading, and clear thought, relieved by flashes of caustic humour."

Our note in this column on the need for organized work in South Wales has brought a response from Pontypridd and Aberdare. An attempt is to be made to secure halls in both places, and if these can be obtained Mr. Cohen will pay a visit at as early a date as is possible. We hope that all Freethinkers in these districts will do their best to help these endeavours, and that other parts of South Wales will soon get into working formation.

The Orb of Day.

III.

THE great and glorious light radiated by the sun is assuredly one of the most marvellous facts of Nature. No artificial illuminant can remotely compare with the light lavished by the lord of day. And all this light travels to us through a space of 93,000,000 miles. Dispensed in all directions from its surface, our orb sheds only one two-thousand millionth part of its effulgence on the earth. Yet, during the immeasurable periods in which our planet has been the abode of life, this stupendous process has been in unceasing operation; while through the course of countless ages which preceded the appearance of organic phenomena, and even before the earth assumed a solid form, the mighty sun sent forth his beams into space with apparently reckless extravagance. For, so far as mortal mind can divine, solar light, like solar heat, is mainly dissipated in the abysses of space.

Although the dense darkness of a sullen winter midnight is so markedly different from the magnificence of a summer day, familiarity with the sun's pure light serves to render us insensible to the real brightness of the solar beams. Any ordinary comparison between the power of artificial illuminants and that of sunlight is futile. Sir Robert Ball, however, in his fine monograph, The Story of the Sun, has drawn a comparison which answers this purpose very effectively. In the manufacture of the celebrated Bessemer steel, the molten metal, when it flows at a white-heat from the furnace, is poured into a huge vessel estimated to hold about ten tons of the liquid iron. When this immense vessel—the converter—is full, the process of transforming iron into steel begins. "Air at high pressure," we are told,— > is driven forcibly into the bottom of the converter, and bubbles up through the molten mass. It might at first be thought that the act of blowing cold air through the heated iron must tend to cool the glowing liquid, but such is not the case. There is a certain quantity of the element carbon in the cast iron, and as the air bubbles through it its oxygen combines vigorously with the incandescent carbon, and heat is developed by this chemical union throughout the entire mass. The heat thus generated is far more than sufficient to neutralize whatever cooling effect might be the natural consequence of blowing volumes of cold air through the hot material. In fact, hot as the air must have been when it was first run from the furnace into the converter, the temperature of the molten metal rises continuously during the twenty minutes or so that the blow continues.

The state of the flames rising from the converter assures the operator that the transformation of iron into steel has been completed. When the liquid steel is turned into the mould, as it is in the next stage of manufacture, its temperature is so exalted that the fluid metal glows with an intense whiteness. This is probably the greatest incandescence obtainable on any considerable scale on our globe, and the glow is dazzlingly brilliant. But this remarkable glow, intense as it is, pales into insignificance when compared with the light of the sun. That gifted investigator of solar physics, the late Professor Langley, declared that the intrinsic effulgence of the sun is fully 5,000 times as bright as an orb of the same magnitude would be were its entire surface composed of molten metal emerging from a Bessemer furnace.

Travelling at the tremendous velocity of 186,000 miles per second, light journeys to us from the sun through the ether of space. Tyndall likened this elusive vehicle of light and heat to a highly attenuated jelly. Other physicists have pictured the ether as a fluid-like substance of inconceivable subtlety and tenuity. Whatever it be, the ethereal medium serves as the conductor of the waves which emanate from the sun, or any other luminous body, and which announce themselves to human consciousness as light.

Sound is propagated by vibrations conducted by the atmosphere, and the presence of the atmosphere is essential to its transmission. Light is also conveyed by waves or undulations; but, quite unlike sound, light is transmitted, not by the atmosphere, but by the ethereal medium. Ethereal waves possess both length and amplitude, or height. Their wave-length determines their colour, while their amplitude discloses itself in the form of brightness. The white light received from the sun is popularly regarded as colourless. Yet, as a matter of fact, it is really the resultant of a complicated combination of all the shades and colours of the rainbow—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. And not merely does the analysis of white light reveal all the colours of the spectrum, but that coloured ribbon of light which we produce by using an ordinary prism is also characterized by the presence of an array of dark lines. With every refinement of spectroscopic research, or the added purity of the spectrum under analysis, these dark lines constantly increase in number.

The meaning of these dark lines was unknown until Kirchoff and Bunsen, in 1859, observed that they corresponded in position to certain bright lines which appear in the spectra of metals in a state of vapour. As Professor Abbot, the Director of the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory tells us, in his recent volume on The Sun:—

> If metallic sodium or any of its compounds, like common table salt, is thrust into an alcohol lamp flame, the spectrum of the flame shows two brilliant yellow lines which agree in place with two prominent dark lines in the yellow part of the solar spectrum. Not only so, but if an incandescent oxy-hydrogen calcium light, whose natural spectrum shows neither dark nor bright lines in the yellow at these places, is caused to shine through an alcohol-lamp flame charged with sodium vapour and placed before the spectroscope, the two dark lines like those in the solar spectrum will appear instead of the two bright lines of the sodium-charged flame itself. Other chemical elements, also, emit bright spectrum lines, and the vapours of these elements, if placed in a beam of white light, absorb the rays they themselves emit. If their own emission is more intense than the emission they absorb from such a transmitted beam, the effect will be brighter lines in a continuously bright spectrum. If their own emission is less intense than the emission they absorb, the resulting spectrum will be crossed by dark lines.

This last phenomenon is displayed by the spectrum of the sun. The emission of a vapour declines rapidly as the temperature falls. It is, therefore, evident that the dark solar spectrum lines are caused by the metallic clouds of the solar surroundings, for these vapours radiate their heat into space. The solar vapours are cooler than the sun's inner layers, and are consequently incapable, through their own emission, completely to replace the rays they absorb.

All solid bodies, when heated to a state of incandescence, display their special spectra. The problem presented by the discovery of the dark lines which cross the solar spectrum was solved when it became known that a definite correspondence existed between the bright lines of one spectrum and the dark lines of another. When the solar spectrum is compared with the spectrum of iron obtained by heating that metal to incandescence with the electric arc, the correspondence between the dark lines in the former and the bright lines of the latter, clearly denote some close relationship. Even if a single conspicuously bright line in the spectrum of iron occupied the position of a prominently dark line in the solar spectrum such a coincidence would be remarkable. But it was proved that hundreds of such striking correspondences existed, and, as we now learn from the researches and inventive ability of Professor Rowland, there are at least 2,000 coincidences of this character between the dark lines of the sun's spectrum and the bright lines of iron. The presence of iron in the sun is consequently certain. Still, it seemed difficult to explain the circumstance that the lines were dark in one spectrum and bright in the other. But, as already indicated, the mystery vanishes when we realize that surrounding the glowing surface of the sun there exists an atmosphere sufficiently heated to sustain iron in a state of vapour, although its temperature lies below that of the intensely heated atmosphere from which the solar light is chiefly radiated. A vast sum of light issues from the photosphere, which, in its passage outwards, is constrained to traverse a cooler encircling atmosphere in which relatively non-luminous iron vapour is suspended.

We must now note a very significant fact. It has been established that the iron vapour of the solar atmosphere arrests the progress of certain rays of the light travelling outwards from the interior. The interception is selective, for while the greater number of the light rays pass without obstruction, certain rays are absorbed. In truth, the atmosphere of iron vapour proves almost opaque to these special rays, while it remains transparent to all other kinds. Interest in this phenomenon increases when we discover that those particular rays intercepted by iron vapour possess precisely the same refrangibility as the rays emitted by iron vapour at a stated temperature.

When in a vaporous condition the molecules of an elementary substance oscillate in a certain period of time, and if these are acted upon by vibrations which harmonize with the undulations of other molecules part of the energy of the passing vibrations will be taken up by the molecules, and these will then oscillate with increased rapidity. But in the absence of this correspondence of movement the passing vibrations continue their journey with undiminished speed. This accounts for the fact that the vapour of iron in the cooler atmosphere enveloping the sun arrests and appropriates the the energy of those outgoing undulations which vibrate in sympathy with the molecules of iron. As a result of this arrest, the outspeeding undulations suffer a serious diminution in their light. Hence, the dark lines, or rather, the lines which appear dark in comparison with the dazzling illumination which environs them.

At least thirty-five terrestrial substances have been detected in the sun. In addition to iron the spectrum yields over 200 lines of carbon, and seventy-five of calcium, while aluminium, zinc, copper, silver, tin, lead, cobalt, and numerous other planetary substances have been discovered. Professor Rowland failed to find some fifteen of our elementary bodies in the sun, while the presence of others awaits complete confirmation. But Rowland cautions us against the conclusion that because the existence of some terrestrial elements in the sun remains to be clearly demonstrated, and the presence of a few others cannot be proved that, therefore, these undiscovered substances are absent. Quite to the contrary, as research advances, we anticipate the discovery that, were our globe heated to the temperature of the sun its spectrum would be little, if at all, different to that of our luminary.

The Professional Touch.

PRINCIPAL FORSYTH delivers, in the Saturday Westminster Gazette of January 12, 1918, a lecture to the teachers of England on Education, under the rather incongruous title of "Reconstruction and Religion." Let us say at the outset that the Principal is gifted with a good deal more candour than many of his professional brethren. But his very candour—his unequivocal statement of clerical claims—reveals him as a reader of the signs of the times who does not understand. Having ears, he heareth not; having eyes, he seeth not.

Principal Forsyth seeks to support the conclusion that Christianity "is the moral renovation of Humanity." His position is "that our first interest in education, secular or religious, is to rear men and women as citizens; citizens of the State and of the Kingdom of God." We are not concerned to contradict the Principal when he argues for improvement in the position of the teacher, or when he contends for a better general education for the child. There is probably force in several of his objections to what he calls "premature specialization." What we are concerned to point out and emphasize is, that Principal Forsyth and his professional brethren are content to agree to any kind of curriculum so long as they can have that curriculum well peppered and impregnated with religious doctrine. There is the true professional touch. Principal Forsyth lets the cat out of the bag when, in one of his frank outbursts, he says, "I would put up with almost anything rather than see education severed from religion." This bears out to the letter what the present writer maintained in his article, "Better Than Nothing!" in the Freethinker of September 23, 1917. Principal Forsyth says we need a religion whose spirit is moral before it is mystical. We contend that such a religion is impossible. Notwithstanding all that has come and gone, we hold that, by saying this, Principal Forsyth is merely echoing one of the discredited watchwords of the "New Theology." Religion was always, is always, and so long as it exists, ever must be, mystical before it is anything else. Religion is, first, obedience to commandments, without question, without any exercise of the mental faculties of the commanded to inquire whether the commandments are moral or immoral. For this reason the Bible remains unexpurgated. But when the individual mind asserts itself by testing the validity of commandments, it makes a claim to the freedom of forming its own religion, or doing without one altogether. And that is an end to the traditional and professional authority of the so-called "men of God." "I would put up," says the Principal, "with almost anything rather than see education severed from religion." Indeed! This may be interesting as throwing light on the psychology of Principal Forsyth; but the advocates of a secular solution of the education problem may be permitted to observe that centuries of association between education and religion have bequeathed to us the evils from which civilization suffers, culminating in a world war. And they may also be permitted to ask why the preferences of Principal Forsyth and those who think with him should be shoved down the throats of those who differ from him. It is painfully and historically true that whenever the "Idea of God" becomes associated with any phase of secular activity, it is a clog on the wheel of progress. Christianity has been demonstrated to be a ghastly failure. It has failed because its claims are false.

There is something to disturb the gravity of Freethinkers when they contrast the attitude of this temerarious apologist of a moribund faith with that of the men of the generation which has just arrived. Many of the latter doubtless render lip service to the dicta of their elders, but by their actions (always more eloquent than words) they betray the attitude of persons whom a lawyer once described as "recalcitrant beneficiaries." The testamentary schemes of the Almighty Father do not appear to them to be acceptable. They prefer their own natural rights. Once alive to these rights they regard the will of God as a mere form of words.

We have every desire to believe that Principal Forsyth does not intend to sneer. But we cannot pass over the form of his suggestion for a heightening of the status of the teacher. He says: "His combinations should carry the seal of a profession and not the stamp of a trade union." If that does not contain a sneer it is at least a remarkable example of arrogant professional complacency. The Principal's candour is surpassed by his professional consciousness. But we venture to warn him that the men of the generation which has just arrived will regard it as a sneer, and will smile at it for such. Much has mankind suffered from the three professions, and from their satellites and parasites. The beginnings of emancipation are marked by the appearance of such things as trade unions.

One is not surprised to find such an ultra-superior mind claiming (for Self and Co.) that they only can take "long views of life"; that they only have "the final key to the moral situation." Long views of life! Christians think in centuries—Freethinkers in æons. To men, like Principal Forsyth, their precious religion comes before education. Education "is the public interest that comes next to religion." "The teacher ought to be taught to regard his profession as the true national clergy, as a clergy bearing a relation to the nation parallel to that of the ministry of the Church." Why? Because he has more effect on the public at its plastic time than the ministry has. There is the whole clerical position confessed in a nutshell. There is the professional touch, if you please. If we clergy do not get directly in touch with "the public" at its plastic time—it would scarcely accord with our dignity if we did—we will do what we can to inoculate the teacher with our doctrines, and so mould the public mind. Observe the professional reference to "the public" as if they were a flock of sheep to be led, guided, goaded, driven, or controlled en masse. How often have expert educationists had their schemes frustrated by pottering preachers? And just because of this repression of individuality which inevitably results from religious interference.

Principal Forsyth says that we need a moral education. But any education worthy of the name is bound to be moral. You cannot divorce ethics from ethnics.

NEO-MALTHUSIANISM V. SOCIALISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—My deliberate challenge to Socialists has had a most interesting result. Only four have written in defence of Socialism from the most heinous accusation which could be made against it in the eyes of a Freethinker—that it is a faith—the Christian faith redivivus—with "beneficent Nature" as God and the wicked Capitalist as Satan. Of these, Mr. Marriott roundly charges his fellow Socialists with opposing the Malthusian doctrine; Major Warren adopts the tactics of the odium theologicum, and merely attempts to provoke sentimental dislike of that doctrine regardless of its truth, or of the humanitarian work of the Neo-Malthusian; Mr. Streimer indulges in Marxian's rhodomontade, which, to do them credit, the intellectual Socialist's have already discarded; and the only serious critic is Mr. Robert Arch, who admits the importance of family limitation. When I contrast this with the experience of twenty or thirty years ago, when the Socialist leaders were holding up Malthusianism and family limitation to ridicule and contempt, and were telling the people that smaller families would mean lower wages, it almost shakes my disbelief in miracles.

A few words will be sufficient concerning Mr. Arch's point. The Malthusian doctrine reinforced by vital statistics leads to the conclusion that the present total production of food upon the earth is insufficient for the adequate sustenance of all its inhabitants, and this is the chief source of that poverty which Socialists wrongly ascribe to human institutions. Mr. Arch claims that, if this is so, the food ought to be equally rationed, and that it could be increased by Socialistic effort in the place of production for profit. From both these contentions I absolutely dissent. Competition is the great source of progress, as both economists and biologists have recognized, and the Socialistic mistake lies in condemning competition, instead of avoiding too many competitors. However brutal it may seem to say so, it is better in the face of shortage that the competent should be fully fed, and we must regard as the most competent those who have succeeded best in the struggle. Production for profit means production of the things for which the community shows its desire, and there is no better incentive to production, and no better criticism as to what to produce.

My remarks concerning the effect of destruction of capital seem to have been misunderstood. I was not accusing Socialists of disregarding capital, but was replying to Major Warren's repetition of Henry George's fallacy that wages are paid out of the produce of the labour for which they are paid. Capital may not "employ" labour, but labour cannot be exerted without previously existing capital in civilized countries.

Mr. Arch's claim that Socialism will bring about family limitation among the poor by raising their status has been a favourite one among a certain section of Socialists for the last few years, and has its humorous aspect. What it comes to is: Give the poor Socialism and they will imitate the despised bourgeoisie, and adopt that family limitation which the bulk of Socialists have declared to be unnecessary. And it has another defect. How is Socialism to improve the condition of the poor? Primarily, at least, by further taxation of the educated classes, who will further restrain their already low birth-rate in consequence, thus intensifying the present reversed selection.

Against Mr. Arch's assertion that propaganda will not induce the poor to adopt family limitation, we have the definite experience of the Malthusian League. This experience has shown that there is nothing that the poor are so anxious and so grateful for as advice concerning the methods of family limitation, and there is no doubt whatever that direct neo-Malthusian propaganda will effect far more than any secondary results of Socialistic bounty, and will enable the poor to participate automatically in the benefits of capital by becoming themselves capitalists.

CHARLES V. DRYSDALE.

The Massacre of the Innocents.

I HAVE never been able to see how the cause of true religion, of true Christianity, of the acceptance of Christ's mission and teaching can be helped by the perpetuation of myths and fables and falsehoods.

Mr. McCurdy, who writes in your issue of December 28 on the old fable of Herod's massacre of the male children of Bethlehem, has evidently never taken the trouble to read up the subject (or in general the whole question of the nativity of Jesus) in the Encyclopædia Biblica. Had he done so he would have learnt (1) that so far as anything is certain in the early history of the Redeemer, He was born at Nazareth and not at Bethlehem, and (2) that Herod the Great died wholly ignorant of the son born to Joseph and Mary, and innocent of such a horror as the massacre of the male infants in the town of Bethlehem. If there were any truth in such a legend as the killing of these children lest one amongst them should be the Messiah, the deed would certainly have been recorded by Philo, the Alexandrian Jew, who was a contemporary of the Herods, or by Josephus, who has written so fully of this period in his "Antiquities of the Jews"

The only reliable Gospel is that of St. Mark. In the others, not composed in their present form till the second century, the life of Christ prior to His emergence as a teacher is shown with fabulous events simply for the purpose of "fulfilling" Hebrew prophecies and thus converting Jews to Christianity. Of these myths the Massacre of the Innocents is one, adduced or invented (only in the Gospel attributed to Matthew) merely to justify the prediction: "In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentations and weeping..... Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted....."

But in religion, as in everything else in this present period, what those who write for the edification of the people loathe or avoid is the statement of the plain truth. Legends and fiction distributed broadcast are thought in some way to help us towards victory in this struggle, to keep us content with mismanagement, and to stave off the terror of real Education.—Sir H. H. Johnson, "Daily Chronicle."

South London Branch, N.S.S. — The South London Branch has arranged a debate to take place at the Trade Union Hall, 30, Brixton Road (near Kennington Oval Tube Station) at 7 o'clock this (Sunday) evening. The subject: "Did Jesus Ever Live?" will be opened in the affirmative by Mr. Noah Bailey (of the C. E. S.), and negative by Mr. Howell Smith, B.A. It is hoped that there will be a good attendance at this lecture, and that Freethinkers will take with them some of their Christian friends, to whom the subject should be equally important and interesting. The Trade Union Hall is easy of access—from North London by Tube as above, and from West London by L.C.C. tram from Victoria to Kennington Church, each about three minutes walk from the hall.—W. HANMER OWEN, Hon. Sec.

West Central Hall, London.—An interesting lecture was delivered by Mr. A. D. Howell Smith to a good audience last Sunday afternoon. A closing remark of the speaker's on Christian Idealism brought an avalanche of opposition, which was ended by an invitation being given to Mr. Smith by the chairman to make this the subject of another lecture at an early date.—E. M. VANCE, Gen. Sec.

North London Branch N. S. S.—An animated discussion followed Mr. H. V. Storey's address, which was freely criticised, on the reconstruction of the Freethought party. Tonight, Mr. George Ives will open on "Early Man." North Londoners who have already heard Mr. Ives are looking forward to a most interesting and stimulating address.—H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec.

NIETZSCHE AND CHRISTIANITY.

After three years of War, and three years in the Army, I am proud to have this opportunity of confessing publicly that I am still a convinced Nietzschean, that I still hold Nietzsche's attitude towards Christianity, and that recent events have not moved me one inch from the position I held in the spring of 1914. In the ferocity, brutality, and impudence of the Germans, in the megalomania that induced them to imagine for one moment that they were entitled to world-dominion, I see the inflating bellows of Pauline arrogance in their assumption of right. I see those seditious doctrines of equality and of immortality granted to every Tom, Dick, and Harry, which ultimately leave poor, hitherto modest, Tom, Dick, and Harry with vertiginous notions as to their own altitude! In the commercial rivalry which occurs as a sort of rumbling bass throughout the cacophonous uproar of the world conflict I see the fatal suite: Catholicism, Protestantism, Puritanism (mother, daughter, and abortion); and since a form of government may be judged by the revolutions it provokes, the ugliness and versatile stupidity of Protestantism, together with the appalling sordidness and commercial cupidity of Puritanism, stand for all time as the most convincing condemnation of the stronghold of traditional Christianity.—Zarathustrian, "New Age."

The Blank Wall.

THE human brain has arrived at one great confidence; the confidence in money, and in money values. No other confidence rivals it. There is much more real and revoltingly sincere confidence in the power of the dollar than in "God" or man, or the possibilities of human life. There is more true faith in pounds, shillings, and pence, than in humanity.

This confidence in the commercial reality of money values is the solid basis, as it were, of the continued existence of the vast majority of "Civilized" men and women. Destroy the confidence enjoyed by the people in cash values and civilization would become an even greater manifestation of chaos than it already is. There would be no faith in anything at all! No faith in man, "God," reason, science, or art. The most effective power that man is possessed of would appear to be a genius for commercializing everything that emanates from his brain! If a thing or idea can be commercialized then the people will believe in it. Religion will perish when it ceases to be adequately subsidized; war stops functioning when, by its own nature, it makes commercial success impossible.

Destroying this great and almost supernatual confidence of humanity in money would destroy the only balance in the human brain which works effectively. Unfortunately, there seems no chance of the money confidence being destroyed. Hope may be permitted, however, because the possibility of directing the money power into less insane channels does exist, and it is conceivable that a more rational populace would see to it that its cash was invested in those things which promise and intend the betterment of the race. In a sane world there would be more subsidy for a "Prevention of War" society than for the Army and Navy. Unfortunately, the people put their money on the wrong horse and lose everything. In time, the people may learn which investment is the most advantageous.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

Obituary.

The older members of the Bristol Branch of the N. S. S. will see with regret that Mr. J. W. White has passed into the shades. The deceased was a personal friend of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. G. W. Foote; these frequently stayed in his house in their visits to Bristol thirty years ago. Mr. White was one time President and Secretary of the Bristol Branch in its active days. The deceased was a teacher of navigation, and many noted seamen passed under his teaching. He held three medals from the Royal Humane Society for saving life. Once, when the writer expressed his admiration for this work, Mr. White replied: "Oh, it is nothing. If I saw a dog drowning I should plunge in to save it." At Exeter, many years ago, he was publicly presented with the Royal Humane Society's medal by the then Lord Bishop Temple, afterwards Archbishop. The Bishop expressed his thanks to Mr. White, and said he ought to thank Almighty God for giving him such splendid gifts of saving life. Mr. White thanked his lordship, but shocked the audience by adding, "Perhaps his lordship ought to send the medal to God." When the deceased was Secretary of the Licensed Victuallers at Bristol, he was publicly thanked by the Chairman of the Licensing Committee for his efforts to lessen drunkenness. He was capable of casting three columns of figures at one time, sharing this wonderful power with the late W. E. Gladstone. His mind was so active that he could cast a sum as quickly as it was written; he had second sight. A man of kindly disposition, he was called the poor man's lawyer. Once the writer knew of a man so poor that at Christmas time he had no dinner at home. Mr. White had a parcel of food—puddings and rabbits and fruit—sent round to the man's house, he not knowing who his benefactor was. He was a most earnest Freethinker, and desired that his remains should be cremated. He has passed into the great unknown, and one can think of him as surely "he cannot be ugly in his death"; for his life was brave and frank, and many would desire to lay a tribute on his bier. A good, great man has passed away, and the memory of a life well spent remains to us all.—T. A. W.

Views and Opinions.

English Christians and Russia.

The attitude of English Christian leaders towards Russia since the revolution will not have escaped the notice of the observant. Prior to the revolution we were deluged with sermons by muddle-headed clerics like the Bishop of London, and superficial writers like Mr. Stephen Graham concerning the intense piety and saintliness of Russia. It was Christian in spirit and in temper. Russia had the religious temper that was lacking with us, and it was, apparently, its function to permeate us with its unrivalled Christian idealism. And all this, be it remembered, of the Russia of the Czar! Of a Government that was, without doubt, the worst in Europe, which had for generations kept its people ignorant, drunken, and religious, in order to perpetuate its own power; which had made "Siberia" a synonym for the very grave of freedom, and had permitted, when it had not connived at, the murder of thousands of Jewish men, women, and children to gratify the engineered hatred of the more ignorant among its Christian subjects. Then came the revolution, and with it silence on the part of those pietists among us who had hitherto been so obtrusively vocal. Nothing more was heard of the "soul" of Russia. Bishop Ingram and Mr. Graham remained mute. Fulsome praise for the piety of the Government that for generations had treated its own subjects with a greater infamy than any conqueror would have done, which had forced Jewish girls to register as prostitutes before it would permit them to study at the leading universities. Chilling silence or rebuke for those who, whatever their errors and blunders, were at least animated by the desire for freedom, and had rid the nation of an intolerable tyranny. The attitude of English Churchmen before and after the revolution will be not the least instructive study of the part played by the Churches during the world-war.

Force and the Churches.

Those who knew anything about Russia, and who also understood our English Christians, were not at all surprised at the sequence of events. Right through the course of this War, the Churches have shown themselves incapable of thinking of the conflict save in terms of physical force. They have never realized that, while the immediate task was to hold Germany at bay and rob her of dependence upon mere militarism, the greater task and the greater aim was to break the power of the militaristic ideal in all countries and among all peoples. And no mere military victory would do this work. We say that because no mere military victory has ever had this effect in the remotest degree. A military triumph always leaves the victor exulting in his military supremacy, and the nation doing homage at the shrine of the God that has served it so well. And a military defeat leaves the vanquished with no other lesson than that its own militarism failed because it was not powerful enough. If the one conclusion is justified, so is the other. The Churches have not realized that if militarism is to disappear from human society, or even to be considerably weakened, the clash of conflict must be lifted to a higher sphere. To put the whole matter in a sentence, the effectiveness of militarism sanctifies, in the minds of the people, its use. Its recognized ineffectiveness, its utter, hopeless breakdown, is the one thing that will make it a permanently discredited instrument in the eyes of men and women. Then only will it be recognized that, as in war as elsewhere, it is ideas that rule, so the end of war will come by the supplanting of lower ideals by higher ones. Our work, said Father Vaughan, is to keep on killing Germans. Our work is rather to keep on killing German ideas. We have to supplant the idea of force with the force of ideas.

Freethought in Russia.

The time-serving policy of the clergy is one reason of their attitude towards Russia. The other lies in the fact that the revolution was a blow at the Christian Church as well as at Russian autocracy. Church and autocracy have always worked hand in hand in Russia. Without the Church, the permanence of the autocracy would have been almost impossible. As it was, they fitted each other like the upper and lower jaws of a beast of prey. A late Procurator of the Holy Synod, M. Pobyedonostseff, made it quite clear in his Reflections of a Russian Statesman, that in Russia the weakening of the Church would mean the downfall of the throne. And in the clergy the autocracy possessed a force far more potent than its armies. The dragooning of the mind is preparatory to the dragooning of the body. But the makers of the revolution were, and are, in the main Freethinkers. The greatest figure of all at the moment, Trotsky—the man who is responsible for giving an idea to the peoples of the world around which they may rally—is an avowed Freethinker. And as in France more than a century ago, the revolution in Russia is making for the disintegration of the Christian faith. The Church Times, in a series of articles on the subject, refers with horror to the "tendency to associate Christianity and Atheism with the opposing political parties," and, as an instance of the demoralization that has set in, relates that in one of the ports "the crew of a destroyer have met together, and after a lengthy and wordy discussion, passed a resolution that in their opinion the evidence in favour of the existence of God is altogether insufficient, and they are satisfied there is no God." Worse still, there is actually a freethinking paper now issued which publishes a caricature of Moses! We are not surprised to find the Church Times writer recording that "In the old days I never saw a peasant who looked unhappy; now the sullen, discontented faces increase in unhappiness every week," even though one may be a little sceptical as to the idyllic existence that has been disturbed by the revolution. Anything is forgivable when done in the name of God. Nothing is excusable if done in the name of humanity. That is the inevitable lesson of the situation.

Lest We Forget.

Had not the Churches been as incapable of giving a reliable lead in war time as during peace, they might have seen in the Russian revolution a message of hope to the world, and they would have welcomed it as something of an offset against the spirit of militarism. For consider the situation. Three and a half year's of war has pretty well convinced all reasonable men that on lines of mere physical force the position is as nearly hopeless as may be. Even politicians are beginning to realize this. To these millions of people obsessed with the power of armed forces comes a handful of, not as they are stupidly called impracticable idealists, but, in the best sense of the word, very practical realists. They see that the raising of armies, and yet more armies, leads nowhere, and ends in no tangible good. And into this international "suicide club" they threw, not a new army, not a high explosive shell, but something more powerful and more deadly than either—an idea. They appeal to the peoples of the world against the rulers of the world, to human reason against brute force. And that appeal has brought the world nearer peace than has three-and-a-half year's fighting. We are witnessing to-day, if we would only see it, one of the greatest fights in all history; and it is for we Freethinkers to note that in this supreme struggle not a word of help comes from anyone of the Churches of Christendom. That is a fact well worth remembering. In Russia, in Germany, in Britain, in Italy, the Churches have seen nothing beyond a continuance of war until sheer exhaustion brings an "inconclusive peace." It is due to the Freethinking leaders of the new Russia that they have seen a better way out. In a duel of big guns versus great ideas the guns may, for the moment, roar loudest; but the ideas will remain when the guns are silent, even if they do not shatter the guns with their own greater explosive force.

The Record of the Churches.

But, after all, this is only history repeating itself. The Churches have acted in this War precisely as they have acted in others. In Russia, as we have said, the Church was always the cheerful and willing tool of the Government, and it was largely by its agency that the autocracy persisted. Nor has it been vitally different in any other country. In the worst days of the old order in France it was the Church that gave that order its sanction and its blessing. And when the upheaval came and—to quote Carlyle—the shrieking thousands suffered instead of the dumb millions, and the "Rights of Man" were proclaimed instead of "Duty to God," the Church in this country allied itself with an alarmed conservatism, and poured upon the revolution an avalanche of slander and misrepresentation that a century and a quarter has not sufficed to remove. In Germany the Government has found in the Church a ready instrument in its half-century work of militarizing the people. The Church made no protest there when the Government converted the schools into "training stables for the Army." It assists here when military drill and the paraphernalia of Army life is introduced into our schools. The record of the Christian Churches, from Constantine onward, is the same—time-serving, opportunist, and retrogressive. It cannot really be said that the Church has failed to lead the world along the higher path, since it has never seriously attempted the task. It has failed to make its own power permanent, but that is because not even so great an organization as the Christian Church is proof against the growth of human intelligence and the strength of human co-operation.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Newest Apologetic.

II.

> It was in virtue of the faith of Christ, and of that alone, that the position of women was bettered, and respect for women increased, in the later Roman Empire and in the dark ages that followed, that the exposition of children was fiercely combated, and that slavery was practically extinct in Europe by the fourteenth century.—Rev. J. K. Mozley, B.D., "The Achievements of Christianity," pp. xiii, xiv.

SUCH is the claim on behalf of Christianity advanced by an exceptionally, fair-minded Christian apologist, but in the form in which it is expressed we are bound to pronounce it utterly false. As regards the position of women in Rome prior to the establishment of Christianity, we have the authority of Lecky for stating that it was more satisfactory and honourable than it has ever been since. "They arrived," he says, "during the Empire, at a point of freedom and dignity which they subsequently lost, and have never altogether regained" (History of European Morals, vol. ii., p. 304). As Mr. Mozley is a classical scholar, he cannot be ignorant of the fact that Pagan philosophers and emperors advocated and legislated for the humane treatment of children. It was clearly taught that a parent had no right to kill his son without a trial, and Trajan made it illegal for a father to enslave his son. A young boy committed a serious offence, and his father put him to death, but Hadrian punished that brutal father with banishment. Alexander Severus treated the exposition of a child as a foul murder; and even Diocletian made the sale of children illegal. Has Mr. Mozley forgotten that the first Christian Emperor, Constantine, once more legalized their sale? And is it not a fact that in Christian Britain there exists to-day a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, under which serious prosecutions are by no means unknown? Much had been done for the benefit of the child in Pagan Rome before Christianity came to power, and, alas! much remains to be done for it in London at the present time.

We now return to the subject of slavery, and particularly to Mr. Mozley's assertion that "it was in virtue of the faith of Christ, and of that alone, that slavery was practically extinct in Europe by the fourteenth century." Of the truth of this assertion not a single shred of evidence is adduced, possibly because the author knows that none is available. Indeed, we confidently challenge him to prove his statement in its present form. Lecky, whom he sometimes quotes, does not agree with him, though he is more favourable to Christianity than the facts, even as cited by himself, allow. Whilst holding that we owe the emancipation of the slaves to Christianity, he frankly admits that two other agents rendered invaluable assistance. The first was Paganism. Under Nero, he tells us:

> There appeared in the centre of Paganism a powerful reaction in favour of the suffering classes, of which Seneca was the principal exponent, but which was more or less reflected in the whole of the literature of the time. Seneca recurred to the subject again and again, and for the first time in Rome he very clearly and emphatically enforced the duties of masters to their slaves, and the existence of a bond of fraternity that no accidental difference of position could cancel. Nor was the movement confined to the writings of moralists. A long series of enactments by Nero, Claudius, Antonine, and Adrian gave the servile class a legal position, took the power of life and death out of the hands of the masters, prevented the exposure of slaves when old and infirm on an island of the Tiber, forbade their mutilation or their employment as gladiators, and appointed special magistrates to receive their complaints (The Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii., pp. 235-6).

The other influence favourable to the slaves was likewise non-Christian, namely that exerted by the barbarian invaders of the Roman Empire. Lecky justifies the description of them as "the representatives of the principle of personal liberty in Europe." They scarcely practised slavery at all, and when they did, it was in opposition to the dictates of their best instincts and habits. But the Church was always, even from the very beginning, a believer in, and supporter of, the Divine institution of slavery. St. Augustine justified it on the ground that it was due to man's fall, and regarded it as part and parcel of family government. Gregory the Great admitted that the original state of man was a state of freedom, and on this ground he was theoretically in favour of emancipation as an act of grace. It is also true that his holiness freed a few of his own slaves, but only as an act of devotion. Did he not present slaves to a convent, and is it not on record that he did his utmost to recover a fugitive slave of his brother? The truth is, as the Rev. Dr. Fisher, of Yale University, puts it, that "neither pope nor council pronounced slavery unlawful." (History of the Christian Church, p. 232.) Priests were often slave-owners on a large scale, and numerous were the bondmen who did the menial work at the monasteries. Alcuin was an Englishman of the eighth century, who became an eminent ecclesiastic, and an active believer in the revival of learning. He founded the Universities of Paris, Tours, Fulden and Soissons, and he held an honoured position at the French court, playing the part of instructor to Charlemagne and his family. And yet when he took charge of the Abbey of Tours it was the proud possessor of twenty thousand slaves. Dr. Fisher says:—

> The emancipation of slaves and serfs was applauded, like any other act of beneficence. Even among the ancient Romans it was not infrequent for a master to give freedom to a slave, and it was always counted a generous deed. The mediæval Church denounced slavery only when it was the servitude of a Christian in bondage to a Jew or an Infidel. This was always regarded as something grievous and deserving prevention by law, or through a ransom in cases beyond the reach of law. The Church from ancient times insisted that anxiety about one's worldly condition, even in the case of a slave, was undesirable, and that the freedom of the child of God and the heavenly inheritance were the chief good. (Ibid, p. 232.)

It is true that in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries slavery diminished considerably in Europe, but it is a radical mistake to attribute the diminution to the benign and humanizing influence of the Church, except in so far as the Church herself was being affected by the revival of ancient learning. Professor Fisher cannot be suspected of harbouring any prejudice against the religion of which he is a distinguished minister, and yet he has the courage to write thus:—

> Serfdom disappeared, not by any religious condemnation of it, but as a consequence of the growth of towns, a spirit of discontent and resistance among the peasants themselves, and other general causes. (Ibid, p. 233.)

Speaking of the decline of slavery in England from the ninth to the eleventh century, John Richard Green significantly adds:—

> The decrease of slavery went on side by side with an increasing degradation of the bulk of the people. Political and social changes had long been modifying the old structure of society; and the very foundations of the old order were broken up in the degradation of the freemen, and the upgrowth of the lord with his dependent villains (A Short History of the English People, p. 59).

Again, dealing with the Peasant Revolt in the fourteenth century, Green says that "the slave-class, never numerous, had been reduced by the efforts of the Church, perhaps by the general convulsion of the Danish wars." Yet, surely, the class that succeeded it was not much, if any, better, because—

> All indeed were dependent on a lord. The manor-house became the centre of every English village. The manor-court was held in its hall; it was here that the lord or his steward received homage, recovered fines, held the view of frank-pledge, or enrolled the villagers in their tithing. Here, too, if the lord possessed criminal jurisdiction, was held his justice court, and without its doors stood his gallows (Ibid., p. 245).

Does it not inevitably follow from all these testimonies that it was not "in the faith of Christ, and of that alone" that slavery declined in Europe towards the end of the Dark Ages? As a matter of simple fact, slavery was not abolished in Europe until the nineteenth century. In Christian England there was great rejoicing when a monopoly of the slave-trade between Africa and the Spanish dominions had been profitably bought through Marlborough in the eighteenth century, and we must not forget that England was directly responsible for planting slavery in her American colonies and her Indian islands. In 1760 there were 80,000 black slaves in the City of London; and in one hundred years, between 1680 and 1780, our British colonies alone imported fully 2,130,000 slaves; but at the close of the eighteenth century "the horrors and iniquity of the trade, the ruin and degradation of Africa which it brought about, the oppression of the negro himself, were felt widely and deeply;" and yet when, in 1788, Wilberforce, with the assistance of Pitt, brought in a Bill for its abolition, the feeling against it was so strong that the House of Commons threw it out; and it was only in 1833 that Great Britain abolished its slave-trade. And in this connection it should be remembered that, whilst Wilberforce was an evangelical Christian, his friend and chief supporter, Pitt, was an Agnostic. In America, also, slavery was abolished, not by the Church, but by its Freethinking President, Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Mozley's allusion to the effect of the faith of Christ on slavery is thus seen to be both inaccurate and misleading. Even had complete emancipation been brought about in the fourteenth century, the Church could not justly have claimed the full credit for it, because already Humanism was a most powerful factor in moulding even ecclesiastical policy; and there were men not a few in Holy Orders to whom Christianity was only nominally true. It was the new learning, the ever-growing knowledge of Nature, not the faith of Christ, that was broadening men's minds, and opening their eyes to the grim realities of every-day life. This, however, is an aspect of the subject which demands serious attention.

The spirit of the world
Beholding the absurdity of men—
Their vaunts, their feats—let a sardonic smile
For one short moment wander o'er his lips.
That smile was Heine. —Matthew Arnold.

HEINE'S genius almost defies analysis. He is, and must ever remain, a problem. Multifarious, luminous, brilliant, he is like a diamond giving light from a hundred facts. To many he appears as a youthful champion tilting against the enemies of humanity; but it seems well-nigh impossible to reach the roots of the man's nature. He is a bundle of contradictions. A Jew who despised money; a convert without zeal; a model of resignation, and yet no Christian; a poet living amid the sternest conditions of prose; a comedian whose life was a tragedy.

In one vivid personality, Heine gathers all those influences of his time which are the live forces to-day. Such a nature was bound to be misunderstood. The puritanical Thomas Carlyle called him a "blackguard"; the pious Kingsley thought him "a wicked man." Thackeray, on the other hand, admitted his "great genius"; and Matthew Arnold hailed him as the mouthpiece of his stormy generation. These varying estimates are typical of the general attitude. He kindled enthusiasm or roused repulsion wherever he was read. If we would seek a comparison, we may find it in Voltaire. Both men championed Liberty, and produced the deepest effects on their generations, and left immortal legacies to posterity. The writings of both ring with a defiant note against "the lie at the lips of the priest."

Heine was born at a great crisis in European history. The long and terrible period during which the vampires of Church and State had sucked away the life-blood of the world was ending rapidly, and before his tenth year little Heine had lived through, and seen, great events. It was the day of Napoleon, and, as Heine puts it, "all boundaries were dislocated." As a boy, he found it hard to learn Latin declensions, which he was sure the Romans never did, "for if they had first to learn Latin, they never would have had time to conquer the world." Young Heine was so troubled that he broke into heterodox prayer: "O thou poor, once-persecuted God, do help me, if possible, to keep the irregular verbs in my head."

One memorable day the impressionable boy saw Napoleon ride through Dusseldorf on his famous white horse, and he never lost the glamour cast over him by the great commander. Republican as he afterwards became, Heine always had a tender place in his heart for Napoleon. Nor is this to be wondered at, for the Code Napoleon, to the Jewish race in particular, was a charter of freedom from the ghastly ghettos of the Midde Ages to the rights of free-born citizens, and the Jews justly hailed the Emperor on that account as their deliverer and protector.

A precocious child—Heine loved reading. His favourite authors were brave old Cervantes and witty Jonathan Swift, and he revelled in the fascinating pages of Don Quixote and Gulliver's Travels. At the age of seventeen a rich uncle at Hamburg tried in vain to induce him to choose a business career; but it was useless. The young poet, full of lofty ideals, regarded money-grubbing as an accursed thing. Later he studied law, and fell under the influence of Hegel. Years afterwards he referred, caustically, to this period as that in which he "herded swine with the Hegelians."

With the appearance of his first volume of poems he began to take his true place. He still talked of becoming a lawyer, but his thoughts were all for other things than "wise saws and modern instances." For instance, he wrote:—

> Red life boils in my veins. Every woman is to me the gift of a world. I hear a thousand nightingales. I could eat all the elephants of Hindustan, and pick my teeth with the spire of Strasburg Cathedral. Life is the greatest of blessings.

His energies were devoted to writing, and not to pleading. Instead of cultivating his clients he wrote his Travel-Pictures, a book so full of word-magic that it showed Heine to be as great an artist in prose as in verse. Its irony was so mordant, so disrespectful, that it was at once placed on the Index Expurgatorius. Indeed, as a writer, he never elected to dwell beside the still waters. To think of his career is to think of alarms and excursions, of church calling unto conventicle, of pamphlet answering pamphlet, of recriminations and vituperations manifold, and all the joys of literary battle. With all his love of fighting his enthusiasm burns for noble ends. The love of liberty shines through the mist of his dreams. And let a man love Freedom and live long enough, and there is no doubt with whom his place must be in the end.

In The Romantic School he poured vitriol over the literary chiefs of reaction in their tenderest spot. He compared their reversion to mediævalism to the hallucinations of Charenton, the Bedlam of Paris. This is how he ridicules Ludwig Tieck:—

> He drank so deeply of the mediæval folk-tale ballads that he became almost a child again, and dropped into that juvenile lisping which it cost Mdme. de Stael so much effort to admire.

It was not roses all the way. There came an inevitable stage in which the poet could no longer—

Sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair.

But when the sad days arrived he never complained. For seven long years prior to his death he lay bent and solitary on a "mattress-grave," his back bent, his legs paralyzed, his hands powerless, his sight failing. His ungrudging nature found excuses for his friends' desertion of his sick-chamber in the reflection that he was "unconsciously long a-dying." As Matthew Arnold sings in his fine dirge on his brother poet:—

Oh! not little, when pain
Is most quelling, and man
Easily quelled, and the fine
Temper of genius so soon
Thrills at each smart, is the praise
Not to have yielded to pain.

"God's satire weighs heavily upon me," says Heine.

> The Great Author of the Universe, the Aristophanes of Heaven, was bent on demonstrating with crushing force to me, the little earthly so-called German Aristophanes, how my weightiest sarcasms are only pitiful attempts at jesting in comparison with His, and how miserably I am beneath Him in humour, in colossa mockery.

The untameable humorist kept his most wonderful jest for the last. "God will forgive me," he said, "it is his trade."

Heine, after all, was a poet. He is at his best in verse. His melodies are as various as they are faultless. The cadences are more caressingly tender; now lulling, lingeringly mournful; now resonant as the blare of martial trumpets. The verse now rolls majestically, now dances airily, now rings like a peal of fairy bells:—

O lyric voice, half angel and half bird,
And all a wonder and a wild desire.

Fundamentally, Heine was a Freethinker, and he hated priestcraft with every drop of his blood. He never wearied of pouring scorn on the "molly-coddle homœopathic soul-doctors, who pour the thousandth part of a pint of reason into a gallon of morals, and send people to sleep with it on Sundays." He loathed that "abortion called State religion, that monster born of the intrigue between temporal and spiritual power." He was not "over partial to anthropomorphism." The bolts of his unerring irony are often directed towards the most sacred characters in the Christian mythology. In an oft-quoted passage he says that God is dying, and, in a daring figure of speech, suggests the administration to him of the last sacrament of the Church. On another occasion, he suggests that the pervenu God of the Christians is angry with Israel for reminding him of his former obscure national relations.

In the lambent flames of his sardonic humour he searched everything that the Christian counts dearest. Writing of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason, he says:—

> Since his time Deism has vanished from the realm of speculative reason. It may, perhaps, be several centuries before this melancholy notice of decease gets universally bruited about; we, however, have long since put on mourning. Immanuel Kant has pursued the path of inexorable philosophy; he has stormed heaven, and put the whole garrison to the edge of the sword.

Even the idea of immortality did not escape his sharp satire. He suggests, mockingly, that the notion of living for evet must have first occurred to some young lover in the arms of his mistress or to some worthy citizen sipping his beer in the cool of a summer evening.

As a poet, Heine's fame has attained to that height in which praise has become superfluous; but in the character of iconoclast he has a yet higher and more lasting claim on the attention of Freethinkers. Heine himself said he knew not if he were worthy of a laurel-wreath; "but," he added, proudly, "lay on my coffin a sword, for I was a brave soldier in the war of the Liberation of Humanity." No one will deny the laurel-wreath, and assuredly to Henri Heine belongs the sword of a valiant soldier of Liberty.

Religion and the Boers.

NEARLY twenty years ago a little people in South Africa astounded the world by the prolonged resistance they made to the might of the British Arms. The healing and conciliatory measures of the conqueror have, to a large degree, softened the resentment of the more enlightened Boers, as admirers of General Smut's English speeches will be able to testify. Still, all is not well, and the recent disturbances, together with the rancorous race hatred, and obstinate prejudices of a powerful faction, have caused no little misgiving in the hearts of those who were looking for the signs of race fusion and mutual forbearance so vital to the progress of this country.

It is a well-known fact that toleration in politics very rarely accompanies bigotry in religion, and it is to this factor that the student of contemporary South Africa should pay attention before all else.

It would be difficult to find a parallel to the spiritual thraldom of the Boers, except in Scottish history; and, like them, the slavery is a willing one. So ingrained are the seeds of superstition in their being that even a finished education at the Universities often fails to awaken their reason in these matters. It is not so much their doctrinal credence that is remarkable (the average Boer is as ignorant as the veriest Pagan of the implications of his creed!) as their rigid conformity to tradition and custom, and this is so natural a characteristic that the very idea of a Boer iconoclast is startling to those who know him.

Bearing in their blood the heritage of the fugitive Huguenots of France, and the sturdy Netherlanders of William the Silent, liberty is for them a watchword and a passion, and, considering this, their spiritual subjection seems a perplexing anomaly. In this respect they too resemble the Scots, and I can hardly refer those interested to a better explanation than Buckle's account of that nation's religious evolution in his History of Civilization. Like them, the struggle for survival has condemned the Boers to a warlike, restless existence. Allowing no time for reflection, and ever in the van praying for them, cheering them, and fighting as one of them against wild native tribes, fierce animals, and the raging elements, went the "Predikant" (parson) himself, a rugged, sturdy son of the soil as they were. In the early nomadic stages of this people, these "Predikants," doubtless, served a very good purpose as a natural nobility of "best men," where no distinctions of rank exist. The greatest religious event in the Dutch Church is the celebration of "Nachtmaal," a term applied to a periodical gathering of the members of the Church ostensibly for the purpose of baptisms, weddings, confirmations, and the taking of Communion. The lonely veld dweller, who has not seen a town for months, will then wend his way through dust and storm, across great distances, to the nearest "dorp" (village), and "great is the joy of meeting." The writer has vivid youthful recollections of these gay gatherings—the bright frocks and sparkling eyes of the healthy country girls, the wooings and the weddings, the songs and dances 'neath starry skies, the tete-a tete round wagon fires; all the pleasurable emotions which only a South African night can excite. For, mark you, your Boer is no pleasure-hating Puritan, and he has none of that sombreness and austerity which a starving of the senses begets. In fact, he is more often than not a glutton of the senses, and possessed of a very keen sense of humour too! In the remote sparsely peopled parts of this country, unhappy must be the lot of one who casts himself adrift from the life of the Church—the marooned islander would hardly find himself in a more desperate plight!

At these functions the "Predikants" are, as it were, the Directors of Ceremonies. They are listened to with deep respect, and credited with almost superhuman knowledge and foresight. The natural mischievousness of their flock is kept in check by a stern demeanour and keen watchfulness. In addition to his always liberal salary, gifts in kind are willingly poured upon him; in fact, his position is one of so much influence and comfort that it is the desire of almost every prosperous Boer family that at least one of its members should join the Church. As a rule the modern "Predikants" are well-educated, thoroughly practical men; and as the education of their countrymen is almost wholly left to their charge, they can safely be depended upon not permitting such enlightenment to penetrate their flocks as would jeopardize their positions!

These old "nachtmaals" must have been a priceless blessing to those old Boers of unsettled communities and nomadic habits. As South Africa develops and settles down, these conditions must disappear; in fact, already in the towns the young Boers are distinctly more rebellious to custom; but a great distance has still to be travelled before a thoughtful Rationalism can replace the pedagogic type of morality which they are just beginning to escape from.

Religion and morality are, to an overwhelming degree, absolutely dissevered in the Boer consciousness. The most profound profession of faith is often accompanied by startling moral delinquencies, and this is beginning to be recognized by the more thoughtful of them. This is the result of trying to force an other-worldly Calvinistic creed upon a naturally buoyant and human people; and in saying it of them it is far from my intention to single them out from amongst the nations as alone in that respect. My idea is to check that habit which so many English people have of comparing them to their own Puritans of pious memory, which the figure of Paul Kruger and the Bible did so much to foster. They are far better people than your Puritans could ever hope to be, and it is this temperamental characteristic that makes one hope that, once rid of the deadening influence of the "Predikant," their natural bent for the "human" side of life may expand, until they become generous, open-hearted, and free, politically as well as religiously.

"Spare the Rod and ——."

THE adoption of Biblical statements as canons of conduct has been productive of more evil than one would credit from a cursory examination of the facts; and none more so than the adage "Spare the rod and spoil the child." Those of us who are interested in educational matters have noticed, with feelings almost of despair, the apparent dislike of children to education, and the indifference with which it is viewed by the adolescent. The growth of this dislike is difficult to understand, for there is none of us who have brought up children, but can recall the painful insistence with which the infants pressed their questions about letters and words.

We have just been watching some children playing at "school." Their antics, which might have been amusing had they not indicated a blemish on our educational scutcheon, pointed to the probable source of this baffling indifference to education. We refer to the retention of corporal punishment in schools. Most of the citizens of this island have a distinct recollection of the frequent, and, in mature judgment, uselessness of the "tawse" or cane. Abhorrent to all those who have a spark of humanity in their breasts, yet the rule of the cane continues. We know of a child, a girl aged ten, who suffered from valvular disease of the heart, and in respect of whom a medical certificate was lodged with the School Board, or its employees, that on no account was the child to be struck or in any way excited; and yet who, despite the certificate, was severely flogged. The School Board was informed, but the only step taken, although the virago was a probationer, was to remove her to another school, where, presumably, she might continue her physical exercise to her constitutional benefit.

Many of the profession, however, discountenance corporal punishment, and we think it is a matter for congratulation that they should have advanced so far from the barbarism of a Hebrew civilization. They fully realize that not infrequently resort is had to the tawse, when anger has supplanted intelligence. It might be of some value to point out that the cringing children of five years and upwards are not infrequently only objects upon which an enraged teacher may wreak his vengeance, something to smash—human flesh—no matter, it relieves the feelings; and that hateful as such an action may appear in cold print, it is unfortunately rather common in this super-Presbyterian-Christian country of Scotland; tolerated in a country which boasts of its educational system. Perhaps, however, we credit religion with being a humanizing factor, and on turning to the text-book of Christianity, we find we are in error. Corporal punishment is, indeed, mild when we read of the treatment meted out to stubborn sons.

> If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son which will not obey the voice of his father or the voice of his mother: then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him and bring him out unto the elders of his city; and they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton and a drunkard. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die.

Thus is parental affection encouraged in Deut. xxi. 18 et seq.

With such an example of magnificent ferocity before one, it cannot be deemed surprising that those brought up on such a literature and such ethics cannot comprehend that the retention of corporal punishment in schools is a thing to be condemned; and it is here that the humane influence of Freethinkers could be exerted with great profit both to the generations to come and to civilization in general. In Scotland we find ministers of religion on every School Board; in England we find them in large numbers on Boards of management. Here, where Freethinkers ought to be present in large numbers, there are but few. Can it be that they do not recognize the great good that can be done by breaking up the religious atmosphere which pervades each Board, and discrediting the boasted support to education which is claimed by Christians?

We cannot view with indifference the direct and immediate effect which corporal punishment has on social life. One cannot walk of an evening through the town without observing how frequently parents strike their children for little reason or none at all. It is apparent that such a habit is contracted by constant association with the fact of striking, and that it is indulged in because public opinion has not yet condemned it. And what gives more substance to its reputed right than flagellation in schools? Were it to be treated as immoral, and that fact impressed upon the plastic minds of the children, we should, within two generations, find that parents would control their feelings; which act of discipline would be a great step towards the ideal of a sentient being.

MALTHUSIANISM AND POVERTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Dr. Drysdale insists that poverty is due to over population, and that "it is better in the face of shortage that the competent should be fully fed." If this be so, perhaps he will explain why the condition of the workers in Ireland has not been improved one iota by the decrease of population there since the famine of 1848? The population then was 8,000,000, and is now only 3,000,000, yet the poverty-stricken state of the Irish workers remains as bad as ever. Again, seven great landlords take £14,000,000 annually in ground rents in London, without doing a hand's turn to earn it. They are, certainly, fully fed, but in what way do they display their competence? They might all be congenital idiots, yet their unearned incomes would roll into their pockets just the same. John D. Rockfeller, the American oil king, has an annual income of some £5,000,000. If this is the just reward of competence, he must be a much more competent man than Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Spencer, and a good many more scientists rolled into one.

G. O. WARREN (Major).

[We have received a number of letters on the subject of "Socialism v. Malthusianism," for which we regret our inability to find room. The letters, too, are a little outside the scope of the original topic, which was "Freethought and Birth Control."—ED.]

The congregation at a Stevanage (Herts) church are asked not to put foreign coins in the collection. This is an improvement on the old, sad days when brace-buttons and bad money found their way to the alms-bag.

Acid Drops.

It seems that several people were "providentially" saved from the aeroplane bombs last week by being out of the way when the explosions occurred. When one comes to think, over six millions of the people of London were in the same position. And some of us are inclined to think the thing that calls for explanation is why the people who were killed happened to be "providentially" in the path of the German bombs. The victims do not appear to have been Freethinkers, or some explanation might be found in that direction.

There are about 50,000 sky-pilots in this country, and this large number is likely to be increased if the Catholic Universe is correct in stating that "hundreds of officers and men are to-day resolved that if God brings them safely through the hell-upon-earth, which they are experiencing, their thank-offering shall be a life devoted to His service in the priesthood or the religious life." And, let us hope, prayerfully, that no breach-of-promise cases will result.

The dear Daily News informs its readers that "the old gods are passing." This news should flutter the dovecotes of Nonconformity.

The conferring of the vote on women has roused the Churches to a sense of its vast import, but Miss Margaret Fletcher, of the Catholic Women's League, lets the cat out of the bag in saying: "Catholic women must be educated to do their new duties well. They must be in a position that they would not through ignorance betray the cause of the Church." In other words, when the clergy pull the strings the marionettes will vote.

A generation ago many Nonconformists regarded theatres as "the door of Hell"; but things are changed nowadays. A leading London theatre announced recently a special performance in aid of the Young Men's Christian Association.

At an inquest held at Westminster on Timothy John Lee, a bootmaker, who committed suicide by cutting his throat, it was stated that he suffered from religious mania. This is a tragic testimonial to the value of religion. In the Coroner's Court it was stated that, as a rule, bootmakers were Atheistic, and a correspondent inquires if there is ground for this assertion. We believe it to be true that a large proportion of reformers used to come from this class, and the reason was that bootmaking—in the days when they were bootmakers, and not merely machine minders—was an occupation that gave opportunities for reflection and conversation. And these circumstances tend towards heresies of all kinds, by favouring mental development.

The piety of the Sunday papers is more fully flavoured than that of the weekly periodicals, but, curiously, the sporting pages of the Referee often contains the unadulterated article. Recently it expressed the touching sentiment that "the Huns, like Agag, must be hewn in pieces before the Lord by Christian men." Scratch a Christian, and you find a savage.

America is the home of fancy religions, and it is not surprising that a Christian Scientist has been appointed chaplain in the United States Army. He should have a holy time with the military doctors.

Bishop Taylor Smith, the Chaplain-General, declares that "what captured Jerusalem was what captured Jericho in the days of old." It requires the eye of faith to perceive the resemblance, for the Bible says the fall of Jericho was preceded by a procession and a blare of trumpets, and the walls of the city fell down. The bishop has enough brass in his forehead to make a trumpet. We wish he would go to Jericho—and stay there.

The Christian World explains to the public that Sir Arthur Yapp learned the art of public speaking in Primitive Methodist Chapels. This must be very consoling to those standing in queues in the hopes of getting food. It may also explain the general suspicion with which the statements of officials are now regarded—

> From all sides comes the query,
> Where's God in all this "scrap"?
> The answer comes, quite cheery
> "Behold, He gave us Yapp!"

Since the above was written, Sir Arthur Yapp has resigned, and is returning to the Y.M.C.A. His reason is that now compulsory rationing is on us, his advocacy of voluntary rationing is no longer required. Sir Arthur might reflect that the advent of compulsory rationing is a commentary upon the success of his campaign.

There is no doubt whatever that the Churches are beginning to feel that they are losing ground rapidly, and that the War, which they hoped to turn to their advantage, is having quite an opposite effect. Thus, at the annual meeting of the Derbyshire Free Church Federation, the speakers were much concerned about the relation of the soldiers to the Church when the War is over. The Rev. W. F. Moulton suggested that they were on the horns of a dilemma. If they kept what was essential to the Churches, they might have the men. And if they got the men, it looked like having to throw overboard much of their teaching. Rev. M. Ackroyd followed on much the same lines, and it is quite clear that these gentlemen know quite well that thousands of soldiers who went out professing Christians are coming back more or less Freethinkers.

One of the latest manifestations of the tender mercy of Providence is a tidal wave and cyclone in Queensland, resulting in a loss of life and large destruction of property.

An illiterate shopkeeper in a poor neighbourhood put a notice in his window with the words "Annual Sell" upon it. The title would be a good one for many Church bazaars

Cardinal Bourne says that Russia has "lost all hold of Christian principles." Presumably, his eminence means that the Greek Church clergy no longer have a place in the sun.

The most popular Christian prayer contains the passage: "Give us this day our daily bread." The answer is to be seen in the food queues.

In spite of the need of the Government for money, we note that no attempt is being made to place a tax upon church buildings. A very large sum of money is lost to the State through all churches and chapels being freed from rates or taxes, and all of this might help pay for the War. But the parasitism of religion is unbounded. The clergy claim exemption from those duties of citizenship that are forced upon other people, and they are freed from paying rates and taxes that fall upon other people.

The tight corner in which the clergy find themselves is shown by the admissions many are making. Thus, the Rev. J. L. Harris, of Kingston:—

> This kind of salvation offered to me by conventional soul-savers seems a selfish thing. It does not appeal to the best manhood in me. If the world is to be saved I want to help; I want to be a saviour too, and I decline to be saved as a special favour, even though churches and priests offer me theological passports and sprinkle me and absolve me. The Saviour who will reach the man of to-day will not only show us something we cannot do without Him, but also something He cannot do without us. He will not only make me feel that He is indispensable to me, but that I am indispensable to Him. I would rather keep my self-respect and go to hell like a man, than lose it and go to heaven like a coward or a pauper.

The closing sentence has been voiced by thousands of Freethinkers who have realized what a selfish and contemptible thing the Christian scheme of salvation is.

Scarcely a week passes in which we do not see a paragraph charging the Kaiser with blasphemy. This betrays on the part of those who write the paragraphs, and the editors who pass them, a deplorable ignorance of English. To blaspheme is to speak irreverently of, or to revile, God. A blasphemer is, therefore, a person who speaks irreverently of, or reviles, God. What evidence have we in any of the published utterances of the Kaiser that he speaks irreverently of, or reviles, God? None whatever. On the contrary, he addresses the Deity with profound reverence, with truly pious adulation, and humble but confident gratitude for favours past and future. This silly form of raving at the Kaiser would be better replaced by silence.

Laudatory paragraphs have appeared in the newspapers concerning a new comedian, Tom Paine, who is to appear at a London theatre. A comic Tom Paine suggests an age of unreason.

There was once another "Tom" Paine, whom the Churches found anything but a comedy. To them he was a tragedy. And although he played his part a century ago, the consequences of his life are still with us. And when history is written with truthfulness, instead of in the interest of established prejudice, it will be found that the nineteenth century produced no greater benefactor to the human race than he who first wrote "The United States of America," and who dreamed of a United States of Europe.

A new anonymous playlet, Annajanska, produced at the London Coliseum, has been attributed to Mr. Bernard Shaw, and among the lines quoted is "All great truths begin as blasphemy." The idea is excellent, but it is hardly original. Many years ago Ingersoll said, "The blasphemers of one generation are the aureole saints of the next."

For sheer mawkish sentiment, or pietistic piffle, we have not seen anything for a long time to compare with the leading article in the British Weekly for January 31. It is entitled "The Cross on the Battlefield"; and the writer takes it for granted that the soldiers in the trenches swallow without demur his antiquated and essentially immoral theology. To the dying on the battlefield, the Editor contends: "the Cross means salvation." Sir William Robertson Nicoll does not know that the Cross means anything of the sort to them, only he ventures "with great humility to conceive their outlook." Judging by what we have read in books, pamphlets, and newspaper articles, by many army chaplains, we do not hesitate to affirm that Sir William is radically mistaken.

Thoughtful young men of to-day do not subject their necks to the yoke of such theological dictatorship as characterizes the British Weekly editorials. Of the dying soldiers it is said in the one now under consideration: "One look of trust saves them." Here is another worse than silly saying: "To be saved by what another has done is their hope." We give our soldiers credit for being too sensible to cherish any such wicked hope. And yet the article in question teems with sayings of that outrageous nature, and is, from first to last, a wildly emotional outburst.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc uses the eye of faith in political as well as religious matters, for he regards Lord Northcliffe as the dictator of this country. Surely, he does too much honour to the proprietor of Comic Cuts.

The Bishop of Carlisle has written to the clergy in Carlisle diocese, asking them to hold themselves in readiness to go out as Army chaplains. What patriotism! These men will go to the Front as non-combatants with the salaries of officers.

What queer ideas the clergy have! Here is the Bishop of Southwark, preaching in Southwark Cathedral on the attractive subject of prostitution. When will these bishops learn that the pressing problem of our time is that there are many millions of Christians arrayed for mutual slaughter.

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, writing in a daily paper, has a sly dig at Mr. H. G. Wells' theological views. He points out that Mr. Wells "imagines his next god as a gentleman in shining armour. It seems somewhat out of date. Why not a tin-helmet and a gas mask?"

The mind of the new science, says a writer in the Times Literary Supplement, "is inclined to synthesis, to monism, to inspired naturalism." We are not quite sure what is inspired naturalism; probably the word is only introduced to help tone down the fact that modern science is irrevocably non-theistic. These are bad times for the kingly rule of gods and the godly rule of kings. Both began pretty well together, and they look like ending together.

The same writer—he is reviewing a new work on the history of Science—asks, "Did not both Wallace and Darwin receive the idea of natural selection in a flash of purest inspiration?" Note the "receive," and the "purest inspiration" in this sentence, and then consider the misleading associations such language is likely to set up. A flash of inspiration is a permissible expression, but it is inspiration from within, not from without. Had Darwin and Wallace not been trained naturalists, with minds well stored with information on a special subject, they could not have offered the world Natural Selection. In other words, their "inspiration" was the outcome of rapid and semi-conscious generalization on a mass of acquired data. There is no mystery in the machinery of inspiration once a little common sense is brought to bear. And for that reason it is not "received." That expression belongs to the pages of theology. There is no legitimate place for it in science.

There is more than an academic interest in noting the use of such expressions. All language reacts on thought, and when a person gets in the habit of using words with definite connotations in another and a special sense, such words are almost certain to mislead. The old associations are there, and they confuse subsequent thinking. "Receiving" a generalization by way of "inspiration" is certain to carry with it the theological connotation, and it establishes a mystery where there is only a rather complex problem to unravel. That is the root reason why we have so often protested against such expressions as the "Religion of Humanity," etc. "Religion" has a fairly definite historic connotation, and it is absurd to expect that it can be used to-day without giving an illicit support to supernaturalism in some form. If a man means that he believes in Naturalism, or Humanism, or morals, there is no reason whatever why he should not say so without associating therewith such an incurably misleading word as "Religion." Definite ideas are the outcome of clear thinking, as definite speech is the outward sign of its existence.

Primitive Methodists have complained to Sir Arthur Yapp that room could not be found for missionaries on boats that carried intoxicating liquors. The obliging Sir Arthur promised to see what could be done. It is very important that the missionary traffic should be encouraged. For while many in the commercial world are bent on capturing German trade, those engaged in the missionary business are equally alert and to the same end. And many of our traders know how much assistance is derived from missionary enterprise.

A new comedy bears the title, A Cushy Job. It is not so soft a job as that of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who gets £15,000 yearly for preaching the Gospel of Poverty.

The King has expressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury his "profound thankfulness" for the general response to his appeal for the Day of Prayer, and the Archbishop has expressed his thanks for the King's help. This expression of pleasure by the two representatives of one of the oldest businesses in history is very touching. But what one would like to know is, what kind of response did God make to all the praying? Were the London and Paris air-raids an expression of his pleasure?

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 17, Leicester; March 3, Sheffield; March 17, Southampton; March 24, Manchester; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.—R. D. Voss (Cape Town), 10s. 6d.; Kepler, 5s. 7d.

S. Elmsley.—Is the fault yours or ours? If you have lived so long on religious "slops" we are not surprised you find the diet we supply rather trying to the digestive organs. Our advice is to "stick it." You cannot expect to acquire robust mental health all at once.

"Puzzled."—There is no ethical idealism in the "sacrifice" of Jesus Christ, save such as is imported into it by semi rationalized Christians. Fundamentally, the death of Jesus is an exercise in god-making. Its roots are anthropological, not ethical. Christians claim to find the ethical ideal only when the true Christian idea is realized as intolerable. They would play the same game with "Old Mother Hubbard" if it paid them to do so.

G. McDermott.—Reprints of the kind you submit, unless there is something on hand that gives them special pertinence, read a trifle forced and out of date. Thanks for the trouble you have taken.

"Sammy."—You will have to take your choice. We were not at the discussion and cannot say, but we think it a questionable act of judgment on either side. Assertions of victory are best left to the judgment of the audience.

W. Wilmer.—Have returned letters. Thanks, very much, for sight of them.

D. Jackson (Derby).—Glad to learn you have recently secured "several new readers." Please keep at it. We consider it work of real national importance.

One of our readers has kindly volunteered to supply the Freethinker for a year to the club of which he is a member, and suggests that other readers might like to follow his example, and thus introduce the paper to new readers.

H. Simpson.—Fitzgerald's Omar can be obtained of Messrs. Macmillan. The price need not be more than 2s. 6d. There are various editions.

D. Cornoch.—We do not know when we are likely to visit Portsmouth again. Glad you have arranged with another newsagent to supply the Freethinker.

J. R. Kelly.—Your P.O. received for Sacerdotal Celibacy. You have omitted to send address. Please let us have this to forward books.

R. D. Voss.—We are doing our best, and are gratified our efforts are so widely appreciated. When easier times come we shall feel quite dull.

R. Chapman.—Sorry the dislocation of the post—due to the air-raid, we presume—prevented your note on Mr. Lloyd's South Shields meetings reaching us in time for last week's issue. Anyway, we are pleased to learn that the meetings were "quite successful," and that the audiences were "delighted." We expected nothing less.

J. Breese.—Too late last week. It is a good sign that so many of the educated men in the Army should be so strongly anti-militaristic. The sense of national duty that carried them into the Army will be needed when the War is over to fight the class in our own country who are almost certain to attempt some form of militarism here.

Mr. H. E. Latimer-Voight sends us a letter protesting against Freethought being mixed up with what he calls "crankeyisms." He thinks the Freethinker should confine itself to the attack on Christianity and other religious superstitions.

L. W. R. Silke (Cape Town).—Thanks for suggestion. We have had such a project in our mind for some time, and will seize the earliest opportunity for putting it into operation.

J. W. Wood.—Very good news indeed. Will write further on the matter next week.

J. Thackray.—Thanks for suggestion. Will consider it.

J. Bunce.—Addresses received. Specimen copies are being sent.

A. Johnson.—We make no charge for inserting lecture notice, nor for any other matter referring to the N. S. S. Lecture notices should be sent on postcards as early as possible in the week, but must be received by first post Tuesday at latest.

A. A. Wildman.—Mr. Cohen has booked Southampton for March 17.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Lloyd pays his second visit to Swansea to-day (February 10). Judging from the accounts of his first visit the success of the meeting is assured. Those who were there before are certain to go again, and we hope that each will not fail to take at least one friend with him.

From our esteemed contemporary, the New York Truthseeker:—

> The Freethinker, we feel confident, will "carry on." It is nearly as old as the Truthseeker, and in the same way indispensable. Its editor, Chapman Cohen, is a Freethinker with no reservation—a man of ideas, with remarkable skill in handling them; the compeer in this respect of his predecessor, George William Foote. The latter induced in us the habit of reproducing his "leaders," and Mr. Cohen makes it impossible for us to desist and reform.

It seems easier to think of the Freethinker and Truthseeker without either England and America than to conceive England and America without these two papers. And we are quite sure both would be poorer places without them. And on that score we are under no great fear. The struggle is hard, and gets harder every month. But both papers have too many friends for them to go under—even under the stress of a world-war.

We may as well do all our blushing this week at once. We venture to reproduce the following from an old subscriber:—

> I enclose cheque for my subscription for ensuing twelve months, adding 50 per cent. as I consider that, under the prevailing conditions, the "Paper of Papers" is well worth 3d. a week.
> Yours is one of the very few publications, at any rate, that have come under my observation, of which one might say that the articles penned re the War, in its earlier stages, could be reprinted practically without amendment to-day! So much for sane thinking and plain speaking. If I were hard-pressed for funds there are many publications to which I should give the "go-by" rather than forgo the weekly intellectual treat provided by the Freethinker.

Seriously, we publish the above because we are aware of the pleasure with which so many of our readers show appreciation of their paper. And whatever credit may be due to our own writings upon a very vexed topic, we can only attribute that to possessing principles, knowing what they are, and sticking to them.

We are glad to see that the new Branche of the N. S. S. at Nuneaton settling down to regular work. Several lectures have been arranged, and to-day (February 10) Mr. Clifford Williams, of Birmingham, will lecture in The Palace, Queen's Road, at 6.30 on "Freethought versus Christianity." We hope to hear of a successful meeting.

The paper famine continues to make itself felt. This week the Clarion raises its price to twopence, and we believe the Labour Leader is to follow suit. Naturally, it is papers representing advanced movements that feel the pinch most, and as they have no reserves of capital to fall back on, and no profits to eat up, even under normal circumstances. And yet the best work of the world is often done by those papers, the maintenance of which, under the most favourable conditions, is a labour of love.

We are pleased to see that the Humanitarian continues its monthly appearance, and that, in spite of nearly four years of war, it still stands for the better side of human nature. There are many better known journals that could be more easily spared. From a note in the last issue, we see that, in the interests, of "war economy," the diet of the inmates of prisons is to be reduced. At its best, prison diet is only just enough to keep a prisoner alive, and to further reduce this seems a doubtful economy, and an almost certain brutality.

Under the name of the New Era Union a vigorous Freethought propaganda has for some years been carried on in Abertillery. The members have now an opportunity of purchasing a very suitable hall, with a number of smaller rooms for committee meetings, &c., for a sum of £900. This is regarded as a good investment, and it is hoped will lead to more efficient work in the locality. A company is being formed to secure the hall, and the Committee will be glad to hear from anyone who feels disposed to invest in the proposed company. The shares are to be £1 each, and the Secretary, Mr. A. J. Cottle, 10, Park Place, Abertillery, Mon., will be glad to furnish all particulars.

We have had a number of applications for literature to be sent to men at the Front, the cost of which is defrayed from the £10 left with the Pioneer Press by Mr. N. Evans. All these requests have been complied with, and we feel sure the literature so sent will be productive of good. We are making this statement here in order to avoid individual replies to those who have written us.

The Orb of Day.

IV.

THE solar prominences, those great sheets of flame which leap from the sun's surface, as well as the wonderful solar corona, were first revealed by the aid of the moon. When the moon covers the face of the sun, and a solar eclipse occurs, the prominences and the corona are clearly seen through the telescope. Recent refinements, however, enable the astro-physicist to view the prominences without our satellite's assistance; but the solar student is still dependent upon eclipses for his observations of the mysterious corona. For it is only when the moon's dark body cuts off direct solar radiation from our globe that the corona which fringes the solar luminary becomes visible.

When viewed from the earth, the sun and moon possess the same apparent diameter. This arises from the remarkable fact that, although the sun's diameter is 400 times larger than the moon's, it is about 400 times distant. Thus the diameters of the solar and lunar orbs appear to us approximately equal.

It is now a mere matter of calculation as to the time of a total or partial eclipse of the sun. Just as the astronomer is able to predict coming eclipses for the next 2,000 years, so can he tell us the date of thousands of eclipses in the past. The motions of the moon being determined, mathematical research resolves the rest. The period of solar eclipses known as the Saros is one of eighteen years and eleven days. Otherwise stated, whenever an eclipse has been visible anywhere on the earth's surface, another is certain to occur after an interval of eighteen years and eleven days. Unfortunately, eclipses frequently happen which cannot be observed, and many deep disappointments have been experienced by astronomers who have journeyed to the ends of the earth to view them, only to discover that clouds and mists precluded all prospect of observing them in the only countries in which they would have been visible.

A total eclipse never lasts more than eight minutes, and usually not more than three. The few minutes available to the observers are therefore of vital importance. When the astronomers have gathered together to witness an approaching eclipse, elaborate preparations are made for the purpose of economizing time and labour. Provided with spectroscopes, photographic telescopes, and various other scientific instruments, the assembled scientists rehearse their arrangements over and over again. The thorough efficiency of their apparatus is thus tested, and the observers become so expert in performing their several parts that, when the critical minutes arrive, every moment is fruitfully occupied in observing the eclipse and its accompaniments. As the moon steals near the sun, a notch is seen on the solar disc, and this, darkening steadily, increases during the succeeding hour and a half, when a narrow crescent is all that remains visible of the sun. The supreme moments are now very near. A mere strip of the sun remains; the orb of day becomes obliterated. A ring of ruddy light encircles the moon, and the pearly-hued corona starts into view.

Many observers have recorded their impressions of a solar eclipse, and all appear to have been immensely moved by the change which comes over the fair face of the earth as the sun vanishes behind the moon. Weird changes are witnessed in the sky. The clouds lose their coloured tints, and assume a solemn and funereal appearance. The temperature falls, and as the period of totality approaches, cold and darkness increase. Professor Smyth, who was present at an eclipse in Norway in 1851, tells us that:—

> After a little time the eyes seem to get accustomed to the darkness, and the looming forms of objects close by could be observed, all of them exhibiting a dull green hue, seeming to have exhaled their natural colour..... Life and animation seemed, indeed, to have now departed from everything around; and we could hardly but fear, against our reason, that if such a state of things were to last much longer, some dreadful calamity would happen to us also, while the lurid horizon northward appeared so like the gleams of departing light in some of the grandest of the works of Martin and Danby that one could not at the time, and in that presence, but believe, in spite of their alleged extravagances, that Nature has opened up to the constant contemplation of their mind's eyes, some of those magnificent revelations of power and glory which others can only get a hasty glimpse of on occasions such as these.

The sun rotates on its axis in a period of about twenty-five days. As the circumference of the sun is over 110 times that of the earth, its speed of rotation is more than four times that of our globe to enable it to revolve in twenty-five days. At its equator, the sun rotates at a rate of more than a mile a second. Dark spots on the solar surface were observed in antiquity, but modern sun-spot research began in the seventeenth century, when the spots were independently discovered by Galileo and others. The invention of the telescope in 1608 preceded the rediscovery of the sun-spots by two years only. These spots vary considerably in number and size, and it was noticed that they travelled across the solar disc in one direction. It was obvious, therefore, that the sun spun on its axis, and the period of solar rotation was thus ascertained by observation of the movements of the spots. When a spot is seen at the centre of the solar disc it will, in the course of six days, be carried to its western edge, and then disappear. At the end of about a fortnight, however, if still in being, it will reappear on the eastern edge.

The frequency of sun-spots fluctuates within a period of eleven years and forty days. In some years few, if any, spots are visible for about six months. This occurred in 1889, and also 1900. After such a dearth, a few will appear in the subsequent year, and during the following five years their numbers increase. Then they will commence to wane until they reach their minimum stage, when they resume their years of increase. From the days of Galileo, these periodic variations have been studied, but it was not until 1825 that Schwabe proved the existence of the law which governs the waxing and the waning of the spots. The year 1904 was a maximum period, while a minimum was reached in 1911. In 1922 few spots will appear, and five years later the spots will be at their greatest frequency, declining again to least frequency in 1933. The solar observer has also established the truth that the spots are mainly restricted to special regions of the solar surface. Very few are found on the sun's equator, but north and south of it they increase in number up to 15 deg. of latitude north or south of the equator, while from 15 deg. to 20 deg. north or south of the equator their frequency attains its maximum. At this latitude the spots decrease, until beyond 30 deg. sun-spots seldom appear.

There is little doubt that the spots are fleeting features displayed by that mantle of radiant clouds embracing the sun, which is termed the photosphere. The impermanence of sun spots arises from the circumstance that they are evolved amid those solar vapours which change almost as rapidly as the clouds of our own atmosphere. Titanic commotions are in constant operation in the photosphere, and spots appear where these disturbances are most pronounced. The old opinion that spots are depressions in the luminous photosphere is no longer tenable. Professor Hale has proved that vast eruptions of gas are incessantly occurring, but that these perturbations are more marked in sun spot regions than elsewhere, and that to these causes sun spot phenomena are due.

In 1885 the equatorial regions of the sun were in a state of constant agitation. In the following year the orb was quite calm, and during the late autumn of 1886 the sun betrayed scarcely a sign of commotion. Other stages of almost complete quiescence have been noted in periods succeeding a time of unusual activity. That huge convulsions are never really absent in the solar interior is a fair deduction. How, then, are we to explain the periodic fluctuations in the magnitude of our luminary's activities which, unquestionably, occur? Instability of the solar envelope exposed to our view presumably arises from the ceaseless interchange between the cooling gases at the exterior and the enormously heated materials from the interior which ascend to occupy their place. That such phenomena are subject to a periodic law is fully in harmony with our experiences of boiling liquids and other substances when heat is generated on a vast scale. Ball recalls Tyndall's brilliant theory of the periodicity of geysers, the truth of which that celebrated physicist established by designing an artificial geyser which reproduced the requisite results. The chain of reasoning runs as follows:—

> If the thermal phenomena of the geyser, depending as they do, on the passage of heat from the inside to the outside, take place, not gradually but by a violent outbreak at intervals which recur with tolerable regularity, is it not likely that a somewhat similar periodicity should be manifested in the sun? It is true that the interval between two outbreaks of a geyser is measured only by hours, or by days, while the interval between two periods of exuberant solar activity is measured by a decade of years. But this discrepancy is not more than might be expected from a consideration of the mighty scale on which the phenomena of solar activity are exhibited.

Extending sometimes to a height of 300,000 miles from the sun's limb, there are vast sheets of rosy flame. These solar prominences are as much part of the lord of day as the atmosphere is of our globe. First revealed at times of eclipse, they are now studied with the telescope and spectroscope in normal sunlight, and splendid photographs are obtained by means of Professor Hale's spectro-heliograph. The luminous ball of fire that we ordinarily see is the photosphere, but beyond its margin vast volumes of gaseous materials float in the solar atmosphere.

It is now known that the sun is surrounded by a shell of coloured gas which fringes the photosphere. This shell is the chromosphere which, owing to the intense heat of the sun, is subjected to violent agitation. During these disturbances immense volumes of glowing gases are urged outwards from the chromosphere, and these form the fiery prominences. The methods devised by Huggins, Janssen, and Lockyer—those of spectrum analysis—have demonstrated that the chromosphere is composed of prodigious masses of glowing gas. So thoroughly have the prominences which leap upwards from the chromosphere been studied, that even the wavings of these giant masses of incandescent gases have been detected. Very frequently as he watches the movements of the prominences the astronomer witnesses the decline and extinction of a mighty sheet of coloured flame, while sometimes he becomes the fascinated spectator of the sudden appearance of a new solar display of flaming gas. These solar spectacles are, at times, extremely transient. The sun's flames rise and fal with remarkable rapidity. One observed by M. Trouvelot attained an enormous height, but its entire extinction was merely a matter of minutes. The velocity of these incandescent substances is amazing, for 375 miles per second is a quite moderate estimate of the speed with which they ascend from that shell of solar clouds — the chromosphere — when urged by the giant energies of the solar mass.

John Smith in Khaki.

A Note on His Manners, Morals, and Religion.

TOMMY ATKINS was once a specific type—the professional rank and file soldier. A better name, perhaps, for the present-day soldier would be John Smith; for he is no longer a type, but is become a whole nation. There are those who still endeavour to treat Tommy as the old Tommy, showering adulation on him while they throw cheap abuse on his countrymen. But it will not do. The Army is now England, and England is the Army. It should be understood, then, that these remarks refer, not particularly to soldiers as soldiers, but just to Englishmen (or Britons if you like), so far as it is possible to strike an average, where the vices and virtues, and views and opinions, of such a heterogenous body of men as the citizens of this Empire are concerned.

Readers of this journal do not need telling that the clergy are very unreliable guides in this matter. Parsons are prepared, according to the particular "stunt" they have on hand, to dwell upon the intense religious feeling of the average soldier and sailor—to tell you how he treasures his devotional books and with what ecstatic joy he joins in the hymns, and with what regularity he says his evening prayers, or to make their hearers' flesh creep by doleful and grossly exaggerated accounts of his sexual irregularities when missionary work is the order of the day.

Everyone is familiar with Carlyle's summing-up of Englishmen as "mostly fools." Although all of us, at times, quote this saying with approval whenever we see the crowd bent on something which strikes us as foolish, this jibe cannot be accepted as an accurate statement of fact. The average Englishman is no fool. He is no genius, true; but he is very far from stupid, and it is the positive quality of stupidity that marks a man off as a fool as distinguished from the man of average intelligence who sometimes acts foolishly, as who of us does not?

The trouble with the Englishman's head is not its lack of brain power (for the Anglo-Saxon is quite as intelligent as anybody else) but a certain want of balance. He is so concentrated upon what he thinks of as the practical things of life, that he has no time for theorizing. Abstractions he neither understands nor respects. Enough for him to find out how to deal with the immediate problems of life as they arise. How to provide his daily bread, not to mention a little reasonable luxury; how to keep healthy, solvent, and amused—these are his first cares. Unfortunately, they are too often his last cares also. He is taught to perfect himself in the routine of life, and not bother his head with general principles further than may be necessary for the development of technical skill. He is supplied with a ready-made explanation of the Universe, and a ready-made code of morals. These are fixed on to him at an age when his critical faculties are in embryo. He is made to swallow them by fraud. I say fraud deliberately: it consists in teaching as unquestioned facts doctrines that the teacher knows to be the objects of bitter controversy. The interdependence of morals and religion is forced into him by constant repetition, until prejudice has taken possession of the youthful mind; and though, once freed from the influence of school, he may learn that the truth of his religion is open to question—or even that it it is demonstrably false—he will rarely succeed in shaking off the feeling that, false or true, it is generally safer and more convenient to refrain from attacking religion on account of its connection with morality.

From my daily intercourse with him—and present conditions afford one far better opportunities of familiarity with all sorts and conditions of men than is possible as a civilian—I say without hesitation that John Smith is not religious. He has no belief in God or religion worthy of the name, though he rarely expresses positive disbelief in these things. In a word, he is indifferent.

In the Army, although no one really cares a tinker's curse about your religion, you are continually called upon to state it. Before you can have a tooth extracted or a stitch put in your hand, you must declare your opinion as to the origin of the universe and the destiny of all things, using the label of the particular sect with whom you have deposited your thinking apparatus. The favourite, by long odds, is the short and sweet "C.E." What this stands for depends upon the man who uses it. To me (for I will shock you all, dear readers, by the admission that I use it frequently and unblushingly) it means, "Mind your own business." To the great majority it means, "I don't care a damn which"; while to a few—a very few—it denotes their firm belief in that highly respectable institution, the Church of England.

Church Parade is often optional, we all know. This means that, if you don't care a button what happens to you, you can generally get out of it. Not that would-be martyrs for Freethought can find any good field for their activities by valiantly refusing to attend "Divine Service." They would not find an enraged Chaplain clamouring to have them shot at dawn. He would probably be too busy playing dominoes to bother about that. They might find themselves spending their Sunday on some nasty "fatigue"—and the jobs that are reserved for troublesome men are most unpromising from the martyr's point of view. When you realize that going to church is just a military duty, like going on guard or cookhouse, it simply comes to a toss-up whether you elect to be bored for an hour at church or for several hours at the barracks. Here let me offer a useful tip to those whose exemptions are nearly up. Call yourself an Atheist if you feel like it, but, if not, "C.E." is the horse to back. Do not, for the love of Allah, go in for Methodism. They take you seriously there, and instead of a short, bright, and breezy sermon, your ears are tortured for what seems an age.

So much for Church Parade being "optional." I would wager a pound of sugar to a temperance tract that if only those went who really wanted to worship, the Chaplain would have to waste his precious words on empty pews. A few yawning anglers for promotion—a thin sprinkling of the devout—and that would be all.

Now, what does the man in the street that was, or the man in khaki that is, really believe? Not only in the Army, but perhaps out of it too, he would, if called upon to state his belief, say without any conscious hypocrisy, "Oh, Church of England," or "Catholic," or "Congregationalist." But pursue your investigation, if he will let you, and endeavour to get past his label and penetrate what Mr. Wells would call his "hinterland" of personality. If your experience agrees with mine, you will find that, in nine cases out of ten, a man's declared belief signifies little more than a lazy acquiescence in the adoration of the Lares and Penates of his parents. He comes from Dublin—he is a Roman Catholic; from Scotland—he is a Presbyterian. This applies, I say, to nine out of ten. The tenth man I will consider later. The religious belief of the great majority of men with whom I have succeeded in discussing the question has always resolved itself into a vague kind of feeling, rather than reasoned conviction, that somehow, somewhere—there is something; a power—a misty personality—they know not how to express it. Now, the one essential thing that marks the bounds of Theism and Atheism is a belief in supernatural personality. To say "God is Love" or "God is supreme Power," or things like that, is really to express Atheism if personality is not intended to be understood. "Love" and "power" alone are mere abstractions. The question is, "Does the average man believe in supernatural personality?" not "Does he believe in something he calls God?" My opinion is that he has a belief—ever so faint though it be—in the existence of a personal God. That belief, probed to the bottom, is so vague as almost to baffle examination and criticism, but it is there. In other words, though not an Atheist, he stands at the borderline of Atheism. Needless to say, this belief is not something attained, but something *re*tained. It is the last rag of theological prejudice that the winds of common sense and human experience have not yet succeeded in tearing from his naked soul.

The morals of John Smith are, perhaps, even more elusive than his religion. Here, again, you have to distinguish between the conventional views of morality which a man affects to hold and the real motives that dominate his conduct. Apart from the vigilance of the police and the retribution of the law, there is the far more significant influence of the development of social sense among the people. The line once so clearly drawn between ethical and mental aberration is fading away, and we are beginning to realize that crime, like madness, is a disease of the brain. It is to be hoped that some day the folly of crime will be so apparent that not only will it be applied to individuals, but the idea will be introduced into international politics. However, I am not now discussing nations but persons, and in that more limited province it is good to see that sane ideas of right and wrong are replacing the barbarous old doctrines of retributive justice, and the divine right of the Top Dog.

John Smith has a real respect for the rights of property—especially his own. Gradations of larceny are rather more finely cut in the Army than elsewhere. In the order from guilt to innocence you can "steal," "pinch," "win," or "take" a thing to which you have no established legal right. For instance, you "steal" a comrade's trousers (and God help you if you are caught) you "pinch" his blankets (these are not charged up to him; if lost he just has to pinch some one else's). Anything you can get from the canteen you "win," because canteens are always regarded by the soldier as dens of thieves, and there is no sin in getting a little bit of his own back when occasion allows. Not one soldier in ten thousand would rob a "Soldiers' Rest" of a penny piece, but very few would hesitate to win anything from a canteen. Lastly, you "take" a tool, or a pencil, or a broom without hesitation, and without a second thought, if you have mislaid your own Ca va sans dire. Possession is nine points of the law, and to secure the tenth you carve your initials on it and stick to it—while you can. Findings, I need hardly add, are keepings.

Ideas of sexual rectitude are so dependent on the constitution of the individual that it is very hard to generalize them. The difficulty is enhanced by the continual efforts of the "Moralist" to confuse the different issues of decency and chastity. Of all the ill services that the Christian religion has rendered mankind, perhaps the most lasting mischief has resulted from the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, with its necessary implication of the essential uncleanness of the sexual relationship. Animals do not revel in filth—they try to be as clean as possible, and, I believe, the human animal is no exception. The substratum of nastiness that underlies the superficial cleanliness of mind of so many men is not a natural part of their normal development. It is one of the nauseous excrescences of a prurient religion. Christianity dragged into the mire of indecency—the most prominent and essential attribute of humanity and all life, with the inevitable result that men and women have become ashamed of the very forms and functions that comprise their being. Christian priests have been dinning into the ears of the people the atrocious lie that the sexual act is the twin sister of beastliness for so many centuries, that it is small wonder the same lie has contaminated them as it has done. I say, without hesitation, that the greater part of the moral disease that afflicts us to-day is directly traceable to the Christian religion.

Society News.

West Central Hall (London).—During February we shall continue to hold meetings on Sunday afternoons, and we hope our London friends will advertise them as widely as possible. Mr. Snell's interesting address on Palestine was keenly followed by a good audience, and led up to a lively discussion. To-day, Mr. Ratcliffe will lecture on Spiritualism—a topic which is exciting a good deal of interest at the present time. —E. M. VANCE, Gen. Sec.

North London Branch N. S. S.—Mr. George Ives delivered a most enlightening lecture on "Primitive Man" to a very good audience. A good discussion followed. To-night, Mr. Baker and Mr. Wilde will debate. The subject, 'Is the Roman Catholic Church an Enemy to Democracy?" should excite great interest in the light of present events.—H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec.

South Shields Branch N. S. S.—Our latest lecture ventures at South Shields have been quite as successful as could possibly be expected in these trying times. Mr. Cohen's visit brought all his old friends who could secure travelling facilities, and welcome assistance from Sunderland, Newcastle, Cramlington, and Fence Houses well-wishers. Mr. Lloyd, in ideal weather following the storm and wreck, had a warm reception in the afternoon, and for the evening meeting every seat in the lecture hall was occupied. His logic and eloquence surprised the inquiring visitors who had been specially invited to attend to hear his interesting discourse upon various issues of Rationalism and supernaturalism. The new feature of vocal and instrumental music preceding the evening lecture also met with the heartiest approbation; and a few words of appeal from the local Secretary brought three new members to strengthen the Branch for future undertakings—a very satisfactory result, all things considered, and calculated to assure us that when the high-pressure system and overstrain everywhere passes away we can depend upon a fair measure of support for the Secular Cause.—R. CHAPMAN, Sec.

South London Branch, N.S.S.—On Sunday evening our hall was crowded with an audience of nearly 100 persons, who had gathered to hear a debate on "Did Jesus Ever Live?" between Mr. Noah Bayley (Christian Evidence Society) and Mr. Howell Smith, B.A. (N.S.S.). The debate was conducted on both sides with the greatest decorum and good temper, and the audience took a great interest in the question. It was certainly a novelty at a debate to allow the audience to ask questions of either disputant at the close, and several took the opportunity of getting obscure points cleared up. Next Sunday Mr. T. F. Palmer should have a good audience, when he will relate "The Story of the Evolution of Life."—V. ROGER.

Obituary.

The many friends of Mr. Jack Hecht, of Edmonton, will regret to hear that another severe blow has fallen upon him in the death of his mother. Mrs. Hecht, who had reached her 76th year, had endured much suffering both physical and mental in a long life of devoted self-sacrifice. Fate decreed that the son, whose home she shared, was debarred from taking a last farewell of the mother he so tenderly loved. To him and to his brave and loyal wife we extend our keenest sympathy. The Secular Burial Service was read on Tuesday last in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Hecht and their friends at Edmonton Cemetery by Mr. J. T. Lloyd, who had performed the same sad office for Mr. Hecht, senior, four years ago.—E. M. VANCE.

[Owing to dislocation of the post by air-raids, this Obituary did not appear in last week's issue. We tender our regrets to all concerned.—ED.]

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Religion in the Army.

Ever since the War opened we have had very strongly in mind the question of religion in the Army. We have written many scores of letters and penned numerous paragraphs concerning the position of Freethinkers, first under the Derby scheme, and then under the Military Service Act—both, when first entering the Army and when serving in the ranks. On the question of taking the oath, and the statement of the recruits' religious opinions, the position was soon made clear. We do not know how far a couple of letters sent by us to the Minister of War during 1914 and 1915 contributed to the result, but in January, 1916, the following instruction was issued by the Army Council, which we published soon after it was issued, although it may serve a useful purpose in again printing it :—

ARMY COUNCIL INSTRUCTION.

No. 179 of January, 1916.

War Office, 21st January, 1916.

179. Religious denomination of a Recruit on attestation.

It has recently come to the knowledge of the Army Council that in certain cases Recruiting Officers and others when filling up the attestation papers of recruits enlisting in the Regular Army on a Duration of the War engagement, or in the Territorial Force, are in the habit of asking them to state their religious denominations. It is therefore necessary to point out that on the attestation papers referred to there is no printed question as to religion, and no question on the subject should be addressed to a recruit at the time of his attestation.

In this connection attention is drawn to W. O. letters 27/Gen. No./2514 (Chaplains), of 23rd Nov., 1914, and 27/Gen. No./4279 (Chaplains), of 30th June, 1915, and all Officers and N.C.Os are reminded that whenever it may be necessary to obtain information as to a soldier's religion, as for instance for the completion of his identity disc., etc., his own statement on that point should be taken without any attempt to influence him, and should be acted on without question.

27/Gen. No./5063 (A.G. 2B).

By Command of the Army Council.

This was quite satisfactory, and any difficulty experienced was due to the want of acquaintance of the officials with the regulations. An officer is bound to take the answer as given to the question: "What Religion?" He is not warranted in using any kind of pressure, or in entering upon any inquisition. He must take down the reply, and any soldier has the right to enter himself as of no religion, or as Freethinker, Agnostic, or Atheist. He is also, of course, absolved from taking any religious oath. These rights are secured to him by law, and by the Army regulations. Any officer who traverses these regulations is exceeding his duty.

Church Parade.

Up to this point no soldier has any ground for complaint. The pity is that the same wise liberality is not continued through the whole of a soldier's career. Once in the Army, there is "Church Parade," which may be either compulsory or voluntary. It is quite impossible to say how many soldiers like this Church Parade, but it is quite certain that the majority very heartily dislike it. Indeed, it is not too much to say that, were Church Parades really and wholly voluntary, the practice would soon die out altogether. It is not the men who want these Church Parades; nor, we believe, do the majority of officers. It is the Chaplains attached to the Army who ask for them. Their interest in the matter is, obviously, almost aggressively professional. And it is certainly anomalous that, after allowing a man on joining the Army to dispense with all religious formulæ, after even writing him down as Freethinker or Atheist, he should be ordered to attend a church service in which he has recorded his convinced disbelief! It is really taking away with the one hand what is given with the other. The liberty of conscience permitted on entering the Army is virtually denied afterwards. We suggest, therefore, that on this matter soldiers should be permitted the same liberty as civilians. If they wish to attend a church service, they should be permitted to do so. If they wish to stop away, that also should be permitted. And we are quite sure that no one would be a worse man, or a less efficient soldier, because his opinions on religion were treated with consideration and respect.

A Ridiculous Situation.

As is usual with religion in a civilized country, there is something laughably foolish in the retention of compulsory religious attendance in the Army. If religious observance be essential to the maintenance of discipline, or efficiency, or of good behaviour, two things should follow. First, Freethinkers should not be enrolled at all, for it is clearly useless to make a man go through a performance which he tells you plainly beforehand he does not believe in. And if only believers were admitted, compulsion would be a mere form; all its awkward features would disappear. Second, if religion is necessary for the purposes above stated, it is the duty of the Army authorities, or the Government, to say what religion is to be followed. For the soldier, it will be observed, is—quite properly—not permitted a choice in other directions. He is not allowed to choose his uniform, or his weapons, or his drill, or where he shall go or what he shall do. All these things are properly settled for him, and the reason is that their settlement makes for efficiency. But in the matter of religion a very wide choice is given. A man may choose from quite a number of religions—Mohammedanism, Brahmanism, Roman Catholicism, Methodism, Presbyterianism, and other religious odds and ends. Men from the same regiment will be selected, and each lot ordered to go away and follow the observances of a religion the non-observance of which they believe will damn the rest. A sense of humour would make a camp resound with laughter before and after, if not during, a Church Parade. And when these variegated religious services are over, the men will return to their ordinary life with all the religious distinctions obliterated—except on their identification discs. One simply cannot escape the conclusion that, so far as discipline, efficiency, and behaviour are concerned, religion doesn't matter—to anyone except the chaplains.

A Move by the War Office.

But we are naturally concerned with the compulsory Church attendance, so far as it affects Freethinkers. And here it is pleasing to note that the number of compulsory Church Parades are on the decline—while the voluntary ones are so much a farce that they, too, are getting fewer. Mr. R. H. Rosetti—whose letter appears in another column—states that in his battalion compulsory Church Parade is abandoned. That is good news, and it is only what one would expect. The vast majority of British officers are gentlemen—in other than the cant sense of the word—and it must be irksome to them to order men to go through so solemn a farce as a Church Parade, which they know the men regard as a folly and not necessary to their duties as soldiers, and in which the officer himself often does not believe. From certain sources, the nature of which we are not at liberty to disclose, we learn that the War Office is becoming more alive to the existence of this easily removable hardship, and we are informed by a trusted correspondent that the Authorities are inquiring for particulars of men who have "been the victims of persecution." We do not think "persecution," as ordinarily understood, is the right word to use. The grievance is that when a Church Parade is ordered, men can only be excused on the ground of illness or other duties. And the officers have, we understand, no power to excuse men from attendance, save on those grounds. The result is that men who ask for exemption are, when the exemption is granted, confined to barracks during the time the rest of the regiment is at church, or else told off to perform some kind of "fatigue duty," more or less disagreeable. Naturally, this is looked upon as being a kind of punishment, and thousands who would gladly stay away from church regard attendance as the less disagreeable of the alternatives offered. If the War Office were to conduct an inquiry on these lines, we feel sure it would discover that the abolition of compulsory Church Parade in the Army would be regarded as a real boon by the men, and it would relieve the officers of what is often a disagreeable duty.

The Modern Trend.

Against any possible plea of necessity for compulsory religious service there are two outstanding facts. In the French Army, the praise of which we have been singing for nearly four years, compulsory, even official religious service does not exist The French soldier can play his part as a man without being marched off to Church at the command of his superiors. In the American Army, the praise of which we are beginning to sing, there is an official religious service, but attendance is voluntary. What reason is there for maintaining as necessary in the British Army a practice that is not found necessary with the two greatest of our Allies? Is the British Army dependent upon what both the French and American Armies can do without? All the retention of this practice means is, that England is behind other countries in this respect. The whole trend of modern life is to divorce the secular State from religious control. We see that taking place in the general affairs of the State, where the holding of office is becoming independent of religious opinion, and in the growing agitation for exclusively Secular Education in State schools. In France, the complete example has been set. There is no religion in the official life of the State—there is none in the schools; there is none in the Army. The ideal of duty, of love of one's fellows, of a sense of oneness with the rest of the community, is enough. This position has yet to be realized here, but it is coming. At any rate, we have decided that in civilian life what religion a man follows, or whether he follows any at all, is his own private concern; it has nothing to do with the State. All that we are asking is that the same principle shall apply to the Army. There is no reason why a man should be called upon to sacrifice his sense of personal dignity, or to take part in what, to him, may be a meaningless, absurd, or harmful religious service, because he has donned a military uniform. Soldiers will not be worse soldiers because they become better men. And in a War that is claimed to be a war for the freedom of the world, it is something of a stroke of satire to insist that those who are fighting it shall be compelled to participate in a religion in which they do not believe, which adds nothing to their efficiency as soldiers, and that repeats formulæ and expresses beliefs of which the more intelligent part of the world is growing ashamed.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Newest Apologetic.

III.

THE arguments against the truth of Christianity are both numerous and cogent, and no attempts to refute them have ever been successful. In his Achievements of Christianity, Mr. Mozley undertakes to deal with four of them, the first of which being "that Christianity, when it had the power to do so, discouraged free inquiry, and accordingly impeded the course of learning and knowledge." This is a serious charge, and deserves to be seriously treated; but Mr. Mozley fails to bring forward any facts in disproof of it. We frankly admit that "the intellectual activity of the Middle Ages is a patent fact." The schoolmen did a good deal of hard thinking, even if it resulted in no practical benefit to the world. Thomas Aquinas was an intellectual giant, and the Church can legitimately boast of many such both in ancient and modern times; but this fact does not show that the Church favoured free inquiry. Indeed, Mr. Mozley himself admits that she did not, and endeavours to justify her conduct. "For the men of the Middle Ages," he says, "Christian doctrines were bedrock realities; they naturally disapproved of whatever seemed inconsistent therewith." We do not blame the Church for her protection of what she regarded as sound teaching, or for her efforts to stamp out whatever seemed to her inimical thereto. We also recognize the fact that "very wide latitude was allowed to thinkers like Duns Scotus and William of Ockham, though their metaphysics must have seemed almost subversive of first principles." We go a step further and agree that "it is impossible to imagine the later Middle Ages as a time when learning was at a discount"; but it was Christian learning that flourished then. Learning, as such, has always been looked upon by the Church as an enemy of the faith. Mr. Mozley declares that many of the greatest scientists, such as Copernicus, Kepler, and Galileo, "have either been orthodox Christians, or have at least stood on the Christian side," but he forgets that the Copernican system lay under the condemnation of the Church for many years. Copernicus himself and several of his disciples were authoritatively denounced, in 1616, for teaching that the earth moved. Lecky says:—

> It is, indeed, marvellous that science should ever have revived amid the fearful obstacles theologians cast in her way. Together with a system of Biblical interpretation so stringent, and at the same time so capricious, that it infallibly came into collision with every discovery that was not in accordance with the unaided judgments of the senses, and therefore with the familiar expressions of the Jewish writers, everything was done to cultivate a habit of thought the direct opposite of the habits of science. The constant exaltation of blind faith, the countless miracles, the childish legends, all produced a condition of besotted ignorance, of grovelling and trembling credulity that can scarcely be paralleled except among the most degraded barbarians. Innovation of every kind was regarded as a crime; superior knowledge excited only terror and suspicion (The Rise of Influence of Rationalism in Europe, vol. i., pp. 274-5).

Mr. Mozley maintains that the condemnation of Galileo "is quite irrelevant to the main question"; but we fail to see how the irrelevancy is made out. Galileo was by no means an exemplary character; but it was his teaching, not his character, that the Inquisition pronounced pernicious. His offence was the declaration that the earth moved, which was in direct contradiction of the generally accepted statement that the "sun runneth about from one end of heaven to the other," while "the foundations of the earth are so firmly fixed that they cannot be moved." Science was frowned upon merely because it could not be harmonized with Scripture. What does Mr. Mozley think of the Church's treatment of Roger Bacon? Why was that great scientist flung into prison, where he remained for fourteen years? Was it for some irregularities in his moral character, or for the expression of opinions antagonistic to orthodox theology? The truth is that Roger Bacon was punished because he pursued his studies in a spirit of free inquiry, which the Papacy could not tolerate. Mr. Mozley refers to the number of European universities which were founded between the twelfth and the fourteenth centuries, but he omits to tell us that science, as such, was not allowed to be taught in them. Chemistry, geology, and astronomy, in particular, were directly subversive of the Christian Creed, and the Church was determined to prevent them from being taught. Scientific experiments were prohibited because the discoveries made by means of them undermined the Bible. Roger Bacon was a professor for several years in the University of Paris towards the close of the thirteenth century, and he had the audacity to make a violent attack upon the ignorance and vices of the clergy, as well as upon the false system of education in schools and colleges. The immoralities of which the clergy were guilty went unpunished, though perfectly well known to the ecclesiastical authorities; but the introduction of scientific discoveries that threw discredit upon Scripture was a crime that could not be tolerated for a moment, and so pioneers like Bacon, Bruno, and many others, were imprisoned, tortured, and, in numerous instances, put to death.

Our contention is that the Church has never encouraged free inquiry, or been the friend of learning and knowledge. Indeed, ever since her advent to power, under Constantine, her conduct of affairs has been open to grave suspicion. This is what Mr. Mozley says in his book:—

> At the accession of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, to complete dominion in 321, the heathen population of the Empire may still have been nineteen-twentieth of the whole; it was certainly in an overwhelming preponderance (p. 32).

This is a point of enormous importance. As is well known, Gibbon estimates the number of Christians, at Constantine's accession, as only one in twenty of the entire population of the empire. That estimate was accepted as essentially accurate by the late Bishop Lightfoot, and Bishop Boyd-Carpenter is not able successfully to challenge it. Now, though the Pagans were overwhelmingly in the majority, the Christian religion was adopted as the only religion for the Empire, while all the Pagan cults were proscribed and finally extirpated. Under Constantine, laws against Paganism were passed, but not systematically executed. The prohibited worship was permitted to continue. The imperial delays greatly annoyed the clergy, but they did not openly rebel. The first full-blooded persecutor of Paganism was Theodosius the Great, who was in a state of cowardly subserviency to one of the most notorious bigots that ever lived, Ambrose, the Bishop of Milan, under whom Augustine was converted. That eloquent prelate was a man who did not hesitate to sink every principle of honesty, truth, and justice when the interests of his creed were at stake; and Theodosius was little more than his willing tool. Acting under the spell of the Ambrosian and Augustinian bigotry, he rallied all available resources in a gigantic attempt to put a complete end to Paganism. He fought with might and main for the full establishment of the Catholic faith. In thirty years the Pagan religions were finally extinguished throughout the Roman Empire. By the beginning of the fifth century Christianity had succeeded, mainly either through the fear, or by actual use, of the sword, in supplanting all rivals for the suffrage of the people. Of course, all Pagan schools were closed, and, in consequence, ignorance and superstition grew apace. Secular knowledge was despised and suppressed. Whewell says that "during a considerable period of the history of the Christian Church, and by many of its principal authorities, the study of natural philosophy was not only disregarded but discommended." In the middle of the eighth century an Irish saint, named St. Virgilius, both loved and cultivated scientific knowledge, and when in Bavaria he expressed his belief in the existence of the Antipodes, with the result that the whole religious world was beside itself with wrath against him. Mr. Mozley thinks most highly of the fourteenth century, ignoring the fact that it was in this age of universities the astronomer Cecco d'Ascoli was burnt. Copernicus was condemned by Catholics and Protestants alike. Of him Luther said:—

> This fool wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy; but sacred Scripture tells us that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, and not the earth.

The universities of the Middle Ages, of which Mr. Mozley is so proud, are thus seen to have been compelled to teach the Ptolemaic System of the World when it was known to be false.

Geology fared even worse, because it discredited the Mosaic cosmogony and disproved the Pauline belief as to the origin of death. The theologians were determined to crush the new science out of existence. The conflict continued till within living memory. But the Church was violently opposed not only to the sciences, but also to Greek and Roman literature; the only literature worthy of study being that contained in the Bible. "After Jesus Christ," said Tertullian, "all curiosity, after the Gospel, all inquiry, are unnecessary." In classical education that Father could see "only a robbery of God." Writing an angry letter to a bishop, Gregory the Great said: "I hear that you have committed the unspeakable crime of teaching profane letters." One of the chief faults of Pope Leo X. was that he devoted himself to the curiosities of profane studies, and called to the sanctuary of religion men who were better acquainted with Greek fables than with the history of the Church and the doctrines of the Fathers. Indeed, there were men in Holy Orders who prided themselves upon their dense ignorance. Gregory of Tours, a Frankish historian, said, "Why should I blush for my rusticity, since the Lord, our Redeemer and God, chose for the destruction of the vanity of worldly wisdom, not orators, but fishermen; not philosophers, but rustics. As Compayre well says:—

5781.1.A

> If the early doctors of the Church occasionally expressed some sympathy for profane letters, it is because in their youth, before having received baptism, they had themselves attended the pagan schools. But these once closed, Christianity did not open others, and after the fourth century, a profound night enveloped humanity. The labour of the Greeks and Romans was as though it had never been.

Baronius, the famous annalist of the Catholic Church, delivers this significant judgment:—

> The tenth century was an iron age, barren of all goodness; a leaden age, abounding in all wickedness; and a dark age, remarkable above all others for the scarcity of writers and men of learning.

With all these incontrovertible facts in mind we deliberately repeat the charge that "Christianity, when it had the power to do so, discouraged free inquiry and, accordingly, impeded the course of learning and knowledge," and declare that Mr. Mozley's answer to it "obviously will not do at all." He ignores the facts that count, and cites only wholly irrelevant ones.

The Great Saint Bernard.

Bernard Shaw, the Man and His Work, by Herbert Skimpole. Allen & Unwin; 1918.

George Bernard Shaw: His Life and Works, by Professor Henderson.

Bernard Shaw, by A. Hamon.

THE whirligig of time brings strange revenges. Much that the Philistine disclaimed some years ago, the middle-class man adores to-day. But nowhere has the reversal of positions been so rapid or so absolute as in literature. The Socialist writers ran a great risk, for they were odious, unpopular, and were supposed to exhibit the worst features of petty political propaganda. William Morris is now a classic; Edward Carpenter addresses a large and ever-increasing audience; and Bernard Shaw is one of the foremost literary figures in the public mind. And Shaw possesses an effrontery like Casanova, a readiness and an irreverence equal to that of Panurge, and a brain as brilliant as Machiavelli. "It is roses, roses all the way."

After these happenings, it is not so astonishing that Mr. Shaw's biography should be written by a university professor, who hails from the land of "tall statements and tall buildings." Even his latest critic is a full-blooded American citizen, who throws bouquets at Mr. Shaw from across the Atlantic. To Mr. Skimpole, Shaw appears as a serious rival to Shakespeare and Sheridan, whilst Professor Henderson likens him to "a genial Celtic Mephistopheles"; and both insist on his seriousness as a writer. A continental critic, Mons. Hamon, declares Shaw to be "the English Moliere," which is a graceful compliment to the most brilliant living English man of letters. This wide concensus of opinion is remarkable, for the purely parochial success of an ordinary writer sinks into insignificance beside a reputation of this kind.

The underlying seriousness of Bernard Shaw's work cannot be ignored. For Shaw, despite his chameleon-like changes, always maintains stoutly the rottenness of the prevailing ideals. He criticizes these ideals in his novels, his dramas, his musical, sociological, and theatrical reviews. He sets up these ideals, strips them, and puts them to the test, and the ordeal is the cleansing fire of truth and the scalding water of satire. So thorough is the process that few impostures may walk and live. He is so much more than a merely brilliant author. Underlying all his wit and irony, you find a sanity, a balanced good sense, which mere smartness lacks. Occasionally, of course, as an Irishman, he justifies his reputation as a "Celtic Mephistopheles," and grins under his cock's feathers, as in his attacks on Shakespeare and the Elizabethans, and his attitude on religion. But the total impression left by his work is of a man grappling earnestly and seriously with social and theological problems, not of a clown grinning through a horse-collar. And that impression is very welcome, for, as Heine says finely, "unless wit is based on seriousness it is only a sneeze of the reason."

Shaw has not the temperament which suffers fools gladly, and when he is annoyed he is merciless. He sees all round a subject. Is he writing to Benjamin Tucker, the apostle of Individualism, he will tell him that true Individualism can only be reached through Socialism. When addressing Socialists, he will warn them of the dangers of Socialism to individual liberty. He will jibe at religious people for their barbarism, and scoff at Freethinkers for their devotion to science. When he belonged to the Shelley Society, he told the members bluntly that he expected all the members were Atheists, Republicans, and Vegetarians, and nearly broke up the Society on the spot. Sometimes the victims get angry, but the ready Irish wit comes to the rescue, and the jester is again forgiven for his audacity.

After all, Shaw's plays contain his most valuable work. He has been at great pains to emphasize his technique and his philosophy, and to explain that his technique is old and his philosophy is new. Frankly, neither is originally Shavian. The one is seen clearly in Henrik Ibsen, and the other plainly conveyed from Nietzsche and Schopenhauer. But Shaw's comedy is interesting and valuable. He has re-introduced high comedy on the English stage. So far as England is concerned, the comic spirit, as George Meredith so admirably calls it, has had few chances between Bernard Shaw and the Restoration dramatists. And, remember, the main secret of Congreve and Wycherley's interplay of character is not mere depravity. It is the absolute equality of equipment with which men and women pitch their battles of wit.

There is no question of Shaw's genius. The impress of his unique personality is on all his work. Even his newspaper articles retain their freshness and survive the test of republication triumphantly. They are the work of a brilliant, clever, and witty man. With a strong, haughty, careless nonchalance he has expressed himself very freely. He once asked: "Who is Hall Caine?" and people have not done laughing yet. His phrases hit. "Sardoodledom" is not a compliment to the popular author of La Tosca. "Bardolatry" is applied to the worship of Shakespeare. His famous retort, "Sir Edward Grey is himself a Junker," was merciless. And so was his advice to the Free Churches that, if they were wise, they would place busts of Voltaire in their buildings. Shaw is too much in earnest to be impartial. "I have never claimed for myself the divine attribute of justice," he says blandly. His life's work is a siege laid to the social and religious abuses of his time by an author who had to cut his way into them at the point of his sword, and throw some of the defenders into the moat.

Mons. Hamon is right in pointing out Shaw's affinity to Moliere, for he has the same indomitable commonsense, his capacity for crusading, and the acidity of his sarcasm. Listen!:—

> A theatre to me is a place where two or three are gathered together. The apostolic succession from Æschylus to myself is as serious and as continuously inspired as that younger institution, the apostolic succession of the Christian Church. Unfortunately, this Christian Church, founded gaily with a pun, has been so largely corrupted by rank Satanism that it has become the Church where you must not laugh, and so it is giving way to that older and greater Church to which I belong —the Church where the oftener you laugh the better, because by laughter only can you destroy evil without malice, and affirm good fellowship without mawkishness.

There is a strain of Puritanism in Shaw's attitude towards art:—

> I am as fond of fine music and handsome buildings as Milton was, or Cromwell, or Bunyan; but if I found that they were becoming the instruments of a systematic idolatry of sensuousness, I would hold it good statesmanship to blow every cathedral in the world to pieces with dynamite, organ and all, without the least heed to the screams of the art critics and cultured voluptuaries.

Shaw's emendation of the "Golden Rule" is often quoted: "Do not do unto others as you would they should do unto you. Their tastes may not be the same."

Bernard Shaw is, indisputably, the most brilliant living English dramatist. His plays have crossed all frontiers, and have been played in all the chief cities of the civilized world. The nimble lightning of his wit rouses men everywhere. He is, in fact, the only man-of-letters of world-wide reputation that we have. It is well, for he has done more for Progress than any other writer of his generation.

I HAVE suggested that language is of no very great consequence in placing a man ethically. I remember hearing a famous Puritan (W. T. Stead) quote a bishop, with approval, as discounting the seriousness of swearing as a sin. "Bad" language may be either strong, indelicate, or foul. Strong language, i.e., the use of oaths, is hardly worth considering as a vice; indeed, one feels very sorry for the poor devil who has nothing stronger than "Oh, blow!" wherewith to relieve his feelings. Imagine the poor milk-and-water Methodist side-slipping into a ditch with "dear, dear!" There are some who tremble at a damn and faint at a (well—ask Mr. Shaw for the word). I have no patience with these "unco guid." They are, more often than not, of the class that, having no positive virtues worth mentioning, imagine themselves vastly superior to the common crowd by reason of this and similar puerilities. Of course, oaths, like spirits, should only be taken in moderation. Continual swearing soon wears all the edge off your best oaths, until it comes to pass that, when an emergency arises, calling for an extra super one, words fail you. You haven't a decent cuss-word in reserve, so your passion has to find vent in some other and generally more dangerous way. That is how it works out in the Army. The recruit finds so much to swear at (for it is absolutely the only relief open to him) that he soon wears out his harmless A.B.C.'s and the D. E. F.'s, which at first shocked him, soon become as familiar to his ears as Sunlight Soap and Prussian Militarism.

But however deplorable the habit of tainted speech may be, it would be unjust and short-sighted to attach a great deal of importance to something which is, after all, little more than a reflection of one's surroundings. Anyone who happens to overhear a soldier "letting off" should remember that the grosser images made use of really have nothing to do with their primary meanings, being just expletives and nothing more. Before dropping the subject of the psychology of cussing, I could say something about the language of women-soldiers, but chivalry forbids.

After making every allowance for the natural coarsening of language which comes of barrack life—or any similar life—one is, as I have said, bound to admit that the very heart and soul of Mr. Smith are tainted. Not rotten, mark you, but tainted. Military life has much to answer for, but we cannot justly arraign it here. The people who are responsible for it are the priest and schoolmaster. It all comes of the folly of lying about Nature. It is largely contributed to by the absence of real culture in the scheme of elementary education, an omission which is, I hope and believe, gradually being made good. The exploitation of remunerative rubbish by music hall and newspaper magnates, by which they fill their pockets at the expense of the public taste, is another factor to be reckoned with, but the germ of all that is rotten in us is the fact that we try to keep children ignorant of their nature. A child picks up its first knowledge of sexual physiology from furtive and guilty questionings. Very rarely does the veil of silence cover up the facts—even from the child of tender years. This silence, with the positive lying which is necessary to keep it up, acts rather like a distorting mirror than a veil. The whole truth no child or adolescent can ever know without sympathetic and tactful help from those of maturer years, but long before he or she is supposed to know anything about the subject, enough distorted knowledge is acquired to make a joke of what is really one of the most serious things in life. It is bad enough to make a joke of sex. I have, unfortunately, seen evidence lately of a distinct tendency to make a joke of maternity. This is not so much a matter for anger as for sorrow. If ever a loud laugh spoke a vacant mind, it does when maternity is the subject of humour. But it is no use railing at the rising generation. The tittering that runs round a picture hall, for instance, whenever an allusion to motherhood is made, must be understood as a sign of ignorance rather than depravity. It is not the rising generation who should be condemned, but the risen generation. The moral sores are a result of the rotten moral food supplied by bilious prudes and sanctimonious humbugs. If the cause of the disease is understood, the remedy is obvious. Let a child be taught to distinguish between the ethics of local convention and those fundamental principles of right conduct that are not right here and wrong there, but are necessary for the preservation of true manhood and womanhood in all countries and at all times. Moralizing as moralizing is out of date. The best sermon is not a series of exhortations cemented by threats and bribes, but a plain statement of the truth.

I mean the whole truth—not selected bits of the truth. For the art of selecting some important facts and omitting others is only another form of lying. Even in the case of the hideous evil of prostitution the preacher rarely rises above a denunciation of it because it is "sinful." You are not to do it because it is a sin, and it is a sin because it is prohibited in some mysterious "moral code" —that dear old hardy annual so much beloved of the Christian Evidence lecturer and others of the Pecksniff clan.

A gallant attempt was made by the Bishop of London who, gloriously arrayed in the uniform of the warrior, favoured the gallant regiment of which I am an insignificant member with a discourse on the subject some months back. But with all his descent to the vernacular, and evident sincerity of purpose (which latter is, I think, his redeeming feature) the sermon utterly failed to grip. I know that by the subsequent allusions to it among the men. He certainly showed some appreciation of the scientific side of the subject, apart from the goody-goody clap-trap that formed his dominant theme, but the former was all about venereal disease. According to what one could gather from the good Bishop's address, prostitution is bad, (1) because it is naughty; (2) because it leads to disease. He ornamented his sermon by a rather childish insistence upon his personal performance as a life-long total abstainer. (I believed him, but I regret to say there was much mirth among the ungodly about it.)

Of the above two reasons, it may be said that the first is idiotic, and the second insufficient. If the horrors of venereal disease could be wiped out of existence, and all the moral codes of the world were to be discredited, the great objection to the practice would still stand. The thing is evil because it is an insult to nature. It is the attempt to cramp and confine nature that is principally responsible for it, and anyone wishing to combat this evil must not be content with planting the "fear of God" into the hearts of young men and women. There are two potent forces at work to counteract this and other debasing practices. The first is the ennobling influence of love, and the second is the effect of a development of good taste. Love is more uplifting than anything else in the world, and the true artist can do more to purify morals than all the Comstocks and Torreys and Ingrams ever heard of. Perhaps if factories were not quite so hideous, and the dwellings of the poor were not quite so ugly, the lure of the siren of sin would lose much of its force over the weaker portion of womenkind, and if boys were made to understand the beauty of Nature, they would be the better armed against temptation to insult her.

A Tribute.

BRAVE-HEARTED toiler, toiler of the sea!
Can we repay thee—for to thee we owe
The greatest debt that human heart can know,
Dear life itself, and all that life may be.
We, and our England, from thy hands we take Warmth, shelter, safety—all of these from thee;
Because of thy strength is it we are free?
Thy sleepless watch for sleeping brothers' sake.
Ah, Gods of men! Men cry to you in vain.
Then cease your prayers, ye people of the shore,
Look toward the sea, where thunder evermore
Breakers that rise and swell, and break again.
There man, your fellow, fights and dies for you;
To him your prayers, your praise, your thanks are due.

Acid Drops.

"Boldness, again boldness, always boldness," said Danton, at a time when the French Revolution was fighting for its existence. The Russian Bolshevik leaders are acting on the same principle. Undeterred by their trouble with Germany —although one fancies the German Government are more afraid of Trotsky than of the Armies of the Allies—the Bolsheviks have now entered into conflict with the Church. The Soviet Government has declared complete liberty of conscience, and wiped away all privileges on account of religious belief. The State is completely secularized, as in France, but all religious ceremonies are permitted so long as they do not interfere with public order. The religious oath is abolished in law courts, and religious instruction in State schools, but private teaching of religion is permitted. No Church or religious society can possess property, and all churches, etc., are declared to be national property; but buildings and instruments for religious service are assigned by the authorities for the free use of religious societies.

Naturally, all this has stirred up the opposition of the Church in Russia, and pietists in this country are doing their best to misrepresent the situation. Thus, most of the papers report curtly the "outrage" of the Government in seizing the Alexander Nevsky Monastery. Mr. Arthur Ransome, in the Daily News of February 6, gives a truer version of the affair. The monastery is very rich, covers a large area, and is practically a town in itself. And this monastic town was "commandeered" on the ground of its being needed for the use of invalided soldiers. On the face of it, what is being done may be quite justifiable from several points of view; and our good people at home forget the treatment of Roman Catholics by that Defender of the Faith, Henry the Eighth.

In order to excite public sympathy, the monastery organized a public procession, and this terrible Government not only permitted the procession, but issued a proclamation that anyone who interfered with it would be arrested. The procession was a large one, with rich banners and many ikons. In spite of the proclamation ordering people not to interfere with the procession, agents of the Church went amongst those who could not read—a very large proportion in Russia—telling them that the Bolsheviks were putting down all such ceremonies. Mr. Ransome says:—

> All along the route were groups with agitators trying to work on the ignorance of the people. But the day passed quietly.....The Bolsheviks wisely avoided trouble by removing the Red Guards from the streets. The procession, which took half an hour to pass, would have been impressive had it not been so obvious that it had a secondary non-religious object. That object was not attained. The political opponents of the Bolsheviks wanted martyrs. They got no martyrs, and from their point of view the procession was a failure.

Now the monks of the Alexander Nevsky Monastery have proclaimed a Holy War, and the Patriarch has excommunicated the Government. Other things might have been overlooked, but seizing Church property was the last straw.

Meanwhile, we invite Freethinkers to read with caution the stories that are being made current in the ordinary press about Russia. They should remember the systematic slanders on the Portuguese revolution because it struck at the Throne and the Church, and also the misrepresentation in this country of France when it disestablished the Church a few years ago. Church interests are well served in this country, and lies in defence of piety find a ready market. Above all, we advise all to study the French Revolution. The analogy between that and the Russian Revolution is wonderfully close, and very instructive.

The Daily News concluded its account of the consecration of the new Bishop of Hereford with the words, "the ceremony passed off without incident." Was a free-fight expected?

Some of the new models for spring headwear are of the poke-bonnet type. For once in a way the Salvation Army girls will find themselves in the fashion.

A plan is being discussed for reinforcing the religious life of America and this country by exchanging ministers for periods up to twelve months, says the Daily News. The Americans are very welcome to our Bishop of London, but we hope that they will keep Billy Sunday on their side of the Atlantic.

Speaking at the Colston Hall, Bristol, the Rev. D. J. Hiley said:—

> No hymn in any hymn book he had ever seen had done him so much good as "What's the use of worrying?" sung by brave men, who lived up to that sentiment. "What about the religion of the boys?" they might ask. His experience was that war must brutalize men—there was no escape from that. Those who expected a wave of religious enthusiasm after the War would be bitterly disappointed. The religious service at the base was not the most popular event of the week. Swearing was probably "only from the teeth," and he did not attach too much importance to this weakness, but he always regretted that this had seemed to become part of the soldier's ordinary vocabulary. Referring to the morals of the troops, the speaker complained bitterly of the "conspiracy of silence" on the great evil which threatened the British race even more than did the Huns. To Churchmen—the whole Catholic Church—he said, "We have lost touch with democracy."

What will trouble the Churches most is that they will probably lose touch with a deal of their income.

My Tuesdays are meatless,
My Wednesdays are wheatless,
I am getting more eatless each day;
My home it is heatless,
My bed it is sheetless—
They're all sent to the Y.M.C.A.
My club it is breadless,
My coffee is sweetless,
Each day I get poorer and wiser;
My stockings are feetless,
My trousers are seatless.
My God! But I do hate the Kaiser.

—Daily News.

Sir Arthur Yapp's task at the Food Ministry has come to an end, and he has retired, to resume his work of talking for the Young Men's Christian Association. Talking was his job for the Food Ministry, and, as a daily paper points out, "he has probably talked more words in four months than the glibbest street-corner medicine-vendor." Anyhow, Sir Arthur ought to be satisfied, for he yapped himself into the honours list.

Billy Sunday, the popular American revivalist, is engaged in an eight-weeks' campaign against sin, and, according to the New York Herald, Billy never misses an opportunity of attacking "Kaiser Bill and his bunch," whom he describes as "a God-forsaken, weasel-eyed, hog-jowled, beetle-browed crew." It would be interesting to hear "Kaiser Bill's" comments on these compliments from a fellow-Christian. Probably they would be couched in the same exquisite language.

One of the alterations made by the House of Lords in the Franchise Bill was a suggestion to exhibit in public places a "black list" of Conscientious Objectors. This was rejected by the House of Commons. What an ironical suggestion that men with "consciences" should be "blacklisted" in a Christian country!

Oh, those newspapers! The Daily News is again assuring its readers that "the German power is a pagan power, just as their ideal is a pagan ideal." Has the editor ever heard of German priests and Lutheran parsons?

The glorious free press of England has been expressing its astonishment in headlines at the news that the ex Czar of Russia has been sawing wood. Yet Christians profess to believe that the King of Kings wielded the jack-plane.

The Evening Standard declares that "it is the English habit to shrink from the analysis of ideas." Even Tory journalists find out things in time.

The secularization of Christianity is still going on. At an Eastcheap church the Sunday programme comprised "Songs, orchestra, and cinema," and the sermon was devoted to "Food hoarding." At an East-end tabernacle the chief attraction was a "free tea for 700."

The new Education Bill, soon to be brought before Parliament, provides for the maintenance of school camps for physical training. Quite a good clause—so long as it is properly carried out. But the County of Leicester Education Committee has issued a handbook, called Elements of Military Education, from which it may be gathered that those responsible for its issue are only jealous of Prussia, not antagonistic to its spirit.

Thus, "Special Military Practice" is to have a definite place in the cadet curriculum. There is to be bayonet practice, with or without bayonet; trench practice, in which a sack is to be placed to represent a man. The boy is to go through certain manœuvres, and finally "seize bayonet to stick into the throat at close quarters." Quite a pretty, humanizing exercise for young boys. The rulers of Germany have brought their country to its present pass by a systematic militarizing of the rising generation. The County of Leicester Education Office is evidently jealous of German efficiency in this direction, and wishes to try the same process here. We can only hope that parents will see that this kind of thing is killed before it acquires strength. Physical drill for boys, as much as is possible. Bayonet exercise, involving the simulated running of a bayonet through the throat of a prostrate enemy, a thousand times no! Let us leave that kind of systematic brutalization to Prussia.

The Bishop of Oxford says "there is a lamentably low tone in many country places as well as in the towns. I feel bowed down with humiliation and misery, yet I do not know what to do." Perhaps the Bishop may reflect that this "low tone" is some sort of a comment on the boasted purifying effects of Christianity. That kind of confession stamps Christianity as a decided failure. It is the Churches who have claimed moral control, it is the Churches who have told us of the marvels accomplished, and if the Bishop's lament is justified by facts the sooner the clergy give up the job the better.

In the House of Convocation the Bishop of Lichfield protested strongly against the "smallness of the outfit allowance and daily pay" of chaplains in the Army compared with that of combatant officers. Well, but they do get officer's pay, and many will be receiving, as Army chaplains, more than they were getting as curates. And is there any reason why a chaplain should get officers' pay at all? Why should he be paid more than an ordinary soldier? Why should not even the Church to which the chaplain belongs pay him? He is there to represent it. The protest strikes us as just "cheek."

There is a fool or a liar involved in the following item of news. On January 29, at the Cambridge Borough Tribunal, a bookseller running a one-man business, married, and a specialist in scientific publications, applied for exemption. He was refused, the Military Representative stating that the Minister of National Service regarded books as luxuries. Comment is quite needless.

On the window of the Reading Room of the Y.M.C.A. at Ayr, appears a notice intimating that for some time past the management has been troubled through magazines having been stolen from the premises, and a request that visitors should abstain from the practice. Is this a sign of the glowing return to religion among our young men?

It is a pity that Mr. George Bernard Shaw does not pay more careful regard to fact when dealing with certain subjects. Thus, in the Nation for February 1, he says in the course of a review of a recent book by Mr. Belloc :—

> The late editor of the Freethinker was not the same man in his private correspondence with Meredith as in his editorial columns. He knew quite well that the sort of Atheist who called the Bethlehem stable the Pig and Whistle, not merely to change the atmosphere of the discussion, but with the quaintly snobbish notion that nothing miraculous could happen in a vulgar public house was a danger to Secularism ; yet he was not free to say so ; too many of his subscribers would have suspected him of superstition, if not of downright Christianity and abandoned him.

Those who knew G. W. Foote will smile at the suggestion of his refraining from saying things for fear of losing subscribers. That consideration has never been of weight in the editorial policy of the Freethinker, and, we hope, never will be. And we are pleased to say that the relations between this paper and its readers are such that no one feels at all upset when something is published with which many may disagree. Clear thinking and honest speaking is all that our readers ask for, and so far as is possible they get it. Both the late and the present editor have had disagreements with some readers, but we do not think any have been lost on that account. And, quite frankly, we should not greatly value the support of anyone if his or her support was conditional on complete agreement upon every subject and all the time.

The suggestion that G. W. Foote was one man in the Freethinker and another man in his private correspondence, is simply ridiculous. It was the G. W. Foote of the 'eighties who won the respect of Meredith, and it was won on the strength of his writings in the Freethinker. And that respect was retained to the end. Of course, G. W. Foote didn't write "Acid Drops" when corresponding with Meredith ; there was no necessity for his doing. Nor was there any need to "depolarize" words by calling the Bethlehem Inn the "Pig and Whistle," or changing the atmosphere of the discussion in other ways. Between two such men these things were quite unnecessary. But that is a different thing to the suggestion conveyed in the passage cited. Nor do we imagine that G. B. S. writes or talks to his friends in the same way that he does in his articles or plays. If he did they would think of him as a deuce of a bore. For with those who can read, lessons in the alphabet are quite unnecessary.

A bold advertisement in the press states that the Rev. J. T. Davis, the minister of the Theistic Church, will deal with "mental doubts" on the subject of religion. The subject should keep his congregation awake.

The Strassburg Post suggests that the Kaiser is in dire need of the prayers of his people. This does not tally with the clerical statement that the Germans are "Atheists."

At a special service at St. Paul's Cathedral the music included selections from Mendelssohn's Saint Paul. A striking instance of German "Atheism."

In these days of the enforced simple life it is refreshing to notice an advertisement in the Catholic Universe announcing that "bees-wax vegetable votive candles" can be supplied promptly at reasonable prices.

Well done, Inverness! A deputation of "laymen and ministers" waited on the magistrates to protest against their action in permitting Sunday concerts. One of the ministers told the magistrates that if Germany had observed the Sabbath better, she would not be "going through such a period of debasement." The magistrates were unrepentant. Indeed, Bailie Maclean said that if the ministers would do more to show the people how to live they would have plenty to do. Other magistrates informed the deputation that they represented a community not a section. This was a good and deserved snub. So we again say : "Bravo, Inverness." And we hope the authorities elsewhere will follow suit.

The Archbishop of Canterbury thinks there is likely to be a shortage of parsons after the War unless a great number of young men now in the Army are ready to offer themselves for ordination. We should say a deal will depend upon the state of the labour market. If there are no openings elsewhere some may "offer themselves." If other openings present themselves, then we fancy the War will not lead to a great rush in the direction of the Church. There is one thing, however, of which we may be quite sure, whatever may be the shortage of parsons, there is not likely to be a queue formed waiting for their ministrations. So far as this commodity is concerned, the public will submit cheerfully to the most drastic rationing.

The Church Times is alarmed at Mr. Justice Atkins refusing to send to prison a soldier charged with killing his wife for infidelity. It fears that such a judgment may lead to the taking of human life being regarded less seriously than hitherto. But what can one expect? If millions of men spend four years on end killing each other, how is it possible for them to regard human life as of great value? We said when the War broke out that it meant a progressive brutalization of character, and we are now witnessing some of the consequences.

A Wesleyan minister in the Isle of Man has received three months' imprisonment for saying that many soldiers were "drunken, immoral, and profane scoundrels," and that "to talk of such men going straight to heaven because they had died for their country was sheer heathenism." We are no authority as to who will go to heaven, or what are the conditions of entry, and we cannot see why the question of militarism cannot be discussed without painting an Army as worse than the rest of the population. We should be surprised to find that our Army is either much better or much worse than the rest of the people from whom the Army is made up. As it is, we have one class painting soldiers as all saints, and another class depicting them as all sinners. A little common sense would dispense with both extremes.

The Star notes that a further distribution of the profits on the late Canon Fleming's sermon, Recognition in Futurity, has just been made by Queen Alexandra. The Star also reminds its readers that this sermon, although preached by Canon Fleming, really belonged to Talmage. What Fleming did was merely to alter the names of places. An impudent trick, but it went down.

The Sketch will be getting into trouble. In a recent issue it printed a picture of a "Calvary" showing the figure of Christ broken into pieces by a shell. It ought to have shown everything else broken and the figure untouched. The Daily Mail knows how to "arrange" these things better.

"Will the Archbishop act?" asked a religious periodical at the height of the hubbub over Bishop Henson's appointment to Hereford. An unkind critic might have retorted that His Grace had never done anything else.

The Bishop of London seems anxious to impress people with the idea that the clergy are taking their proper share of work in the national crisis. Speaking at Covent Garden, he said that he had "combed-out" forty parsons to go to the Front. He did not explain that they were going as non-combatants, and that they would receive officers' pay.

A would-be humourist in a Sunday paper declares that he knew a man whose idea of heaven was to sit in a hot bath reading Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. The funny thing about this remark is that many pious folk believe honestly that persons who read "Kant" will have a hot time—in the next world.

M. BIRKENHEAD.—Unless material is used in the sense of "existence" the answer you quote is absurd.

C. F. BENNION.—The publishing offices of the New York Truthseeker is 62 Vesey Street, New York, U.S.A.

G. WEBB.—We quite agree that it would be well for people to discuss the Population Question without dragging in so many side issues. But our experience is that very few people are able to discuss any question and keep to the essential issues. We may act upon your suggestion when a suitable occasion presents.

A. F. THORN.—Received. As early as possible.

"ICONOCLAST."—Thanks for verses, but regret they are not up to our standard.

W. SMALBRIDGE.—Cathedral towns usually are sleepy places, and one may trust the clergy to keep them so. Thanks for cuttings.

W. GREGORY.—Paper is being sent.

H. L. LAWS.—Sorry, but as you will have seen, the discussion is closed.

MRS. BRIDGES ADAMS.—Will see if it is possible to do anything in the direction you indicate.

M. L.—Quite correct; but Darwin and Wallace stated that the idea of Natural Selection came to them from reading Malthus on Population.

A. JOHNSON.—We are pleased to learn that Mr. Clifford Williams had a successful meeting at Nuneaton on Sunday last; also that a debate is likely to be arranged as an outcome of the discussion.

"FREETHINKER" (Glasgow).—Next week.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (February 17) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. The lecture commences at 6.30, and the subject, "The Savage in Our Midst," should bring a good attendance.

Mr. T. F. Palmer lectures this afternoon (Feb. 17) at the West Central Hall, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road. The lectures commence at 3.15, and those of our London readers who are already familiar with Mr. Palmer's writings will no doubt avail themselves of this opportunity of making his acquaintance as a lecturer. In the evening, Mr. Palmer is holding a debate with Mr. P. Muir, a Christian Evidence lecturer, at the St. Pancras Reform Club, Kentish Town Road. The debate commences at 7.30.

Mr. R. H. Rosetti, who has returned to the fighting zone, writes:—

> Freethinkers in general, and the Freethinker in particular, have striven against the tyranny of religion in the Army with much success. On enlisting now, the Freethinker's chief difficulty is enlightening Army officials, and acquainting them with the new procedure in relation to the "What religion?" question.
> Freethinkers will also, I believe, be pleased to hear of a further success. In my own company, church parades were occasionally ordered, but at the foot of the announcement was a note stating that the parades were voluntary. I cannot say if it is the same in other companies or battalions; but the point is, that voluntary church parades are in operation in one company at least, and that is a beginning; and I think much of the credit for it is due to the Freethinker and its energetic editor, who has lost no opportunity of bringing to the notice of the military authorities the tyranny and impudence of the old method.
> Thus, just as the late Charles Bradlaugh, by continually pegging away, eventually defeated the legal necessity of Freethinkers becoming hypocrites in courts of justice, and the late G. W. Foote by the same process checked the mean but Christian policy of robbing Freethought Societies, so in the same manner has the present President of the N. S. S. and editor of the Freethinker led the way in winning another right for Freethinkers—the right of openly professing non-religious opinion, and the acceptance, without question, by officials in a hitherto compulsory religious branch of national service, and the beginning of voluntary attendance at church parades.
> Thus the evidence for the strengthening of religion during the War accumulates. If Christians are satisfied with that kind of evidence, we certainly are.
> Therefore I hope every Freethinker will keep on pegging away to relieve injustices to Freethinkers wherever they exist, in the full knowledge that they are, by so doing, helping to win the fight against the enemy to human progress; for Christianity can never be strong where Freethought has equal rights.

Mr. A. D. Howell Smith pays his first visit to Birmingham to-day (February 17). His address will be on "The Influence of the Church on Marriage and Divorce," and we hope Birmingham friends will see that the Repertory Theatre is well filled.

While we are on the point, we should like to draw the special attention of local friends to these meetings. The meetings at the Repertory Theatre are successful and impressive, but the local Society is in need of better financial support. There must be many Freethinkers round and about Birmingham who can help in this direction, and probably they have not done, because they are not aware of the need. We can assure them the work is worthy of their help.

Mr. John Breese writes:—

> One man's bit. I am taking six copies of the Freethinker weekly. My newsvendor is going to display them prominently on the counter. All not sold, I purchase, and shall distribute to likely converts. I am telling you this because I am seriously out for helping you to realize that splendid object—1,000 increased weekly sales of the Freethinker. Surely there are a thousand purchasers who would take one copy more each week, say, for six months, and give that extra copy away, or do a little propaganda work by leaving it on tram-seat or in the train. There is not the least doubt in my mind about you moving that additional thousand copies. Anyway, I am going to have a cut at it.

Nothing gives us so much encouragement as the knowledge—which comes to hand by almost every post—of the warm support given, and which continues to be given, by our readers.

We are asked to state that lectures are held every Sunday in Jail Square, Glasgow, by the Herald League, at which the Freethinker and other heretical literature is offered for sale.

We were very pleased to see the following in the North Mail:—

> The Newcastle No. 3 Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners has passed the following resolution:—
> That we strongly protest against any further combing-out of the working classes for the Army whilst the clergy and ministers of various sects remain exempt as a privileged class, seeing that many vigorous, eligible ministers have no objection to the War, whilst physically unfit conscientious objectors have died in prison, despite the Exemption Act.
> We therefore urge the Government to take immediate steps to revoke this glaring injustice, as we refuse to continue to quietly submit to having our sons and brothers made the scapegoats of any privileged class, whose services are of no national importance.
> Copies of the resolution are to be sent to the Premier and Sir Auckland Geddes, and members of Parliament.

The Southampton Branch of the N. S. S. is holding a meeting this evening (Feb. 17) in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road. Mr. Rayner is the speaker, and his subject is "The Life and Work of Charles Darwin." We hope that all local Freethinkers will make a special effort to be present.

It will not be very long before a new Education Bill will be before Parliament; and although Mr. Fisher shows every desire to avoid discussing the religious question, it is improbable that he will be able to do this. The question is almost certain to be raised in some form or other. We again, therefore, ask Freethinkers all over the country to get busy. Those who belong to Trade Unions should seek to get a resolution passed asking for a policy of Secular Education in State schools. Those who belong to organizations other than Trade Unions should act in the same way. It is not at all difficult to get such a resolution passed, since the justice of our case is obvious; it is becoming plainer than ever that Secular Education is the only way to end the "religious difficulty." We have urged this advice several times, and have been pleased to note that it has been acted on in several cases. We have reported some of these instances; but we should like to see the policy followed more generally. The more resolutions received by the Minister for Education, the better. Therefore, we repeat, let Freethinkers all over the country get busy.

Another subject on which Freethinkers might bestir themselves is that of compulsory church attendance in the Army. We deal elsewhere in this issue with this topic; and we should like to see constituents writing their parliamentary representatives on behalf of this act of justice to the soldiers. If this does nothing else, it will ventilate a real grievance. And, perhaps, when our legislators realize that Freethinkers are not an altogether negligible quantity, their legitimate claims will receive more serious attention.

The simple diminution of the freedom of the press is enough to diminish the stature of a people.—Victor Hugo.

Writers and Readers.

THE greater part of the prose writings of Coleridge are not what would be described as easy reading. At their worst, they are grey, dull, devitalized stuff—the outcome of a brain befogged with opium and the more moonshiny variety of German metaphysics. Aids to Reflection used to be, and I am told is even now, the favourite reading of the more thoughtful Unitarians. It is no doubt largely responsible for the absence of colour and vibration from Theistic thought. A sort of philosophical wet blanket, it is a hindrance rather than a help to mental movement. The Friend and the other political and moral dissertations are equally without form and void. Even the Biographia Literaria is vital only in parts; the mere materials, often excellent in themselves, out of which a fine book might have been made. Coleridge was a sympathetic, and at times an acute and subtle, critic of literature; but, like many men of genius, he was too easy-going a critic of his own works—he could never bring himself to reject the irrelevant. He was so much in love with his own amazing faculty of discursive expression that he never troubled to think of his readers. All really effective writing is a sort of collaboration between the writer and the reader, who are both willing to make sympathetic adjustments. Coleridge was not the garrulous lunatic of Peacock's silly caricature—he is labelled as Dr. Flosky in Nightmare Abbey—but certainly for those who had not come under the spell of his magical eloquence, that is; for most of his readers, he has never had the attraction of a sequacious thinker.

In conversation, too—or, to speak more correctly, in monologue, for Coleridge would talk for hours at a time—he was often content to throw away the riches of his reflective wisdom. He tells us somewhere that he was once at dinner in company with an intelligent-looking man, who listened and said nothing for a long while; Coleridge, no doubt, expatiating with melodious eloquence on some favourite topic—the idealism of Berkeley, or Kant's wire-drawn distinction between the reason and the understanding. The gentleman nodded his head in polite and apparently intelligent agreement. At the end of the dinner, when a streaming dish of apple dumplings was brought in, he broke silence with—"Them's the jockies for me!" I am half inclined to think that the silent gentleman was pulling Coleridge's leg, our metaphysician being too self-conscious to see the joke. Still, there is no question but that Coleridge was in the habit of scattering his seminal ideas with no regard to the nature of the ground. Some of his friends benefited by his undeveloped sense of personal property in ideas, and it would not be difficult to find traces of them in Wordsworth, Lamb, and Hazlitt. They, no doubt, felt they were justified in helping themselves from so rich a store. Emerson, it may be remembered, did the same with his friend Alcot. But Alcot, although a generous talker, was not silly. One fine morning he paid an early visit to Emerson's kitchen-garden, and helped himself to a wheelbarrow of vegetables. We are told that Emerson could not see that Alcot had as much right to his vegetables than he had to his friend's original ideas. It is an instructive comment on transcendental logic.

It is not my intention here to discuss the merits of Coleridge as a thinker in politics, religion, or æsthetics; the curious reader will find all he wants in Pater's essay, reprinted in a handy form in English Critical Essays (The World's Classics), and in Mr. J. M. Robertson's illuminating study (New Essays Towards a Critical Method).

What I want to do is to recommend anyone who knows little of Coleridge to make his acquaintance through the Table Talk which the Oxford University Press has just published at half-a-crown. There you get the best of Coleridge in a form easy to digest. Nothing short of a phonograph could have reproduced exactly the continuous stream of vocal sound, and one might be thankful, perhaps, that the talking-machine was not thought of a hundred years ago. His sympathetic and intelligent admirers reported the more striking passages, which are not usually epigrammatic, Coleridge having but little taste for the condensed phrase that puts a criticism with dogmatic and vigorous clearness. Yet there are quotable passages that seem to contradict this view. For instance:—

> In Æschylus religion appears terrible, malignant, and persecuting: Sophocles is the mildest of the three tragedians, but the persecuting aspect is still maintained: Euripides is like a modern Frenchman, never so happy as when giving a slap at the gods altogether.
> The poor-rates are the consideration paid by, or on behalf of, capitalists for having labour at demand. It is the price and nothing else.
> You may depend upon it, the more oath-taking, the more lying, generally among people.
> Party men always hate a slightly differing friend more than a downright enemy. I quite calculate on my being one day or other holden in worse repute by many Christians than the Unitarians and open infidels. It must be undergone by everyone who loves truth for its own sake beyond all other things.
> The morality of Rabelais' work is of the most refined and exalted kind; as for the manners, to be sure, I cannot say as much. Swift was anima Rabelaisii habitans in sicco—the soul of Rabelais dwelling in a dry place. Yet Swift was rare. Can anything beat his remark on King William's motto,—Recepit, non rapuit,—"that the receiver was as bad as the thief?"
> A rogue is a roundabout fool; a fool in circumbendibus.

There are not many of these "short, sharp things" in Coleridge; the sort of thing which Johnson was celebrated for, and which are much easier to report than continuous discourse. It was not the style of talk that best expressed the wide-ranging genius of Coleridge, who tells us with amusing simplicity that all men of genius who love to talk at all are very discursive and continuous. Yet it would have been impossible for Dr. Johnson to say a shorter and sharper thing than this on Burke: "Until he could associate his general principles (of history) with some sordid interest, panic of property, Jacobinism, etc., he was a mere dinner bell." The remark above about Swift is witty enough, although at bottom it is only a little less inapposite than Pope's line about laughing and shaking in Rabelais' easy chair. Now, is it difficult to think of Swift as even smiling sardonically at the gross stupidity, the banality average human nature. To paraphrase his latest apologist, Mr. Whibley: A fierce hatred of injustice and oppression is the master passion of Swift. He has no illusions, and would tear away the illusions which mask the faces of men. We marvel at the genius of Swift; we do not laugh at it. The reader who is critical enough not to be impressed or oppressed by the mere obiter dicta of a great man is sure to come across many passages with which he will not agree, but they will, or should, help to clarify his ideas. He will note how far astray is Coleridge in his judgment of Gibbon. The historian's style is pronounced detestable, which is, perhaps, no more than we might expect of the recoil from the periodic prose-style of the eighteenth century. But the style is not the worst thing. Gibbon has no ideas, no philosophy; he is ignorant of the true cause of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire. Coleridge, like Mr. Belloc, in our time, knew all about it, no doubt, by a sort of historical intuition. The one historian of the eighteenth whom modern research has not set aside nor threatened to set aside; the writer of the broadest sociological survey ever attempted is ignorant of the philosophy of his subject. The truth is that both Mr. Belloc and Coleridge have ignored the immense value of Gibbon through sheer antipathy to the Voltairean scepticism of two chapters out of a total of seventy-one. And yet Newman had splendid praise for the historian's great portrait of Athanasius; and Freeman, who knew the ground well, could bring himself to speak of Gibbon's work as the encyclopædic history of 1,300 years; the grandest of historical designs carried out with wonderful power and wonderful accuracy. "Whatever is read," he avers, "Gibbon must be read too."

. . . . .

These are precisely the kind of misjudgments every one is liable to make through hastiness, or want of care or prejudice. If Coleridge was sometimes wrong, he was often enough right. He was ever loyal to what he thought to be truth. He set his face against the soulless industrialism of the period, he pointed out the evil of accumulated capital, he advocated a progressive tax on income, he noted the scandalously unjust treatment of Ireland. In philosophy he was one of the first to do justice to Spinoza, professing to find a Pantheistic Atheism more agreeable to an imaginative mind than Theism. Certainly his religious course was not edifying from the Freethinking point of view, going as he did from heterodoxy to Socinianism, and thence to the support of Church and State, founding, it is said, the Broad Church school—the school of Trimmers. But, on the whole, his support of Christianity was of doubtful value, and he has been discarded. It is small wonder; for even Christianity has not been able to resist the relative spirit against which Coleridge had always set his face. He was really a mediæval doctor of theology out of his element. In him, however, there was something which the pragmatic Christian could not understand, a transcendental disinterestedness which, to use his own phrase, loves truth with indescribable awe, and those of us who know the whole of his work are ready to believe him when he tells us, in his own beautiful way, "that he would creep towards the light, even if the light had made its way through a rent in the wall of the temple."

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

The Orb of Day.

V.

SURROUNDING the sun like a beautiful halo is the elusive corona. All attempts to view this pearly light have failed, save at such moments when the sun is eclipsed. The corona varies considerably in outline. Occasionally, it is comparatively uniform in appearance, and seems like a circle of light encompassing the sun. At other times the corona appears to project into space to a distance of double the solar diameter. So seldom do favourable opportunities present themselves to the observer, owing to the infrequency and transientness of eclipses, that any particular solar investigator would, in the course of thirty years, if all eclipses were visible and he were able to view them, even then, only about forty-five minutes would be available for successful study. These serious drawbacks are largely responsible for the fact that little concerning the corona has been definitely determined. Moreover, the solar corona is a quite modern discovery, and until fairly recently it was not positively proved to form part of the sun. During the past generation improved methods of study have been adopted. In addition to telescopic study, photography has been utilized, and the spectroscope has been pressed into service for the purpose of ascertaining the materials of which this radiant solar crown is composed.

When the solar surface is much agitated by sun-spots, the coronal light is at its best. An astronomical expedition to California to study the corona in January, 1889, was marred by two difficulties. Instead of the average few minutes of complete obscuration, the total eclipse lasted a single minute only. Again, the eclipse took place at a period of minimum sun-spot activity; and as the several envelopes which environ the sun seem to become disturbed in sympathy with the periodic evolution of sun-spots, this proved a further disadvantage. When the corona departs from its circular form, and sends forth its streams of light with most marked magnificence, there usually occurs a splendid display of solar prominences. There also exists a cycle of changes in the form of the corona, which possesses a period of about eleven years, and this cycle is regarded as identical with that of sun-spot frequency.

Astronomers have surmised that some connection may be traced between the corona and the zodiacal light. This exceedingly delicate glow is most noticeable in the tropics, but may be seen in England, in the evening, after a mild spring sunset, in our Western counties. This light is also visible just before sunrise in the fall of the year. In full sunlight this hazy light is extinguished by the powerful solar beams; but as our luminary dips beyond the horizon, and the afterglow gladdens the sky, despite its faintness, the zodiacal light serves to prolong the radiance of the dying day. In the morning, its appearance in the eastern heavens heralds the sun's awakening; for, in company with the dawn, this pearly glow ascends above the oriental sky. The faint zodiacal light is, perhaps, an attenuated extension of the solar corona, and in that case forms part of the sun. This nebulous haze rises to a height some sixty times that of the solar diameter, and if really part of the sun's atmosphere, then the encircling substances of our luminary must occupy a stupendous region of space.

There is a steadily accumulating array of evidence which indicates that epochs of intense solar activity coincide with periods of magnetic disturbance on the earth. Experts differ widely in opinion concerning the correct interpretation of these coincidences, but the facts appear to speak for themselves. The earth is a huge magnet, and perhaps this is true on a much vaster scale with regard to the sun. There appears little doubt that the phenomena of terrestrial magnetism are in some way related to the electric currents which circulate round our globe, and these currents are apparently connected with the movements of the solar orb. It is well known that when the sun is in a highly disturbed state, as shown by a great abundance of sun-spots, that then the earth is subject to magnetic storms and auroral displays. Maunder recorded one outstanding magnetic disturbance registered by the instruments at Greenwich, which seemed to accompany the appearance of a great sun-spot in 1892. And that authority goes on to state that:—

> In a period of nearly nineteen years, therefore, we have three magnetic storms which stand out pre-eminently above all others during that interval. In that same period we have three great sun spot displays—counting the two groups of 1882 together—which stand out with equal distinctness far above all similar displays. And we find that the three magnetic storms were simultaneous with the greatest development of the spots.

Among other evidences, there is the testimony of Ricco, another celebrated solar observer. Ricco compared his own results with those obtained at the United States Naval Observatory. He demonstrated that in 1892 eleven large spots were visible on the solar disc. And in seven out of the eleven instances noted, there occurred magnetic disturbances on our planet. Forty-five hours after the giant spot of February 12 had crossed the central meridian, a magnetic storm of "extraordinary vehemence was manifested." When, with the rotation of the sun, the spot reappeared on March 10, a powerful magnetic storm was recorded by the photo-magnetographs, forty-five hours once more intervening. It is most significant that, as a rule, the bigger the spot, the more intense the magnetic disturbance.

Kelvin adversely criticized the theory that the sun's influences as a variable magnet were sufficient to develop magnetic storms on a planet 93,000,000 miles distant. In any case, there is ample evidence that terrestrial magnetic storms tend to succeed solar outbreaks. Possibly the numerous coincidences recorded will find their complete solution in other relations than those of cause and consequence. It may be that they constitute the outcome "of some other influence of electro-magnetic waves on a vast scale sweeping through our system, and influencing the magnetic phenomena in the various bodies of which our system is composed."

A very interesting problem of solar physics is that which relates to the chemical composition of the photosphere—the luminous envelope of the sun. Our light and heat arrive to us from our luminary's wonderful stratum of glowing cloud. The photosphere is comparatively shallow, apparently, when related to the magnitude of the solar diameter. Yet this layer of incandescent cloud is the chief radiator of our orb's effulgence and thermal power.

If our world were viewed from some outside area, it would appear encompassed by the clouds which float in the terrestrial atmosphere. These volumes of vapour arise from water. Now, is there some special element in the solar clouds also which confers upon them their predominant features? Dr. Johnstone Stoney strove to solve this problem in 1867, and the hypothesis he then propounded has never been seriously shaken since. The water which forms the earth's clouds is a chemical compound, but it is utterly unlikely that the photospheric substance could possibly remain in a condition of chemical combination at the enormously exalted temperature which obtains in the sun. Therefore, the material composing the photosphere must be reduced to an elementary state. Out of the eighty odd terrestrial elementary substances most, and probably all, are present in the sun, and the element coronium, so far as we know, is special to the solar globe. Helium was first discovered in the sun, but has recently been detected on our planet. It seems likely that our orb is mainly composed of elements quite common on our planet, and it is a fair inference that the material of the photosphere is a terrestrial substance also.

The solar envelope has been proved by spectrum analysis to be something different to a pure gas. Its spectrum is continuous, although the spectrum, as viewed from our earth, is traversed by an array of black lines. But it is quite certain that these lines are really present in the cooler vapours outside the photosphere, while some are caused by the vapours of the earth's atmosphere. Were it possible to eliminate these interposing and absorbing media, the spectrum of the photosphere would stand out as an unbroken ribbon of light. It is demonstrable that a strictly gaseous material, however high its temperature may be, never displays a continuous spectrum. The spectroscope invariably reveals in a pure gas the presence of a number of vivid lines. On the other hand, the spectrum presented by a liquid or solid in a state of incandescence is usually of a different nature. It manifests an unbroken spectrum, and as the photosphere furnishes a continuous spectrum, it must contain either liquid or solid particles suspended in its clouds.

There are weighty reasons for concluding that the vapours of the photosphere are non-metallic. As a matter of fact, carbon or silicon, perhaps both, are the most likely constituents of the photosphere. Rowland's researches prove that about 200 lines of the sun's spectrum are those of carbon, while other lines point to the presence of silicon. But carbon is an element of lower atomic weight than silicon. That of the former is 12, and that of the latter 28. Carbon, therefore, will constantly tend to ascend into the solar atmosphere, while the higher it rises, the lower is the temperature it encounters, and this increases its proclivity to assume a solid or liquid state. Carbon, as we know it, is an element so refractory that it becomes extremely difficult to heat it to a condition of vapour. Their low atomic weights permit carbon vapours to soar upwards in the solar atmosphere where they become cooler, and, although still at a temperature too high to allow other vapours to form liquid particles, are yet at a temperature sufficiently low to liquefy or solidify a substance like carbon which ceaselessly tends to resume a solid form.

The part played by carbon on the earth lends substantial support to the theory that this element is the main source of solar emission. The illuminating powers of a candle are derived from particles of carbon. Carbon filaments were used in incandescent lamps, because this element retains the solid state at a temperature even above that at which platinum fuses. Carbon is the best known radiator, and it refuses to abandon its solid form at enormously exalted temperatures. Thus, it is enabled to utilize its vast radiating powers. For the foregoing, and for various other reasons, it appears a practical certainty that carbon performs a role of immeasurable importance in evolving the effulgence of the lord of day.

The Psychology of the Ranter.

Thirty or forty years ago, before the Salvation Army had become the international (or even national) business affair into which it has now developed, the nuclei of it, as we may say, were distributed in scattered groups all over England. These groups—the very lowest intellectual types of Nonconformity—mostly called themselves Methodists, and to them excitement was synonymous with religion. They lashed themselves into moral furies whenever they had a public opportunity of doing so. To outsiders they were generally known as "Ranters." They were the sort of enthusiasts who honestly believed that a brick thrown at Bradlaugh made the angels in Heaven rejoice.

Those of us who have come into personal contact with Ranters, and have attended their meetings, realize that the shrewdness of the late General Booth lay in his appreciation of the ignorance, credulity, and craving for excitement, which are the leading characteristics of such people. His success lay in founding an organization which could meet their requirements. And, as has been demonstrated by the results which have followed in the wake of the Salvation Army drum, the Ranter is not peculiar to any particular country.

But the acquisition of wealth and the growth of knowledge are the two things that are most inimical to the multiplication of the Ranter. He is not by any means so numerous as he was in the days of Sankey and Moody, when irreverent boys were soundly thrashed and put to bed for parodying such a well-known classic as "Hold the Fort":—

> Hold the Fort for I am coming,
> Sankey's on the sea:
> Up to the neck in a rhubarb pudding—
> That's the game for me!

The educated member of the fashionable City Church would not, we should suppose, descend to the vulgarity of such rhymed resolutions as are set forth in these lines with which we have in boyhood been almost deafened over and over again:—

> My old companions, fare you well
> I will not go with you to Hell:
> I mean with Jesus Christ to dwell,
> Fare you well: Fare you well!

One has difficulty in understanding upon what ground the Ranter should suppose anybody who was rapidly on the road to Hades could fare well; but the Ranter has never been famed for accuracy or precision in thought, or for punctiliousness of phrase. Still, let us do him justice. He was, in most cases—we have tested it by experience—honest.

It is really the educated member of the fashionable church that gets one's gorge up. For what in effect are the relative positions of him and the Ranter to one another? Publicly, the former, far from deprecating, commends and praises the religious enthusiasm of the latter—though he does not personally attend Ranting demonstrations. Privately, we know how the cynical grin overspreads his features when the subject of the enthusiastic Ranter is brought up. So let us have the Ranter, if you please, in preference to the gilded hypocrite of the big city church! The latter and his kind have social and business interests to be served by the Ranter. Let the Ranter have plenty of religion, they say; but he is, all the time, to be kept as far away as possible from those inimical influences—wealth and knowledge—which would at once dissipate some of the fiery fervour of the Ranter, and incidentally take away some of the fat of the fashionable hypocrites.

The Ranter must have plenty of curry and ginger with his religion. A faith that cannot make you wrestle and sweat is not worth a farthing. Salvation that does not make you shout and jump is no salvation at all. The pugilist who had newly been received into the Salvation Army, giving his "testimony," cried: "I'm that glad I'm saved, that I could knock hell out of the big drum." The reality of hell is what makes religion precious to the Ranter. He has no doubt about a personal Devil. Like Sir Walter Scott's covenanting leader, he has nocturnal contests with him. The Ranter is out-and-out; he is no compromiser; he knows the clean-cut line of demarcation between the divine and the devilish. He is a man who has to undergo considerable physical exertion—apart from his religious exercises—and he is therefore usually a powerful trencherman, and not markedly appreciative of the rules of the Food Controller; but he can tell you definitely that beer, tobacco, playing cards, theatres, novels, and last, but not least, the brimstone-smelling productions of infidels—which he would not touch with the tongs—are all clearly and undoubtedly the temptations of the Devil.

The Ranter may be dying out. But we contemplate his passing with mixed feelings. For he was honest.

The Blank Wall.

VIII.

THE "Ultimate Goal" of humanity has yet to be created or discovered. It is more than probable that it would be as ineffectual as any other form of mental daring if it were. That the life of man has a predetermined direction; a knowable meaning, and an ultimate destiny, glorious or otherwise, does not interest the modern mind. It may be because of this indifference that we have to acknowledge the barrenness of popular thought. Barren, that is, when we take it into perspective with the fundamental problems of life which remain unsolved. And were modern thought prolific with discovery of the destiny and meaning of life, we may be certain that the complacent majority would keep on the other side of the road.

Is the obstinate conservatism—the shocking apathy of the normal mind, an indication upon a cosmic scale of the ultimate vacuity and stupidity of life? The thought is insistent, real, and very terrible. Happiness, joy, pain, disease, life and death, the thought of these things has tortured the consciousness of all intelligent people at some time or another. Yet these great universal facts seem to be, in a general way, no more vital and dynamic in normal human existence than the emotions experienced by a servant girl when she finds a bad egg or a broken water-tap.

Is one to believe that the commonplace daily incidents of our material existence are as important as the reality of death, birth, life, pain, joy, disease, and health? Must humanity for ever overestimate the little prosaic things, and relegate the important things to the narrow activity of "advanced thought"? Will the mystical Rationalist attitude to life ever draw the consciousness of man into some thrilling and magnificent dream, wherein the blinding fact of life shall dominate and direct all our inspired energies, and create a world of mental illumination? There would be no need for religion in such a world. Religion would lose all significance in a society which afforded no necessity for third-rate illusions. Religion exists because men are blind, and will cease to exist when men shall receive a light which religion is unable to give.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON FEB. 7.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Braddock, Brandes, Eagar, Gorniot, Leat, Neary, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed.

Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members, 35 in all, were admitted for Goldthorpe, Liverpool, Manchester, Nuneaton, South Shields, Southampton, Swansea, and the Parent Society.

The President and Secretary reported increasing interest in the propaganda at Nuneaton, and that arrangements had been made for lectures to be delivered in the town by Messrs. Lloyd, Palmer, and Willis; and also that the success of the afternoon meetings at the West Central Hall justified their continuance during February.

The continuance of the demand for the tract, The Massacre of the Innocents ("God and the Air-Raid"), was also reported, and it was resolved that it be reprinted with other of the Society's stock tracts.

Ordinary routine business was dealt with, and the meeting adjourned.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

The latest device for inspiring devotion amongst Catholics is a luminous crucifix, which shines in the dark, and, in the touching words of the advertisement, "speaks to the heart by night as by day." The thing should be popular among light-headed Christians.

The Grocers and Allied Trades have contributed £41,015 to the Young Men's Christian Association. Is this to further the cause of Christianity or to promote the sale of groceries?

Views and Opinions.

Science and Religion.

The religious mind seldom takes kindly to science; the religious leader never. Circumstances may, with the latter, call for a cessation of active hostilities, but scientific claims are always viewed with hostility, and every opportunity is seized to emphasize their shortcomings. It could not well be otherwise. Both religion and science claim dominion over the same empire; both deal with the same universe, both come before us as interpretations of the same set of phenomena. You may choose one explanation or the other, but you cannot adopt both—that is, with any valid claim to logic and sanity. If the universe, with all its phenomena, is the expression of an intelligent purpose, then the implied claim of science to explain it in terms that are ultimately reducible to matter and motion is invalid. Or, in more concrete instances—if miracle be a fact, universal causation is a delusion. If the New Testament theory of demonism be true, the scientific theory of disordered nerve action is a delusion. And so on through numerous contrasts. The religious and the scientific interpretations are in direct conflict. They have been in conflict since the dawn of positive science. And the conflict will continue until science has wrested from religion the entire domain of human knowledge, actual and possible.

A Forced Truce.

Consequently, when a Christian preacher talks about science, one must be prepared for certain things. One will usually get a good deal about the failures of science, but very little of its successes. Much about its (ethically) Materialistic outlook, but not much of that lofty idealism which is characteristic of nearly all great figures in the history of science. You will be told what science cannot explain, but will hear little of how much it does explain, and there will be a complete oblivion to the fact that the limitations of existing knowledge is one of the commonplaces of the working scientist. Above all, there will be a positive gloating over the ignorance of science, as though that were something to be proud of, and as though religion possessed knowledge where science was bound to confess itself at fault. And to the psychologist these things are instructive. They prove that, in the person of the bulk of its leaders, religion is substantially where it was. They know that the reconciliation of religion with science is all humbug. Every step of scientific advance means a loss of territory to religion. Given a universe scientifically explained, and religion becomes a sheer anomaly. It has nothing to say, it has nothing to do. It can tell us nothing about the world we do not know without its aid. Its god becomes an absurdity; its ministers a social outrage.

Darwinism and the War.

In Manchester, Bishop Welldon has been lecturing on "Christianity and the War," and one would think the least said, by a parson on that topic the better. For the War is a fact that cannot by any means square with the Christian theory or with Christian claims. No reasonable person can harmonize this international slaughter with the "providential" government of God. Nor can it be adjusted to the claims made by the Christian Church as a civilizing, humanizing power. Of course, one admits the clergy are in a difficult situation. They cannot talk about the War with profit, nor can they remain silent without loss. They suggest doubts and rouse opposition whichever course they adopt. So Bishop Welldon carries the War into the enemy's camp He says:—

> The speculative basis of the War, and the spirit in which it has been waged by Germany, lay in the doctrine of evolution, or the struggle for existence, which was sometimes called the survival of the fittest. These doctrines had taken stronger root in Germany than in England. The whole of the theory of Darwinism had profoundly affected German thought and teaching. Germany had relapsed into a lower moral state, and that relapse was at least partly due to the absence of a consciousness of sin, and the unwarranted faith in the assurance of human progress.

That settles it. Germany went to war because it had adopted the theory of Darwinism. And all the other nations were planning, and plotting, and annexing, and preparing for war—because Darwinism had not taken so strong root with them.

Evolution and God.

Poor Darwin! Directly after he died a Roman Catholic bishop said he was burning in hell for having written the Origin of Species. Now Bishop Welldon saddles him with the responsibility for the European War. And yet one seems to have heard of wars before Darwin was born, or Darwinism heard of. And what is the good of finding fault with Darwinism, anyway? If Darwinism, if evolution, be true, it is no more than a statement of certain natural processes. And as no scientific man doubts the truth of evolution, the one who should be blamed is Bishop Welldon's God. For on the Bishop's own theory, evolution is God's way of working. He designed the struggle for existence; he made it the condition of the development of animal life. Germany may be responsible for much, but it really had nothing to do with establishing the order of nature. Nor is it true that evolution has taken stronger root in Germany than in England—and it would be a national disgrace for us if it were true. The hypothesis of evolution has taken "root" with the world of science everywhere. No one doubts it—except bishops and smaller theological fry. And we would advise Bishop Welldon to stick to discussions on incense, and candles, and vestments, and other ecclesiastical tomfoolery. He is evidently at sea when talking about evolution.

Implications of Darwinism.

But the implications of Darwinism? These are, probably, what Bishop Welldon had in mind. Do these favour war? General Bernhardi said, yes, although he was not a scientific authority. And on our side Lord Roberts, and Lord Kitchener, and Theodore Roosevelt, and Spenser Wilkinson, and scores of others agreed with Bernhardi. The biological benefits of war has been the common talk of militarists all over the world. They argued that a species progresses by the elimination of the unfit. The stronger survive, the weaker are killed off. And, therefore, war by killing off the weaker, or the less fit, makes for progressive improvement. That is the theory; but it is quite false, and scores of German and other writers on science, etheics, and sociology have pointed out its falsity. Modern war does not eliminate the biologically weakest but the biologically strongest. The halt, the lame, and the blind are left behind. It is the healthiest and strongest that go to the battle front and fall. That is so obvious that it scarcely needs elaboration. Modern war means the elimination of the strongest and the preservation of the weakest.

Evolution and Society.

Apply Darwinism to the group and the theory fares still worse. Man is a social animal. That is a root fact that dominates all other considerations. His survival, as an individual, is not a mere test of individual fitness, it is far more a test of social fitness, of his ability to fit into the social structure. No man in a human group pays the full price of a biological deficiency. The division of labour prevents this by finding a special occupation suitable to his natural endowments. And his "fitness" to his social environment is largely a question of mental and moral qualities. The extreme anti-social character is suppressed, the markedly social character is encouraged. Fitness thus tends to be expressed in terms that really makes for the general advancement of the world. For, be it noted, it is not the biologically prize animal that is the fittest in human society but the socialized man or woman. It is, in fact, the gradual alteration in the significance of "fittest" that makes the present War so disastrous. For the same process that has given "fittest" a social value within the group is fast giving, if it has not already given, it the same significance between groups. The interdependence of the world is growing. The hypothesis of evolution describes the lines on which that growth is taking place. And in a recognition of the real nature of the process lies one of the strongest incentives to work for human betterment.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

It is with diseases of the mind as with those of the body; we are half dead before we understand our disorders, and half recovered when we do.

The Newest Apologetic.

IV.

IT is a formidable charge against the Christian religion that in the exact degree in which the belief in it is sincerely and fervently held it engenders an utterly intolerant and savage spirit towards all who either repudiate it altogether or even advocate unauthorized versions of it. A Christian of the New Testament type has no right to be on terms of fellowship with either opponents or corruptors of the Faith. Even the Gospel Jesus himself was at heart a persecutor. The Scribes and Pharisees were wholly intolerable to him, and he cursed them with the utmost severity. Indeed, intolerance is a Christian virtue, and it is historically verifiable that the decline of persecution in modern times has been accompanied by a corresponding decay of Christian belief. Let it be continually borne in mind, then, that, on the assumption of the truth of Christianity, the cultivation of the spirit of intolerance, so far from being a fault, is a duty of first-class importance. Our contention has always been that a genuine disciple of Jesus Christ cannot sit down, with folded arms, while damning heresies are being disseminated in the land, without being guilty of disloyalty to his Divine Lord. Therefore, it is alone on the assumption of its untruth, that we have ever utilized persecution as an argument against Christianity. In his little book, The Achievements of Christianity, the Rev. J. K. Mozley, B.D., frankly admits that his religion has systematically practised appalling cruelties and shed a vast amount of blood. He says:—

> It is true that in the Middle Ages the Church felt it an incumbent duty, fully accordant with the genius of Christianity, to repress heresy, and to hand over obstinate heretics to the secular arm for punishment. It is true that the Inquisition, especially in Spain, was responsible for an immense amount of suffering, inflicted under the supposition that it was pleasing to God. It is true that the Reformers were by no means prepared to repudiate the use of force against their theological opponents, and that in England, under Elizabeth, Roman Catholic priests were cruelly put to death. It is true that in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Europe was drenched with blood as a result of the "religious" wars. It is true that religious toleration and the granting of full civil rights to those who did not profess the established faith of their several countries, to Jews and to unbelievers, was long in coming and was bitterly opposed. In a word, this charge, even when allowance is made for exaggeration by those anxious to paint Christianity as a whole, or some section of Christians, at its worst, is a serious one, and must be candidly and seriously dealt with (pp. 50, 51).

Of course, no one conversant with the history of the Church, could honestly deny the truth of such a charge, and Mr. Mozley deserves no praise for his frank admission of its truth. And yet we do congratulate him upon his statement that "all Christians to-day would acknowledge that for many of the things that belong to their own past history there is no possible excuse." But let us be quite sure which things they were for which there is no possible excuse. At this point Mr. Mozley displays no inconsiderable amount of ingenuity. Among the things enumerated as admitting of no justification were the pushing to indefensible lengths of principles in themselves arguable; the twisting of judicial forms to the detriment of justice itself, "as when an accused person before the Inquisition could employ no pleader on his behalf"; the occasional deterioration into sheer cruelty of what might have been viewed as righteous vengeance, "especially in connection with the Inquisition in Spain." To cut a long story short, Mr. Mozley perceives that

"the fact that men believed they were serving God, and following out the will of Christ, did not save them on occasion from—I will not say—measures of the most drastic sternness, but not even from gross outrages and cruelties." The real question, however, is "whether the repressive measures of the Middle Ages and the religious wars that followed the Reformation were so undoubtedly wrong and condemnable in themselves, that the observer of these facts has a right to feel biased by them against Christianity, and, indeed, to look on them as facts whose force no defence can parry." This is how Mr. Mozley deals with the subject:—

> The whole question of toleration is much more difficult than the assailants of the Christian record in this matter allow. Modern feeling, Christian and non-Christian alike, runs in other and wider grooves than those which limited sentiment and opinion five hundred years ago. Christians, as well as others, have learnt from the past, and have come to emphasize afresh those elements in the Gospel which are unfriendly to the use of force in matters of religion, and to distrust the logic which builds up a theory and policy of repression on the unquestionable sense of the seriousness of wrong belief which pervades the New Testament. But to allow our present feelings to dictate our judgment of the past, to compound for sins that we in our modern civilization may be inclined to, by damning, with an indignation however real, those we have no mind to, is to reveal the spirit, not of the sober and intelligent critic and historian, but of the boisterous and undisciplined partisan (53, 54).

Whilst there is much truth in that extract, the whole of it is vitiated by an obvious fallacy. The author takes the existence of true and false religious beliefs for granted, though he possesses no data upon which to base an intelligent judgment on the subject. What the Church persecuted in the Dark Ages was, not "every kind of moral poison," but every kind of theological heresy. The Albigenses were morally a superior class of people, and on the score of mere morality there was no complaint against them, but because they held views condemned by ecclesiastical authority, upwards of a million of them were cruelly murdered. It is a truism nowadays that no theological opinions whatever can be proved to be either true or false. They lie completely outside the sphere of proof or disproof. Mr. Mozley says:—

> I must point out that we ought not to make our modern assumptions of the unimportance of intellectual error and the absolute right of speculative freedom the tests whereby to judge Christians of past ages. We have no very good ground for the former assumption, and as to the latter, however great be the advantages of complete speculative freedom, the disadvantages are not inconsiderable (p. 52).

It must not be forgotten that Mr. Mozley is an apologist, and that as such alone he has written his book. To him "theological" and "intellectual" are seemingly synonymous terms, and "theological error" is "moral poison." As a theologian, he asserts that it is sheer unreasoning dogmatism to limit the results of every kind of moral poison to the present life; but he does not see that it is equally dogmatic to extend the consequences of anything beyond the tomb. The dogmatism always begins with the theologian, while the Freethinker contents himself with simply denying anybody's right to dogmatize at all in such a region. As a matter of fact, the main difference between Mr. Mozley and ourselves is that, whilst he deems it expedient to offer excuses for the persecution practised in past ages, we undertake to justify it on the ground that people should have the courage of their convictions, whatever they may be. It is not the persecutors that we judge, but the religion which makes them such. It is not Martin Luther or John Calvin we denounce, but the hideous theology that produces such monsters. The reason why the Church of to-day does not persecute on the same scale as her predecessor of the Middle Ages did is that she lacks both the power and the intensity of belief requisite to do so. On occasions, indications are given that, if she had the power, the fires of persecution would once more blaze out as fiercely as ever, the spirit being indeed quite willing, but the flesh hopelessly weak; but such occasions are few and far between. Generally speaking, the Christian religion is now not even the ghost of its former self.

J. T. LLOYD.

Coleridge's Table-Talk.

> That which will stand of Coleridge is this: the stimulus of his continual instinctive effort to get at and to lay bare the real truth of the matter in hand, whether that matter were literary or philosophical, or political or religious; and this in a country when at the moment such an effort was almost unknown.—Matthew Arnold.

"NOT one man in a thousand has either strength of mind or goodness of heart to be an Atheist. I repeat it. Not one man in ten thousand has goodness of heart or strength of mind to be Atheist." This is a quotation from Samuel Taylor Coleridge's Table-Talk, of which a new edition has been published by Mr. Milford, with an introductory essay by Coventry Patmore. It was a man with a big heart and a big head who said that. It loses none of its force from the fact that Coleridge was a Christian, although not an ordinary one, for he was a man of real and unmistakeable genius. Always he wore his "rue with a difference." Coleridge had read too much, and thought too much. Some of the best men he knew, such as Charles Lamb, were heterodox. His close friend, Wordsworth, was not without a suspicion of Pantheism, and the world was ringing with the Rationalistic message of the French Revolution. Coleridge knew that it was not stupidity and heartlessness that made men doubt the existence of "god," but sleepless intellect that would not be lulled by priestly incense, and sympathy that not only saw, but felt, the miseries of man.

Coleridge was as great a talker as Dr. Johnson, but he had no Boswell at hand to record all of his remarks. His friend, Robert Southey, said that Coleridge's mouth "seems incapable of being at rest." Southey was hard to please, for he had the richest talker in England in the same house with him, and it only made him peevish. The explanation is that Southey had a commonplace mind, and was the antipodes of Coleridge. In all Southey's shelf-full of books there is not any spark of genius. Charles Lamb, who was a genius, had a very different impression of Coleridge's talk. Writing of one of the poet's visits, he said: "I am living in a continual feast. Coleridge has been with me now for nigh on three weeks." The picture which Thomas Carlyle gives of Coleridge at Highgate Hill is exceedingly graphic, and endorses Lamb's view:—

> Coleridge sat on the brow of Highgate Hill, in those years, looking down on London and its smoke-tumult, like a sage escaped from life's battle; attracting towards him the thoughts of innumerable brave souls still engaged there. He had, especially among young inquiring men, a higher than literary, a kind of prophetic or magician character. No talk in his century, or in any other, could be more inspiring.

Coleridge did other and finer work than talk across the dinner-table. Endowed with an intellect of the first order, and an imagination at once delicate and splendid, Coleridge left enough poetry and criticism to place him in the front rank of authors. This is no disparagement of his conversational ability. Except Selden's Table Talk, there is hardly so rich a treasure-house of wisdom in the language than Coleridge's Table Talk. It represents the mature thought of a princely intellect equally at home in the book of the world and in the world of books. His friends had better entertainment than food and wine, for there have been few such brilliant talkers than Coleridge. The pages of his book show us how an accomplished man, famous for his conversation, entertained his company near a hundred years ago. For, like Lord Mansfield, who, in his youth, "drank champagne with the wits," Coleridge enjoyed the best of good company from first to last.

The contributions which Coleridge made to modern thought, rich, ample, and suggestive as they are, have all the characteristics of his varied and eventful life. In whatever he attempted, he drove the shaft deep, and gave us samples of the wealth of ore lying in its confines. Although he worked these mines only at irregular intervals, and passed from one to the other, yet, by stimulating others, he caused the ground to be explored as it never was before in England. If it cannot be said that he left a complete system, yet it can be said, and it is a noble tribute, that he made it possible for others to grasp the principles underlying all systems. His contribution to the literature of power is almost unsurpassed by any modern writer.

Yet, great as Coleridge's genius was, he suffered from laxity of fibre. He wrote a lot, and the notes he made would have been a task for most men. But he was incapable of continued and concentrated labour. Intellect he had; the frenzy of poetry was in his eyes; but he was indolent. The result was he illuminated the world, not with a steady light like Shakespeare, but in meteoric flashes, which, in Milton's expressive phrase, "made darkness visible."

The living Coleridge was ever his own apology. Men and women who neither shared nor ignored his shortcomings not only loved him, but honoured him. He must have had a rich and royal nature to have gathered about him such choice friends as Wordsworth, Scott, Lamb, De Quincey, Byron, Hazlitt, and Sterling. In fancy we cannot fail to conjure up his placid figure during his later years—the silver hair, pale face, luminous blue eyes, the portly form clothed in black, slow walk, benignant manner, and the inexhaustible talk that was the flow of a golden sea of eloquence and wisdom. A great man and a great poet, the wings of his imagination wave easily in the ether of high Olympus. Yet how forlorn the end! For more than thirty years he was the slave of opium. It broke up his home; it alienated his wife; it ruined his health; it made him wretched. Back of all this he was the slave of irresolution and character, some of the enervating dejection of Hamlet, which kept him for ever at war with himself, and at last cast him out upon the homeless ocean of despair, to drift away to ruin and to death. Before its fierce and pitiless blasts he was driven by the storm like his own mariner:—

> Alone, alone, all, all alone,
> Alone on a wide, wide sea.

A brief dawn of unsurpassed promise and achievement; a trouble as of clouds and weeping rain; then a long summer evening's work done by the setting sun's pathetic light—such was Coleridge's day, the afterglow of which is still in the sky. A dreamer of dreams, it is in his descriptions of his visions that he is most original. Poet, mystic, seer, he dreamed continually. He knocked at the portals of the world of imagination and caught glimpses of its magic, and it is this that gives him his secure, his exceptional place among the masters of English letters. His hand opened the magic casements on the perilous seas sailed by "the Ancyent Marinere," and the fairylands of "Kubla Khan" and "Christabel."

The Orb of Day.

VI.

(Concluded from p. 109).

FEW realize the depth to which this world's temperature would decline were the solar radiance cancelled. The exact lowering of temperature remains undetermined, but there is general agreement among those best qualified to speak that the temperature at our planet's surface would decline at least 300 degrees Fahrenheit below zero. A certain sum of planetary heat arises from the earth's interior, but almost all the heat existing at its surface is derived directly from the sun's rays, while the heat evolved from the combustion of wood and coal, and the energy of wind and water power, represent the indirect effects of solar radiation, either past or present. The writer remembers an otherwise reasonable man who persistently asserted that the sun cannot be a heated body, and he insisted that this is conclusively shown by the fact that when we ascend a mountain, or rise in a balloon, the temperature, instead of increasing steadily, falls. According to his theory, as we leave the lower earth and approach the sun then, if the sun be really a hot body, the very opposite would necessarily happen.

Yet, despite the utter insignificance of the elevation above the earth's surface attainable by man in comparison with the radius of our planet's orbit, an appreciable increase in the intensity of the sun's rays does accompany the ascent beyond the lower particle-strewn terrestrial atmosphere. On the surface, astonishment seems warranted at the fall in temperature at great altitudes, notwithstanding the increased radiation from the sun. Simple, however, is the explanation of this seeming paradox. Solar rays heat those substances only that absorb them. Transparent materials, such as glass, absort little radiant heat, and the clearer the atmosphere the more readily heat rays pass through it unchanged. Lamp black, however, is a powerful absorbent which intercepts nearly all the rays and transforms their energy into heat. And in varying degrees this is true of many other substances. Now, near the earth's surface, the atmosphere is in touch with the soil which is highly absorbent, and is heated by contact with it. At great elevations the freer air is less in touch with the ground, and as it transmits the solar rays with avidity it is very slightly warmed by them. Even more, air at high altitudes contains carbon-dioxide and other constituents, all of which serve as rapid radiators of heat into surrounding space. Thus, the upper currents are cold, and their refrigerating powers are all the greater on mountains where strong winds usually prevail.

As it rises the atmosphere thins materially, and warm currents ascending into the upper regions heat the attenuated air less than they would do were the density of the atmosphere uniform. Air currents rising from the globe's heated surface expand as they move upwards and are, in consequence, cooled. The marked frigidity of high table lands, such as the plateau of Tibet, is largely attributable to the dryness of the upper air. The moisture arising from the Indian Ocean fails to influence the tablelands of Tibet, because in its passage through the atmosphere to a height so great it is so seriously reduced in temperature that it is mainly precipitated either as rain or snow. Water vapour, although practically transparent to light, and likewise to over 80 per cent. of all the solar rays, yet acts as a potent absorber of the rays emitted by the relatively cold earth. At the lower levels where water vapour is abundant in the atmosphere it serves to delay the escape of terrestrial rays into space. Owing to the avidity of the air environing the highlands of continental countries, particularly in their inner areas, the cooling of the earth through radiation proceeds more rapidly than in regions nearer the ocean, with the result that conditions of cold prevail. In mountainous districts the general surroundings are favourable to depressed temperatures, for the sun's radiation is obstructed, and such areas are constantly subjected to cold blasts.

The solar rays, until recently, were regarded as forming three separate phenomena. These were classified as actinic or chemical rays; light or visible rays; and heat or invisible rays. As Dr. Abbot states:—

> These distinctions are now known to be misleading, for the rays which affect modern photographic plates extend in the spectrum from far beyond the furthest violet to far beyond the furthest red, and the rays which can produce heat include all these and many more still further beyond the red. All rays may be totally transformed to produce heat, however they may differ in their effects upon the eye, or in different chemical substances. All these rays travel with equal velocity in free space, and this velocity is about 300,000 kilometers (186,000 miles) per second.

The wave lengths of visible rays vary greatly, and their respective vibrations per second range from 430 to 750 millions of millions. Photographic processes disclose rays which vary in length from 0.0001 millimeter to wave frequency of 3,000,000,000,000,000. By delicate heat measurement wave-lengths of extraordinary range have been determined. All are of solar origin, while many others are probably intercepted by our atmosphere as they speed from the sun towards the earth.

Although absolutely indispensable to us, the sun, and, indeed, the whole solar system, occupies an extremely small position in the universe. Our luminary is only a tenth-rate sun, one of that mighty host of suns or stars of which more than one hundred million are accessible to the astronomer. Our orb, while hotter than some suns, possesses a much lower temperature than others. Like other celestial bodies, the sun sails with its retinue of worlds on a ceaseless voyage through space. Our orb is larger than some stars, while others vastly exceed it in mass, in motion, and in lustre. Arcturus appears to be a sun of far greater magnitude, and shines with a brilliance at least 100 times the brightness of the sun. And while our luminary travels at the rate of a few miles per second only, the star Groombridge No. 1830 speeds with a velocity of 200 miles per second, and Arcturus rushes through the heavens at the tremendous velocity of 380 miles per second. Throughout unthinkable ages, the sun and his family have been flying through space towards the constellation Lyra. Every day of our lives we are nearer to it by about a million miles. Yet so unspeakably vast are the stellar distances that the solar system will not reach the present position of the star Vega, towards which we are travelling, until over half a million years have passed away. Nor does it follow that when the sun arrives in that region where Vega is now shining that the solar globe will meet that majestic star. For Vega is proceeding on its own journey, and is departing from its present position nearly as rapidly as our system is approaching it.

It has long been realized that all flesh is grass. The herbivorous animals derive their nourishment from vegetation, and carnivorous creatures devour the flesh of their less ferocious plant-eating neighbours. Every representative of the floral kingdom depends, directly or indirectly, upon the activities of the sun. The higher plants of the field and forest not only furnish sustenance, but provide an endless variety of commodities for building, manufacturing, and other purposes essential to civilized life.

Various chemical constituents enter into the composition of plants, but carbon is their most important element. Plants differ in their methods of obtaining carbon. There are the Autotrophic—the self-nourishing—which, under the influence of light, obtain it through their foliage from the carbonic acid gas of the atmosphere; while the parasitic plants secure their nourishment from the superior vegetation to which they attach themselves. Lastly, the inferior Saprophytes absorb their nutriment in large measure from decaying organic matter. All vegetation is extensively composed of water, which is indispensable to the vital activities of the higher flora. Water is essential to all green vegetation, and the enormous quantities drawn from the soil and evaporated through their leaves by forest trees are simply astounding. According to Von Hohnel, a large birch tree will discharge into the atmosphere in one day eighty pounds of water. Therefore, "If 200 such trees grew on an acre, their water output in a season would perhaps reach 1,500 tons." Apart from the sun, this liquid would immediately assume the solid form; and solar energy is also essential to evolve and sustain the atmospheric currents upon which the rainfall depends. Temperature and moisture on our planet depend absolutely on solar activity. Thus we discover that the orb of day is not only the dispenser of light and heat, but the lord of life as well.

The outcome of a collision of two dark stars, the primeval nebula afterwards evolved into the sun, planets, and moons of our system. As our planet cooled, and the life-bearing stage was reached, those chemical elements which form living substances combined to give birth to protoplasm—the elementary material of organic Nature. The Earth Mother was then made germinal by the embraces of the all-creating sun. A poet of true genius, William Watson, in his "Ode in May," has pictured in splendid verse the genesis of life on our globe. Thus he sings:—

For of old the Sun, our sire,
Came wooing the mother of men,
Earth, that was virginal then,
Vestal fire to his fire.
Silent her bosom and coy,
But the strong god sued and pressed;
And born of their starry nuptial joy
Are all that drink of her breast.

And the triumph of him that begot,
And the travail of her that bore,
Behold, they are evermore
As warp and weft in our lot.
We are children of splendour and flame,
Of shuddering, also, and tears;
Magnificent out of the dust we came,
And abject from the spheres.

O bright irresistible lord,
We are fruit of Earth's womb, each one,
And fruit of thy loins, O Sun,
Whence first was the seed outpoured.
To thee as our Father we bow,
Forbidden thy Father to see,
Who is older and greater than thou, as thou
Art greater and older than we.

Concealment regarding a question of such vital importance as the truth of Christianity is to be deplored; while an attitude of indifference on a subject that should be of surpassing interest to us all can only be characterized as amazing—unless, indeed, the real explanation be that men have ceased to believe.—Philip Vivian.

Belief in God.

A Lecture by the late G. W. Foote, at St. James's Hall, on October 29, 1909.

I AM to speak to you to-night on why men believe in God. Of course, the word men is used generically. I would have made it men and women, but it would have been much too long a title. The ladies must regard themselves as included, but all Acts of Parliament don't include them. On this occasion there is no reservation whatever; nay, I am inclined to think that a very large number of men believe in God simply because a woman, in the form of their mother, taught them so. I should say that not one man or woman in ten thousand in this or in any other Christian country believes in God for any other reason than that of early education; and one corroboration of this proposition is, that just according to the education is the name and personality of the God who is believed in. In England, a man is taught to believe in a composite kind of God: God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; and, indeed, one ought to say, in many cases, God the Devil, too; and I am not sure that the Catholics do not add a fifth, far better than all the other four put together—the Goddess, the Virgin Mary; and if I had to make a choice, I would rather worship a beautiful woman than I would worship an old person who never had a child.

Now, if you were brought up in Turkey, you would swear by Allah—a god who has no rival and no partner. That, of course, is a sneer at the expense of the Christian Deity, which is at least Trinitarian.

If you were brought up in the Southern part of Africa, you would be a believer in "Mumbo Jumbo"; and just according to the geographical accident of birth, is a man's religion in after years. The place of birth settles it. But why? Because of the education (rude or complex and intricate) which is obtained in the part of the world where he happens to be born. I heard Lord Coleridge—the late Lord Coleridge say from the Bench at the time of my own trial under the Blasphemy Laws—I heard him say to the gentlemen of the jury that "you and I, gentlemen, would probably be of the same religion if we had not been brought up in it"; and if I had had to speak after the judge, instead of before him, I should have challenged that statement. Because, as a matter of fact, all the missionaries, in all parts of the world, make practically no impression upon the native heathen population. Just as men are brought up, so they live; and as they live, so they die. The solicitations of religion at death are simply the consolations which they have been accustomed to in life. Whoever heard of a dying Christian sending for a Mohammedan dervish? Whoever heard of a dying Mohammedan sending for a Catholic priest or a Protestant parson? Every man dies comfortably enough in the creed in which he has been brought up, unless, of course, there is so much hell-fire in it that no one could possibly die for it.

But if people believe in God and tell me that they believe because they think, I say that I don't believe that one in ten thousand has given five minutes serious and consecutive thought to the matter during the whole course of his life. You know little children are put upon their knees—a thing they never take to kindly—you have got to keep them there—a child will always get up if he can, which shows that there is something artificial about the whole business. But he is put on his knees, and in this country he is made to repeat the Lord's Prayer, "Our Father which art in heaven." Our Father! and sometimes that little boy has no father alive; and sometimes he has a father alive who might better be dead; and sometimes he has a father alive whom neither he nor his mother ever sees; and although he cannot find his own father always, he is taught to be quite sure about his other father "which art in heaven," and that is farther off, when the earthly father has deserted him, than any Board of Guardians could possibly wish. And, by-and-by, when he grows up, he is taught what is called "The Apostles Creed." The very name is a fraud. The Apostles had as much to do with framing it as you or I. According to a tradition, the Apostles all stood in a row, and the first began "I believe," the next said "in God the Father," and the next said "Maker of Heaven and Earth," and so the inspiration ran through the twelve until it came to the last, and all that was left for him to say was "Amen." Well, that is the only part of the creed I believe in.

Now, in that creed, the boy—the girl—is taught to believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth. The largest order on record! Why, fancy teaching a boy or girl, who can't yet make anything worth making, to believe in the maker of heaven and earth! Any child can use that expression; not one man or woman can understand it. In fact, religion consists of unintelligible propositions stated in artificial language. Do you know why they drone so in places of worship? why they talk through their noses? If a man were to say right out in a plain, honest, commonsense address to commonsense people:—

> The Father is incomprehensible, The Son is incomprehensible, The Holy Ghost is incomprehensible, ye there are not three comprehensibles, but only one comprehensible.

You could not stand it like that. People would all laugh in his face, but if you were to stand and say it in the way in which people say it in church, you know nobody would think of criticizing it. Why, what does it matter what the thing means when you say it like that? You take it without criticism; you swallow it.

Lord Forbes says that religion is like a pill; if you chew it, you will never swallow it. And that is why the priests of all religions want the children.

They know, if you come to a grown-up man or woman with a pack of nonsense, he or she is likely to look at you. If you come to a grown-up man or woman and say, "Here is a nice little box; there is something that will make you happy for ever and ever, and the price is only 7s. 6d.," you will find very few purchasers. But if you get hold of a little child and teach him that, he will pay 7s. 6d. a year as long as he lives. Why don't they let the child alone? They can't afford it. No religion in the world dares to let a child grow up strong enough to think for himself before they commence to operate upon him.

And you notice they always teach a child what is of no use to him. I defy anybody to point out one single clause in the Apostles' Creed (setting the Athanasian Creed aside altogether) which is of the slightest importance to any man, woman, or child in this world. It is all about the next. And a healthy person always feels that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

They never teach a child anything they know. Every religion teaches a child to say "I believe," "I believe." That is what they start with. That is the unit. They get that unit well planted in the child's mind, "I believe." What? Never mind, the religious teacher says. Get the "I believe" well in first. That is the unit; then we add the ciphers to complete the sum at our pleasure afterwards.

Now, I call that a nefarious business. I would not prejudice my own child in favour of Freethought. I would give my child the absolute right to think for his own self, and there is no other freedom really than that.

Digitized by Google

Certainly you have the right to tell your child what you please, or if other people tell him things which you don't believe, you have the right to say that you personally don't believe them; but you have got no right to demand that your child should not believe them; and I believe that if you only practise respect for the intellectual rights of the child, you will have future generations of men and women who will dwarf intellectually and morally everything that the world has ever seen.

I believe, however, that if we believe in God to-day because we were taught so, there must have been a time when people believed in God because they thought so. Now, when and where did people first believe in God? In the old dark days of human or semi-human savagery. All the great world religions, such as Mohammedanism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Judaism, are only special weavings on special looms of the raw material of savage superstition. All the great religions have their belief in providence, worship, prayer, miracles, sacrifice; and all this clearly shows us the savage origin of religion.

If you asked a savage, for instance, why he believes in dead men living, he does not give you a long rigmarole which, at the finish, may mean nothing at all. He says: "I know it. I see them; I talk to them; they talk to me"; and if you ask him further, you discover that he sees them and talks to them, and they talk to him in his dreams. Ah, you say, "it is a dream"; but the savage makes no distinction between one memory and another. He has not reached that stage of sociological criticism. Put yourself in his place, and you will see that you would be obliged to conclude as he does. While he has been lying there, and his companions—his squaw, perhaps—assures him that he has never budged, he has seen dead people. He may even have fought dead enemies, embraced dead friends—talked with them, they with him; and when he awakes and recollects these things, he can only conclude that while his body was lying there quiescent, something else has been out of him, and has seen these distant places and these dead people, and talked with them. With his feeble information, he is nevertheless logical. He concludes that they are living, and that when finally his dull nature breaks up, and the something which went out of him in sleep goes out of him finally at death, that something will go into ghostland with the dead people whom he has seen and spoken to in his dreams. Now, then, the soul goes in and out of the body, and a most elaborate superstition has been based upon that.

Go back to your Old Testament; read how the Israelitish prophet came to bring back to life a little boy. The prophet stretched himself on the boy seven times, and at the seventh time the boy sneezed. Why did he sneeze? Ask any parson, and he will probably say, "I really don't know." Why did the boy sneeze? Because the spirit or soul which had gone out of him came back through the nose. That is the way the soul went in and out; and if your soul came back through the nose, you would naturally sneeze.

And during the Middle Ages exorcists went about, and you may see pictures of them casting out devils, and the devils generally went out through the nose. Why? Because the breath went in and out of the nose; and the breath was the life, so they concluded. We know it is the life, but it's a necessity of life; and still, you know, they will bring a glass to see if dead people will stain it in any way, to discover if they are still breathing. Well, the soul went in and out of the nose, and I have sometimes thought that it was for that reason that the gentlemen who trade in the ghostly business select that organ to lead us by.

(To be concluded.)

Acid Drops.

The longer the War continues, the more ridiculous do our "spiritual pastors and masters" make themselves. When the War commenced, they were full of the "spiritual uplift," the "bracing moral tonic," war had given the nation. Now, rather late in the day, the bishops are beginning to declaim against the "vice" and "immorality" amongst the soldiers. And even now they lack either the intelligence to see or courage to say that this alleged "immorality" is a necessary consequence of taking millions of men in the full flush of manhood, separating them from all influence of normal social existence, and keeping them under the anti-social conditions of a military life. The things complained of are not an incidental or accidental result of war; they are one of its normal consequences. You cannot have war, you cannot have even militarism without actual war, without debasing the moral life of a nation. We said this when the War began. We have been saying so ever since. And after three and a half years of war, the Bench of Bishops apparently have not the intelligence to see it or the courage to say it.

The other day Lord Coleridge, in presiding at the trial of a soldier, said we must not judge a man who had spent three years at the Front by the standard with which we judged other people. The remark was a very sensible one, and should provide food for reflection. This man, and millions of others, has been engaged in devoting a lengthy period to either killing or preparing to kill a number of his fellow-men. The killing may be inevitable; it may be quite justifiable. These things may be admitted, but they are beside the point. And the point is that, however justifiable the slaughter may be, the brutalizing process cannot be avoided. Human life becomes a cheap thing. The sight of slaughter makes men hard and callous. And when these men return to civil life, it is impossible that these consequences should be wiped out all at once. Lord Coleridge said only what every sensible person knows to be true. To say otherwise is either stupidity or cant.

The dead hand is an important factor in religion, and the huge sums left for the furtherance of the Christian superstition should make Freethinkers think furiously. The fortune of the late Sir Edward Wood was sworn at £172,649, and the residue of this huge sum has been left to the Baptists.

The new Bishop of Hereford, Dr. Hensley Henson, preaching at the Temple Church, said that "the founders of the Christian Church were humble, obscure, and uneducated men." The Bishop did not explain how the Gospels were written in Greek by these "uneducated" folk.

The Westminster Gazette says: "it was emphatically for the promotion of science that Henry VIII. founded Trinity College, Cambridge." Henry's devotion to science was not so marked as his attachment to the ladies.

Christians are ashamed of the dogmas of hell-fire and eternal torment, but they are disingenuous in their apologies. The Times Literary Supplement says: "The doctrine of hell has undoubtedly often been presented in the past by popular writers and preachers in a form which would make it impossible for any right-feeling man to regard the maker of hell with any emotion short of pure loathing." "Popular writers and preachers" is distinctly good, when one remembers that the dogmas of hell-fire have been presented without a break from the days of Jesus Christ to those of Billy Sunday.

The Rev. George Charles Wallis, Vicar of Ormesby, was fined for hoarding food. Evidently, Brother Wallis thinks that the ravens who fed Elijah have retired from active service.

Shelley was a very modest man, and he would have been admonished at the interest that book collectors take in his works. The poet's Refutation of Deism, published in 1814 at a few pence, was sold recently at the Huntingdon Sale in New York, and realized the enormous snm of £690, which is a record price for a pamphlet.

Lord Hugh Cecil calls upon the Archbishop and Bishops of the Province of Canterbury "to make clear beyond dispute or doubt that the Church in common with the whole Catholic Church teaches as an essential part of the Christian Faith that our Lord was born of the Virgin Mary without human father, and that the narratives of his Nativity in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke are not poetical legend but historical fact." Lord Hugh is only a layman, but being a sincere Christian, he is to be admired for his courage in so uncompromisingly championing the cause of faith against that of reason. They are miserable trimmers, despicable time-servers, who treat as beautiful parable or poetic legend the alleged fact which alone would make a Divine Incarnation conceivably possible.

Lord Hugh Cecil is also perfectly justified in insisting upon the principle that "no person should be made a deacon, ordained a priest, or consecrated a bishop in the Church of England who does not thoroughly hold and will not faithfully teach the truth of the Church's teaching in regard to the Nativity of our Lord." When it is a question of more or less of an absurd or impossible belief, we are decidedly in favour of the more, even of the most, as against the least. Nothing can be more degrading, or more dehumanizing, than to subscribe a creed with mental reservations, and for the rest of one's life to play the hypocrite, as many of the clergy are known to do. The only consistent Christian is a thoroughgoing Catholic.

The secularization of Christianity is going on in the United States much the same as in the Old Country, and Mr. G. W. Coleman, an American Baptist, has been describing the efforts of the Bostonians to attract "non-churchgoers and the unorthodox" to the Churches by means of "the Open Forum" Sunday meetings, held for the discussion of "vital public questions." The sincerity of the movement may be estimated by the motto on the platform, "Nothing offensive to race, class, or creed," which reduces discussion to the level of a Bible class.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc declares that the miracle at Lourdes had changed the mind of modern Europe, and was the special providential act designed to upset the Materialism of the nineteenth century. The "miracle' was the alleged appearance, in a grotto, of the Virgin Mary in 1858 to a local French girl, and the holy lady must have been then over eighteen hundred years' old. If the "miracle" did not upset the Materialists, it certainly was a "providential act" to increase the revenues of the Catholic Church.

We referred last week to the taking over of Church property in Russia by the Bolshevik Government. As a supplement to what was then said, and as a comment upon the talk of "outrage" and "robbery" in some of the English papers, it may be well to remember that no later than 1904 an Act was passed by the British House of Commons (5 Ed. VII. c. 12) giving the right to the State of refusing to allow a religious body to have more property than in the opinion of appointed commissioners it can usefully employ in the service of its religion. This clearly gives the State the right of confiscation. We had forgotten this Act when writing last week, but it is clear that if the Bolsheviks were inclined, they might appeal for a precedent to the Britain of 1904.

The Rev. J. MacMorland, Chaplain to the Forces, says the Church has little attraction for the men. They have not lost all religion, for they have found a new one of their own. This was a relation of loyalty, comradeship, and good fellowship. And yet, says Mr. MacMorland, it was nothing but the living word of Christ resumed in a new form. Now, what on earth has loyalty, comradeship, and good fellowship to do with "the living word of Christ"? They are amongst the most primitive of the social virtues, and have about as much to do with Christ as with the man in the moon. The fact is that Mr. MacMorland, being a chaplain, must find somewhere a place for Christ. The loss of religious faith in the Army is patent—so patent that the clergy are forced to admit it. But Christ must come in somewhere. Hence Mr. MacMorland's apology—which most people will take at its true value.

A terrible fire occurred last week at the Grey Nunnery, Montreal. The newspapers report the death of nearly 100 babies, ranging from a few days old upward, and a number of wounded children. Those who have thanked God for preserving them from German torpedoes on the sea or German bullets on the land may, perhaps, ask themselves what he was doing not to pay a little attention to these hundred helpless children in Montreal. Atheism does not, of course, take away the horror of such a catastrophe, but at least it is free from the additional horror of belief in a God sitting aloft and watching the conflagration.

A Lieutenant (R.N.V.R.) writes to the Nation, asking:—

> Why do clergy and bishops, Churchmen and theologians, have such an exaggerated opinion of their own importance? Who, among the workers, literary, scientific, commercial, care "tuppence" for the opinions of the representatives of the Church? What experience have they of the Church on the problems (sexual, political, breadwinning) of the majority? Their opinion on vital questions is, to use a Canadianism, "damn all."

Of course, the opinion of the clergy on any vital problem is worthless; but they talk, and large numbers are fooled by their talking. If they ceased talking, no one would bother about them for long. We may be thankful that a smaller number every year attend to their talking.

One would scarcely have thought it, but, according to Cardinal Bourne, the true spirit of the Catholic Church is shown in—> its passion for fair treatment and for liberty; its resentment at bureaucratic interferences with family life; its desire for self-realization and opportunities of education; above all, its conviction that persons are of more value than property.

If only Cardinal Bourne would explain how it happens that liberty has always been weakest where the Catholic Church has been strongest, that the Church's interference with family life forms one of the most disastrous chapters in European history, that education is poorest in Roman Catholic countries and centres, and that the Church has been one of the greatest "grabbers" of wealth and property, we should be rather more convinced. As it is, we have only Cardinal Bourne's statement, and, with many, the word of a cardinal is not above suspicion.

Canon Streeter has edited a volume of essays on "Immortality," which contains, among other things, an exposition of Biblical teaching respecting hell. You can always trust Christians to introduce hell in such discussions among themselves, but they keep the lid on when in the company of Freethinkers.

Twenty-four German missionaries have been shipped to this country from West Africa, and are now interned in London. Quite an ironical situation in a Christian country

The dear Daily News is getting quite facetious. In a recent issue it asks: "Will Lord Rhondda go down to history as 'Lord of the Manna'?" Some of the pious readers of the News will be asking the editor to mend his "mannas."

Lady Nott Bower declares that many girls are marrying feeble-minded men, whom they would not have looked at before the War. This may account for the number of curates' weddings recorded recently.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

L. MUSKETT.—We are not responsible for the accuracy of the report; our only care is to see that it reaches us from what we believe to be a responsible source.

R. PARKER.—We quite recall you, and hope with you that the lectures will be resumed. As you say, the parsonic screed you enclose is rather "cool" in its impudence; but that is a way parsons have. Taking extra copies and distributing them is a good way of making the paper known.

J. M. K.—Sorry we are unable to use MSS.

MAJOR WARREN.—Received with thanks. As early as possible, but we are very much crowded with MSS. at the moment.

J. A. REID.—We also don't quite know what the clergy would do with Atheists if they could have their way. But we expect it would be something in the boiling oil way.

J. DRISCOLL writes apropos of last week's article on physical punishment in school that he was forced to protest against this in the case of his own child, and the protest seems to have been sufficient to stop it. We incline to the opinion that in the vast majority of cases the use of the cane is an indication of ineffectiveness on the part of the teacher.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings. Have passed on the review enclosed.

H. RAWLINGS.—Pleased to have been of service. The fact of our advice having achieved its purpose is sufficient thanks.

E. MAIN.—We note your opinion that God gives man every chance of repentance. Our opinion is that it is the other way about. Man has given God innumerable chances of behaving himself better, but with no tangible result, so far as we can see.

J. A. K. (Glasgow).—Thanks for verses, which we regret we are unable to use.

E. PETSON.—Pleased to know you are resolved to go on doing all you can to secure that thousand new readers. You appear to have worked with judgment and good results. Paper is being sent to addresses given.

H. JONES.—Received too late for use this week.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Next Sunday (March 3) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures at the Builders' Exchange, Cross Street, Burgess Street, Sheffield. The afternoon meeting is at 3.30, evening at 6.30. We hope there will be a good muster of local friends.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Manchester, to-day (February 24) at 3 and 6.30. His subject in the afternoon is "Religious Mania"; evening "Christianity and the War." Both subjects ought to attract good audiences, and we hope that the local friends will not alone be present themselves, but will see that they bring a friend with them. The Manchester Branch is working hard, and deserves all support.

Following the letter of Mr. Breese, published last week, one of our readers writes that in his turn he is devoting special attention to inducing newsagents to display copies of the Freethinker, and this has resulted in securing several new subscribers. He asks whether this policy cannot be systematically followed all over the country. We see no reason why it should not be done; and when it is done, the results are always good. Meanwhile, we are pleased to note that a very general effort is being made to secure that thousand new readers. We are receiving letters reporting one here and two there, and many are secured of whom we hear nothing, but can only judge from the demands made at this end. There is a large public awaiting the Freethinker, if only it can be brought into touch with it.

London Freethinkers will please note that Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner concludes the present course of Sunday afternoon lectures at the West Central Hall, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, with a lecture on "Belief, Make-Belief, and Unbelief." The lecture commences at 3.15.

The Globe is not a Radical publication, but it raps the Bishop of London over the knuckles in a recent issue. It appears that the Bishop is apparently consumed with anxiety because wet canteens have been started in connection with the special battalions for lads of eighteen. The Globe says: "We trust it will comfort His Grace of London to learn that these canteens only supply beer, and that the liquor is of such low alcoholic content that before it produces anything akin to intoxication the imbiber—to use an expressive if inelegant Americanism—must have 'his back teeth under water.'"

The Church of England is not only an old-fashioned institution, but it is centuries out of date. At a recent meeting of the Upper House of Convocation the question of the inclusion of King Charles the Martyr in the Church Calendar was debated with becoming solemnity. This strange devotion to ancient history may partially account for the astonishing attitude of the clergy concerning the present national crisis.

"Wet Canteens."

We hear, alas! the Bishop's voice upraised.
(His bleating seems a part of London's roar!)
We hear such things as strife and hate well praised
In gushing adulation of the War.

Of "loathesome immorality" we hear,
And learn how stubborn is the soldier's brain;
That in the face of death he does not fear,
Nor does he think of purgatorial pain.

The Bishop is depressed because the men,
Who fight a War he acquiesces in,
Seem prone to disobedience now and then,
And die like heroes, steeped in fearful sin!

Good, gentle Christ! what age is this, we ask,
Wherein such clergy, paid by Mammon State,
Scream their foul thoughts, and give themselves the task
Of conquering lust with War's ignoble hate?

There is a host of men beneath the sod,
Out there in France where bishops never go;
Who gave their all, and never prayed to "God,"
Who died because they thought it must be so.

Fat bishops with their motor-cars and gold
May batten on the sacrifice of these;
May raise their hands in modesty, and scold
The minor faults of soldiers who displease.

There is no "God." There is no Deity
Who watches o'er the stricken widow's head,
Or cheers the orphans in their misery,
A God would strike each dreadful bishop—dead.

III.

I HAVE not had any very flattering things to say about the influence of religion. The religion of the bulk of mankind can only affect morality for the good—if it does so at all—through the crude agency of bribes and threats. To my mind, real morality cannot come in until all bribes and threats are abandoned, and the appeal is made to justice, honour, and mercy in terms of their intrinsic worth. But the logical inferences to be drawn from religious doctrines and the actual conduct of the people professing them differ. People are, in the main, as superior to the crudities of Christianity in actual practice as they are inferior to the extravagantly idealistic altruism which that great composite and inconsistent sect also includes. Few Christians really believe in the fine teaching of universal love, and still fewer ever attempt to carry it out; but happily, the horrible doctrine of eternal punishment and other barbarous teachings are also silently but definitely dropped. The consequence is that much that is done nowadays in the name of religion is really secular activity.

A word about that curious chap the "Christian" in the Army. There is nothing very curious about him, but it is a strange reflection on the power of Christ, as they call it, that in a country where the vast majority are supposed to be Christians, there should be an inner group whose claim to distinction is that they take Christianity seriously. Still more curious is the use of the word "conversion" in connection with those who, from being Christians in a general sense, become Christians in a particular sense—or "get religion."

These are rare birds. They are generally harmless. They soon betray themselves by the use of such words as "blooming" for emphasis; which generally elicits some chaff from their fellow-Christians. Nothing worse than chaff is ever thrown at them; and, indeed, if they have "got it bad," and are known to be sensitive about it, they are generally saved even that. The Army is no place to suffer for your religious faith.

I think it only reasonable to admit that there is some good in evangelical religion (for your "Christian" is almost invariably of that ilk). The evangelist will not admit that there is any good in my philosophy, but I feel strong enough to give away points like that, and would sooner give him a peg to hang an argument on than justify a charge of being as narrow-minded as he is. His cardinal virtues, apart from the ridiculous "virtue" of belief in a certain brand of theology, are a series of don'ts. Some of these don'ts are of doubtful moral value, but others are salutary enough. If evangelism saves a man from drunkenness or venereal disease it scores. Let him rest in peace with it. It would be more likely to drive me to drink. Chacun a son gout. But Freethinkers never need hesitate to pursue their propaganda from fear of robbing some poor cripple of his moral crutch. No amount of argument would ever drive the thinnest wedge of reason into the skull of such a man. No man is ever converted by arguments alone. You must first prepare his mind for their reception. And he who attempts to prepare the mind of the man who is temperamentally inclined to religious mysticism for the reception of arguments that only appeal to reason and common sense, might as well sow spuds in a sandpit.

I once tried to get up a debate of a sort with one of these Lord's anointed. I was willing to accept the idiotic title, "Which is the Better, the Christian Life or a Life of Sin," but even with poor me weighed down with the implication of being the Devil's advocate, he backed out of it. He practically admitted that although I should not convert him (which I had not the least expectation of doing), he feared the effect of the argument upon the audience. Is it not passing strange that a fervent believer should fear to display the wares of God in competition with those of the other party, where there was a fair field and no favour? Surely he, with the help of Jesus, could have made a good show.

The object of this note has been to indicate briefly what seems to me the general attitude of the men of my country to morals and religion. The more spectacular virtues of heroism and self-sacrifice I have purposely refrained from discussing, for the reason that they are dealt with very amply elsewhere at the present time. The libel on Englishmen as regards physical and moral deterioration that patriots of a certain class used to indulge in, has been sufficiently silenced by the glorious deeds and patient endurance of the "common" man in this long day of agony. There are many other things that ought to be said, but I fear to tax the reader's patience further. It is hard to lay down the pen without saying a word about the moral significance of the War itself and the people who are responsible for it, but as I have no wish for a melodramatic exit from this best of all possible worlds, I refrain.

If, as I have suggested, the attitude of the average man towards religion is indifference, it may be asked, is our propaganda then worth while, or are we flogging a dead horse? I answer that our work will be done when every man and woman has definitely forsaken superstition for Secular philosophy, and not before. We are not out to make people indifferent about the vast questions raised by theology. We want to get rid of the God-idea because we consider that anthropomorphism is a paltry attitude of mind towards the great problems of space, time, and destiny. To many whose keen intelligence and warm sympathy with the aspirations of democracy to free itself from the domination of capitalists and aristocrats is not balanced by that ability to appreciate the value of disinterested research which is necessary to the philosophic mind, every activity which is not concerned with satisfying some material need may seem a waste of time. That is one of the most profound and disastrous mistakes that any who work for the betterment of mankind can make. Men and women have heads beside stomachs. All honour to those who work for the bodily health and comfort of the multitude. More power to their elbow, and may their tribe increase. But the culture or neglect of the nobler functions of the mind will alone determine whether men and women are to sink to the level of the swine on whom they feed, or stride, graceful, majestic, and beautiful among the lower creatures of this earth, like the Gods and Goddesses of that glorious race who first raised aloft the standard of love, beauty, and liberty.

HERBERT W. THURLOW.

The Organism as a Whole.

To those who have allowed themselves to be influenced by pulpit twaddle concerning the abandonment of "Materialism" by the scientific world, we warmly commend a careful reading of the latest work by Professor Jacques Loeb.[1] Professor Loeb is one of the world's leading experimentalists in biology, and is dowered in an eminent degree with that quality of "scientific imagination" which Tyndall declared essential to all valuable scientific work. And in addition to this scientific imagination, Professor Loeb possesses the not less necessary quality of courage. He has not alone the quality of mind which enables him to plan experiments and to detect the significance of the results; he has also the courage to state those results in a plain and uncompromising manner. He writes as a convinced "mechanist," which is the newer, and perhaps better, name for Materialist, and finds no use for the "vitalism" of writers such as Dreisch, or the "Directive Force" of Sir Oliver Lodge. In his own words:—

> The ultimate aim of the physical sciences (is) the visualization of all phenomena in terms of groupings and displacements of ultimate particles, and since there is no discontinuity between the matter constituting the living and non-living world, the goal of biology can be expressed in the same way.

There is "Materialism" or "Mechanism" in a sentence, and the whole of Professor Loeb's work—particularly his Comparative Physiology of the Brain and Psychology, published in 1900, and his more recent Dynamics of Living Matter—emphasizes this point of view.

Every living animal is a chemical machine. That is Loeb's basic view, and his experiments go far to prove its soundness. Theologians have dwelt upon the wonders of "instinct," and all their wondering has brought us not a step nearer understanding. Years ago, Professor Loeb set himself to understand. Why does a moth fly towards the light? Why does a flower turn towards the light? Why does a caterpillar crawl towards the end of a branch in search of food? By a series of experiments, Professor Loeb showed that these "instincts" were no more than the consolidated consequences of the effects of light and heat operating on the organism. A fly will lay its eggs on meat, but not on fat. "A directive instinct," cries the theologian. Not so, says Loeb; the meat provides a chemical stimuli, causing the fly to deposit its eggs. In the fat, these stimuli are wanting. It is a chemical reaction we are studying, not a metaphysical conundrum.[1]

Again, a few years ago the question of how a spermatozoon could cause an egg to develop into an individual was a "mystery." Professor Loeb took the unfecundated eggs of the sea urchin, raised the concentration of the water by the addition of a salt, and, behold! the egg was fertilized without the spermatozoon. He obtained the same results with the eggs of the star-fish, of worms, and of molluscs. The "mystery" of fecundation had become a physico-chemical phenomenon.

In the present volume Professor Loeb takes the reader with him in the discussion of such questions as the chemical laws of genus and species, the determination of sex, animal instincts, the mechanism of mendelism, etc. We wish to specially note two intensely interesting chapters on "The Influence of Environment" and "Adaptation to Environment." A few popular delusions are corrected here—not popular merely with the general public, but also with those who lay claim to some amount of scientific culture.

We much regret that considerations of space prevent our writing at greater length on a most important statement of the fundamentals of the case for Materialism. Necessarily, the work is rather technical in form and language, but there is nothing which readers of average education and intelligence will not easily master. And every reader will have forced on his mind the conclusion, that the more exact our knowledge of the mechanics of the living organism becomes, the more is "Materialism" justified. The conception of the organism as one with the rest of nature, and as a complex of forces that meet us in a simpler form in other phenomena, is a working postulate that not only dominates every scientific worker, it is the only one that is possible to a sound science.

Professor Loeb dedicates his book—> to that group of Freethinkers, including D'Alenbert, Diderot, Holbach, and Voltaire, who first dared to follow the consequences of a Materialistic Science—incomplete as it then was—to the rules of human conduct, and who thereby laid the foundation of that spirit of tolerance, justice, and gentleness which was the hope of our civilization, until it was buried under the wave of homicidal emotion which has swept through the world.

Held in check, we believe, not buried. But it is well to find so brave a testimony to the heroic Freethought fighters of the past.

X.—THE CROSS.

EVENING shades fell. Stars sparkled. Under the olive trees of the Garden of Gethsemane, a band of the disciples sat, while the Master, a stone's throw off, knelt and prayed, and he said—

"Father, if I must needs drink of this bitter cup, I will. Not my will, but thy will, be done."

An angel, whose face gleamed in the darkness, stood at his side, comforting him; and the face of Jesus was bedewed with sweat.

The disciples fell asleep.

A noise!

"My Lord, are you here?" cried a voice—the voice of Judas Iscariot; and Judas kissed Jesus.

"We arrest you," cried a group of constables, as they seized the Master of Demons.

A scuffle took place; the disciples had awoke, and one had drawn a sword, and slashed a constable's ear. A touch of the hand of Jesus healed the ear. Then said Jesus,—

"Darkness is now in power."

In a chamber of the High Priest's house were gathered Lecturers, Pious Men, Priests, and Temple-Men. More joined them during the night. When dawn came, they would hold a meeting of the Sanhedrim, and decide what to do with the man they called false prophet. Meanwhile, a charcoal fire in a brazier was lit, and guards and other folk basked in its warmth. Peter the Pilot had crept in among them. Jesus was watched by constables.

A servant-woman said, as she pointed at Peter,—

"This fellow is one of the Galilean mob! He is a comrade of the wicked agitator!"

"It's quite untrue, quite!" replied Peter.

A cock crew. The dawn had arrived.

Jesus looked at his timid apostle, and Peter went out, and wept bitterly; for he remembered how the Master had warned him at the Supper.

The council was now held, the High Priest being in the chair. The question was, whether Jesus pretended to be the Chosen Man, the Christ.

"Are you the Christ?" he was asked.

"You shall see me, the Son of Man, sit on the right hand of the Almighty God."

"Do you mean you are God's Son?"

"Ah, God's Son! You have called me what I am,' answered Jesus.

"To Pilate, to Pilate with him!" shouted the Lecturers, Pious Men, Lawyers, Priests.

One councillor had silently slipped out. It was Joseph. He was a believer in the Kingdom.

Pilate, the Roman Governor, sat in a hall of his mansion. Guards, helmeted and bearing swords and spears, stood near his seat, and at the entrances, and in the court-yard.

"Sir," cried the crowd of priests and Pharisees, "this man is an agitator from Galilee; a traitor; a pretended King of the Jews; a most dangerous criminal."

A short examination followed. Pilate soon saw that Jesus was a harmless sort of prisoner; and he bade the guards march the prisoner to the neighbouring palace where lived the real King of the Jews—Herod Antipas—the man who caused the death of the Baptist.

However, Jesus stood before him as dumb as a stone. Not a word could be drawn from him. Herod scornfully said,—

"Let him be the festival King, if he is so fond of Kingship."

With roars of laughter, and with rude antics, the Roman soldiers arrayed Jesus in a gorgeous robe, and salaamed before him as to a king. Then the festival king was led back to Pilate, a multitude hustling at his heels.

"Well," said Pilate, "as this is the Passover festival, and, by old custom, a jail-bird is to be released at your pleasure, choose now who it shall be. I advise you to choose King Jesus, and then he can go free."

Confused shouts arose.

"Crucify this traitor! Give us Bar-Abbas! The Galilean to the cross! Bar-Abbas to liberty!"

Pilate gave way to their wishes. The jail-bird, Bar-Abbas, a murderer and plotter, was set free. A wooden cross was fetched from the barracks, and an African Jew happening to pass at the moment, the cross was laid upon his shoulders, and he carried it. A noisy multitude surged through the gate of Jerusalem, and up the hill Golgotha, which was round like a skull. The hill was also named Calvary.

Women followed Jesus, crying in pity.

"Daughters of Jerusalem," said Jesus, "weep not for me, but for your children, who will grow up to see the days of awful ruin."

On the top of Golgotha three crosses were set up, and Jesus was nailed on the middle one, and a thief was crucified on his right, and another thief on his left; and the people gazed at the three men dying.

"Father," prayed Jesus, "forgive those that kill me; they know not what they do."

The soldiers shared the prisoners' clothes amongst themselves.

Lecturers and Temple Men scoffed,—

"Ha, ha! Why doesn't the Christ, the Chosen Man, set himself free from the cross?"

"King, King, come down!" jeered the soldiers.

Somebody fixed a scrap of parchment, on a tablet, over the Pioneer's head, and on it was scribbled—"King of the Jews."

"Yes," groaned one of the thieves, "if you are the Chosen Christ, help yourself, and me, and my mate."

"Hush," cried the other thief, "hush, comrade! You and I are guilty; this man is innocent. He is no rogue. And, perhaps," he added, "you will remember me, my Lord, when you are in your Kingdom."

"To-day, my friend," replied Jesus, "to-day you will be with me in Paradise."

Hours before sunset, shadows, black shadows, crept over the city, and the Temple, and the Place of a Skull, and the crowd, and the three crosses; and, in the Temple, a great curtain split from top to bottom, as if a gate opened for someone to pass through. And Jesus, uttering a loud cry, bent his head, and died.

The people slowly dispersed.

Calvary was a silent hill. Soldiers kept guard over the three dead.

The Roman captain, who had charge of the crucifying, muttered,—

"This man they call king was a righteous man."

Before midnight, a visitor presented himself at the porch of Pilate's mansion, and asked to see the governor. It was Joseph the councillor; and, as he was a person of rank, he was permitted to go in.

"Sir," he said to Pilate, "I beg, as a favour, that I may bury the body of the King of the Jews."

Pilate smiled,—"Oh, yes."

The descent from the cross soon took place; and the body of Jesus was wrapped in white linen, and borne to a garden which belonged to Joseph, and here a cave had been hewn out of the side of a rock for the purpose of a tomb. In this sepulchre the dead Master of the jinn was laid.

Women, soft-footed, had followed, watching.

Hastening to a house in the city, the women busied themselves in mixing sweet ointments, with which to embalm the body of the Wonder-worker.

The sun rose. The women, who had toiled all the night, stopped their labours. It was Saturday, the holy Sabbath. Next day, the day of the Sun, as the worshippers of the god Mithra would call it, they would go to the rock-tomb.

* * * *

Slaves who enraged their Roman masters were often nailed to crosses, to die a dreadful death. But the people of the ancient ages had happier ideas of the cross. It might make them think of the Father and Mother, whose joining in marriage was a beautiful Cross of life; and such was the belief of the Egyptians, with their Tau, or sign of the cross. It might make them think of the great world, divided by lines pointing north and south, east and west, in the way of a cross on a Good Friday cake. The ancients cherished the cross, as an ornament to be worn, as a symbol (or sign) of life and the world, as a thing to be worshipped.

Some of the people of Asia were wont, at the spring season, to dress up two men as kings, one a king of the Good, the other of the Evil; and, of these, one must die. In such a custom, or rite, the men chosen for the two kings would be prisoners from the jail, of whom one would be spared, the other slain. Perhaps, at Jerusalem, such a custom was kept up. Perhaps Jesus, with whom the scribes were so angry, was thus marked for death as a "King of the Jews," and the Romans may have allowed the poor prisoner to die as a king, crowned in mockery by his enemies.[1]

It is very likely that, in the first and second centuries—the days of Josephus the Jew, Plutarch the Greek, and Trajan the Roman emperor—people would act plays, or dramas, in which the Supper, the Agony in the Garden, the Death on the Cross, and the Burial, and other scenes were performed in the presence of crowds of spectators. The audience would listen in deep silence to the talk at the Supper-table, gaze with hatred at the kissing Judas, weep when the women wept, and sigh when Jesus sighed the prayer of forgiveness for his murderers. Eagerly they beheld the descent from the cross, the burial in the rock-tomb, the mixing of the sweet balm by the women. Whispers would pass round,—

"The next scene will show the Risen Christ."[2]

Sometimes, the scenes would be acted one way, sometimes another. And, if you look at the Gospels in the New Testament, you see how the story was told with different dialogues and different tableaux.

The Specialist.

"WHERE is the young scamp? This requires severe treatment." And I reached for the family corrector.

"Now, Jack," said Minerva, "you really must not interfere this time. This is a case for the specialist. I have sent for the Rev. Mr. Teachem to call and examine Tommy."

"Specialist! The Rev..... What has the parson got to do with it? What do you mean by 'specialist'?"

"Suppose Tommy were sick—physically sick—and you didn't know what ailed him, what would you do?"

"Give him a dose of castor-oil and send for the doctor, of course."

"Precisely! That is what I have done. The clergyman will be here directly."

"Minerva," I said soothingly, "this trouble is going to your head. You must not allow it to get such a hold. I admit I am rather shocked myself to hear that Tommy swears; but, after all, what's in an oath? I mean, of course, an occasional and appropriate swear-word on the lips of a man of judgment and discretion. The boy is still too young to be permitted the—the....."

"The free use of the verbal safety-valve of temper?" suggested Minerva.

"Quite. Thanks. But the fact that he has dared to taste the forbidden fruit of the English language should hardly cause a woman of your sense and experience to—er.....Come, come, my dear, don't you worry. I'll attend to Tommy. You sit down here and rest a bit, and after your poor head is better, you can tell me all about it."

"Jack," said Minerva, regarding me with that calm, appraising look of hers, "you set me wondering what made me marry you....."

"Well, I hope....."

"When you talk such nonsense. You do not appear to realize that Galileo lived and worked in the seventeenth century."

"Now, what in heaven's name has Galileo got to do with Tommy's bad language?"

"Everything. Galileo discovered that the world moved."

"And so caused Master Thomas Spratt to say 'damn' three hundred years later. I see! New demonstration of the evolutionary theory: Darwinism, Herbert Spencer, and all that sort of thing."

"Now, dear, do be patient while I explain. Don't let it be said that Galileo lived in vain. Had Tommy said a swear in the days of Galileo, Tommy would have been spanked—hard."

"Long live Galileo! Tommy will be spanked. Hard! Tommy's father swears it."

"Now you are off the track again," she grumbled. "The point is, Galileo is dead. You may have been too busy at the office to notice it, but he died quite a long time ago—and spanking has gone out."

"In consequence?"

"M'm! It might be better to say that spanking has gone out because Galileo lived, since we owe it to him that things move. But the real point is that spanking is as obsolete as blood-letting. Science has proved each to be a useless and wasteful dissipation of energy. The medical specialist has been followed by the moral specialist—for this is the age of Reform, you know."

"Be careful, my dear," I warned her. "Too many Reformers spoil the State. Withdraw the right to spank and the institution of Fatherhood will crumble to the ground." But just then the Vicar was announced, and I missed the opportunity of proving my case.

"Good evening, Mr. Teachem," said Minerva, "I am so glad you were able to come. I am worried about Tommy, and wish you would look at him and tell me what you think."

"Tommy!" The Vicar was puzzled. "What is wrong with Master Tommy? Not sick, I hope?"

"Yes—very," replied Minerva. "Or perhaps not very. He may be only a little sick. I—I don't quite know. That is why I sent for you to examine him."

"But, my dear Mrs. Spratt, if the boy is sick, surely you should have called in Dr. Thom, not me." And the dear, good Vicar radiated astonishment.

"Oh, no," explained Minerva; "It's not that kind of sickness. Tommy is ill morally."

"Ah!" murmured the Vicar, getting into his professional stride at once.

"Yes, he used bad language to-day, said a swear-word, and—and—and I feel so miserable about it," Minerva, tearful, broke off abruptly.

"My dear, good lady," purred Mr. Teachem, "I am extremely sorry. But you must not worry over much. Boys will be—er—the sons of men, you know. I shall have a talk with Master Tommy, and all will be well."

"But please understand me," urged Minerva. "I have already given Tommy his castor-oil. (The Vicar gasped.) I mean I have myself administered the usual dose of texts and goody-goody talk generally prescribed—but it's no good. Tommy seems suddenly to have grown beyond the stage when that sort of thing is effective. He has been with his father so much of late."

Before I could think of a sufficiently biting protest she had swept on, and, when I caught up, was saying, "and as I look upon you, Mr. Teachem, as our specialist in morals, I do wish you would make a careful examination of my little boy and tell me how it stands with him."

"Most certainly," said the Vicar. "Although I can only claim to be a sort of general practitioner myself, I think I shall be able to diagnose Tommy correctly. Where is the patient?"

"Confined to his room," said Minerva. "If you prefer to see him alone, the maid will show you upstairs."

"By the way," observed the Vicar, as he turned to go, "there is no hereditary taint, I take it?"

"My people," I replied, "have all been respectable grocers for generations. Wholesale."

"I had a grandfather in the Indian Army," confessed Minerva.

"Ah!" said the Vicar. "Those grandfathers! They will reappear. I know them."

"But he wasn't my favourite grandfather," explained Minerva.

"That may have made a difference," said the Vicar. "We'll see."

. . . . . .

"No," reported the specialist on his return; "Tommy has inherited nothing objectionable from your grandfather, Mrs. Spratt. He has a perfectly sound moral constitution, and is merely suffering temporarily from a slight infection—caught, apparently, on the golf-links yesterday."

Minerva looked hard at me, then harder at the family corrector.

"The point is," said I, reaching over and throwing the thing in the fire, "Galileo is dead; and spanking has gone out."

EXISTENCE OF GOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I should like to have an expression of views from the readers of the Freethinker as to the attitude we should adopt in discussing the question of the existence of God.

I have come to the conclusion that, from a diplomatic point of view, it would be better in the interests of Secularism, if Freethinkers were to press Christians to give in clear language their conception of "God" rather than we should say there is no God, or that we know of no God.

The other evening I had a discussion with a gentleman who is the superintendent of a large Sunday-school. I asked him to define exactly what he meant by God. He said what he understood was, that God was a word meant to convey the meaning—the spirit of goodness, the spirit of holiness, the spirit of justice, the spirit of mercy, and the spirit of truth. He had over and over again expressed himself thus, and at a meeting of the Y.M.C.A. years ago had shocked the infantile notions of quite a number of those present.

Now, with this conception of God, we, as Freethinkers, can scarcely disagree, but we accept these as human qualities, and their existence is quite demonstrable.

Where this friend and I came to disagree was in our beliefs as to what happened to the spirit or soul after death. He had a hazy notion that the spirit or soul continued to live on in another world, and that we were put into this world to prepare for the next, which would be eternal.

My friend thought the Book of Genesis was a fairy tale, and the Garden of Eden a myth, but he firmly believed in the immaculate conception and the "bodily" resurrection of Christ. He had no notion as to where Christ went or as to whether his body now occupies space, or still exists in the form of flesh and blood, but he is convinced that Christ's body rose from the grave, and he now sits at the right hand of God, who is in heaven, which, when you remember his conception of God, is absurd. My friend says he doesn't care whether people believe in the bodily resurrection of Christ, the immaculate conception, or any of the other dogma as taught by the Church, so long as a man lives an upright life as taught by Jesus Christ, and then he is a Christian. Quite a number of Christians are at this stage, and there is now very little of the original faith to cling to.

Freethinkers can live the good life without the least reference as to what Christ said or did. We have quite as good a conception as to what is right or wrong as Christians have, and they have no special claim to the common virtues.

I think, when occasion arises, we should get our Christian friends to say exactly what they mean in plain, every-day English without mysticism of any kind, and a different construction would then be put upon their statements.

Society News.

West Central Hall (London).—Last Sunday's lecture by Mr. Palmer on "The Antiquity of Man" was greatly appreciated by the audience, and many of those present voiced the wish that our lectures could be more widely advertised. We hope that London Freethinkers will fill the hall to-day, when Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, Charles Bradlaugh's daughter, will occupy the platform.—E. M. VANCE, Gen. Sec.

North London Branch, N.S.S.—Saturday's air-raid was responsible for a smaller audience than usual at the St. Pancras Reform Club. This is very regrettable as the debate between Mr. Percy Muir, the well-known Christian Evidence exponent, and Mr. T. F. Palmer, well repaid those who were present. We hope the audience all reached home safely before Sunday's aerial bombardment commenced. Truly our propaganda in London is conducted under difficulties these days or, rather, nights! Next Sunday Miss Nina Boyle, of the Women's Freedom League, opens the debate. Miss Boyle's name ought to be sufficient advertisement to fill the hall to overflowing.—H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec.

Views and Opinions.

The Puzzle of God.

Some of my Scotch readers may be familiar with the old rhyme:—

There was an auld woman of Sydney
That had a disease of the kidney;
She prayed to the Lord that she might be restored,
An' he could if he would, but he didnae.

If so, the lines must have often occurred to them during the last few years. For all real believers in God must assume that God "could if he would" have prevented this awful catastrophe of war, but he "didnae"; and the concern of his most faithful followers must be to find out why he "didnae." And on that rock the ship of faith, so far as thousands are concerned, bids fair to become a complete wreck. Apologies for God are, of course, offered; but they carry little or no conviction. God is neutral, argue some; he is powerless to overcome the resistance of the human will, argue others; he has some wise end in view, and therefore permits the catastrophe; suggest others. But all these apologies ring hollow. Neutrality has little to commend it on behalf of one who has the power to enforce right and prevent wrong. An impotent Deity is still less satisfactory. Men have always worshipped God because they thought he could do something; and to find he can do nothing when something is most needed is to remove all reason for bothering with him. And the God who would but won't is still less satisfactory. People are beginning to object to be moved this way or that in obedience to the arbitrary will of a Deity about whom they know nothing. Secret diplomacy is as objectionable in heaven as it is on earth. Of course, if there is a God of this kind, one who drives human beings hither and thither, as millions of men are driven to slaughter on the battlefield, so be it; but the time is passing when people may be expected to admire a system or a Deity that is an outrage on the finer human feelings.

A Quietist Deity.

The new incumbent of the City Temple, Dr. Fort Newton, says "the bitter tragedy of Atheism is, there is no one there." We do not see there is anything either bitter or tragic in the recognition of an absence of Deity, although there would be something tragically horrible in his presence. And in practice, what is the difference between a God who is not there and a God who does nothing? The more thoughtful—or the more astute—among believers warn us not to expect any interference by God with natural order. God, they say, works only through natural laws. Well, as an Atheist, we agree in the folly of expecting a miraculous alteration in the course of Nature; but what part does God play in the process? The Atheist says: "I do not believe in a God, and see no proof of his existence. Natural forces seem adequate to all that exist, and I cannot get beyond them." The Theist replies: "Yes, I agree so far; still, there is a God who is responsible for the whole cosmic order." Maybe; but where, in practice, is the substantial difference between these two positions? Neither believe in the actual interference of Deity in natural processes; both accept the universality and invariability of natural causation. Each, therefore, cancels the interference of God so far as life is concerned. The "bitter tragedy" of not believing in a God is evaded by professing a belief in one who is not the slightest good for anything or anybody. A hypothetical tragedy becomes an actual farce. The Theist commits suicide to save himself from slaughter.

God and Nature.

God's character, we are told, is vindicated not by a series of interferences with natural order, but by the order itself; less by the process than by the end. Thus, destruction and disease are facts, but a more perfect form of life emerges from the carnage. Hatred and love exist, but the latter is the more powerful factor. All this, and more may be granted, but it does not meet the real issue. If God's goodness is shown by the removal of obstacles to development, what is shown by their existence? Is it carelessness or cruelty? A tiger benefits by dining off a sheep, and the cosmic process is justified—to the tiger. And in the evolutionary process it is wildly untrue to argue that perfection is gained through suffering—at least, so far as the individual is concerned, and pleasure and pain are never other than individual. Some suffer and others profit. Consider the generations of men that have lived cherishing degrading superstitions, practising brutal customs, butchering and being butchered, before their descendants began to glimpse a more humane mode of life. How can we excuse the cruelty of such a process because some one benefits at the end? Surely, if there is a God, we are entitled to demand that progress shall not be bought at so frightful a price. The Atheist does not deny the process, he does impeach its morality. He declines to acknowledge as good a being who could deliberately call such a process into existence. If there is a God the world may exhibit his power, but common decency protests against the pretence that it demonstrates his goodness.

Morality and God.

A great deal is said by preachers about the power of love in the world. And, thanks to man's social heredity, it is true that the power of love is more persistent than that of hatred. Yet nature—or God, if there be a God behind nature—cares nothing for the moral quality of our actions. Whether we act in a spirit of hatred or of love, strive to establish a right or to perpetuate a wrong, matters not. All we see in nature is a non-moral cause and effect. Says Maeterlinck:—

> If I am guilty of a certain excess or imprudence and incur a certain danger I have to pay a corresponding debt to nature. And as this excess or imprudence will generally have had an immoral cause.....we cannot refrain from establishing a connection between this immoral cause and the danger to which we have been exposed, or the debt we had to pay.....And we are content deliberately to ignore the fact that the result would have been the same had the cause of our excess or imprudence been.....heroic or innocent. If on an intensely cold day I throw myself into the water to save a fellow creature from drowning, or if, seeking to drown him, I chance to fall in, the consequences of the chill will be absolutely the same, and nothing on this earth or beneath the sky—save only myself, or man if he be able, will enhance my suffering because I have committed a crime, or relieve my pain because my action was virtuous.

What Maeterlinck is here emphasizing is the absolute indifference of nature as to whether our motive to action be good or bad. The desire to do right may lead to disaster; the endeavour to help others may call down swift punishment. The cowardice that keeps me from attempting to save a child from a burning house may preserve my life. The courage that sends me into the flames may end in death or disablement for life. If there is a God at the back of this frightful lack of moral discrimination the most and the best that can be said for him is that he does nothing. And what use has the world for a God of that kind? If man is left to reap the full consequences of his folly, or of his ignorance, what is the use of God? It is easy to talk of the "tragedy" of viewing the universe as a cluster of non-conscious forces with life as a mere iredescent bubble; but far more demoralizing is the contemplation of a universe in which God sits—to quote Mr. W. H. Mallock, like "some blackguardly larrikin kicking his heels in the clouds, not perhaps bent on mischief, but indifferent to the fact that he has caused it."

The Hopelessness of Theism.

The bitter tragedy would, indeed, be if there were someone there; if, behind all the unmerited suffering and gratuitous cruelty of the world, there existed an all-powerful, intelligent Being to whom all this was part of a coldly calculated scheme. To the Atheist, the universe is simply non-moral; the Theist leaves all the difficulties where they were, and only succeeds in making the world profoundly immoral. At most, our struggles represent the fight of human intelligence against non-conscious forces; and we have the inspiration, based on experience, that, cleansed of superstition and armed with sufficient knowledge, human nature is adequate to the task of improving social life. Ignorance and superstition lie at the root of nine-tenths of our troubles, and the time and energy now squandered on religion would, if properly applied, make a substantial reduction of our difficulties in the course of a single generation. But in the name of God we make mysteries of our problems, and then despair of their solution. We create difficulties where none need exist, and ignore others that are only too palpable. The old Romans, among the numerous altars they erected, built one "To the Gods who take no heed." It was a curious thing to do; but one day the world will recognize it as a true description of every variety of deity, from the Mumbo-Jumbo of an African savage down to the attenuated abstraction of a modern Christian.

Chapman Cohen.

The Newest Apologetic.

V.

To the apologists the most puzzling of all problems at the present time is that of war. For three years and a half the pulpit has been forced to face it, and the longer the War continues the more perplexing it becomes. War is unquestionably a count against Christianity, and Mr. Mozley admits that it "never weighed so heavily as at the present time." The following is his statement of the problem:—

> This is not only a matter of external controversy between Christian and non-Christian, but of internal controversy between Christian and Christian. Whether war is ever a Christian duty, what conditions must be fulfilled to make a particular war a Christian duty, objectively considered, on the part of one of the combatants (it is obvious that, from an objective standpoint, war can never be a duty binding on both sides), how the Church, which is supernatural, should in each different country encourage patriotism, and yet deter from mere jingoism, foster national self-respect and abate national arrogance—these questions, and others like them, are most keenly probed among Christians in this time of war (The Achievements of Christianity, pp. 57, 58).

To a discussion of this subject the author devotes ten pages of his book; but his guiding principles seems to find expression in these lines:—

> Whate'er thou deem'st on earth
> Most evil, scan it well;
> A buried seed of worth
> Doth surely in it dwell.

On that assumption a Christian, naturally, is not prepared to say dogmatically "War is never lawful for the Christian; the Christian man may not take up arms, even in self-defence." It is true that if a Christian could take up that position, even theoretically, for him war would not be a problem at all; and, as a matter of fact, there are professors of Christ who take their stand on that principle, with the result that they come into open conflict with the State. With one exception, the parties engaged in this War are Christians, whose boast it is that they are fighting for the establishment on earth of the kingdom of heaven. Mr. Mozley maintains that "war can never be a duty binding on both sides"; but the truth is, that in this War both sides claim that they are fighting for the right, with the result that part of the author's argument necessarily falls to the ground. In its own estimation, each party is simply doing its duty. The point, however, is that the enormous majority of Christians believe that there are times when it is lawful even for them to use physical force against their foes. Indeed, many wars, such as the Crusades and the wars between Catholics and Protestants in Reformation times, have been of a purely religious character. Mr. Mozley confesses he does "not think it can be doubted that anything like a powerful anti-war sentiment has been deplorably absent from (at the latest) the third century of our era." To anyone acquainted with ecclesiastical history it is self-evident that the Christian Church, throughout the days of her might, harboured a war-like spirit, and not seldom engaged in actual warfare. Our author concludes that she was not at any time "seriously impressed with the moral problem of war," and he excuses her on the ground that, subsequent to the fall of the Roman Empire and the sweeping down of the barbarians from the north, "she had to deal with men and nations to whom war was as the breath of their nostrils." But Urban II. believed in and advocated war as in full harmony with the will of God. Standing on a lofty platform in the market-place of Clermont, his Holiness did his utmost, as Gibbon puts it, to "spread the flames of war from the Atlantic to the Euphrates." Urging the nations to undertake the first Crusade, he said:—

> It is indeed the will of God, and let this memorable word, the inspiration surely of the Holy Spirit, be for ever adopted as your cry of battle to animate the devotion and courage of the champions of Christ. His cross is the symbol of your salvation; wear it, a red, a bloody cross, as an external mark on your breasts or shoulders, as a pledge of your sacred and irrevocable engagement.

Mr. Mozley refuses to discuss the question, "Is war wrong?" or, "Is war compatible with Christianity?" preferring to ask, "Is it ever right for a Christian nation to go to war?" to which question, he declares, "we may, without treachery to our first principles, return an affirmative answer." Curiously enough, he avers that in "a perfect Christendom there would be no war, since the causes from which wars spring—causes which always involve on one side, and may involve on both sides, a morally vitiated outlook—would disappear"; a statement which implies the inevitable inference that war is essentially anti-Christian. An imperfect Christendom is an irrefutable evidence that the Christian religion has been a colossal failure. Despite all its pompous claims for itself, it has broken all its pledges, dishonoured all its promises, discredited all its prophecies, and trampled all its ideals under foot. It appeared on the scene as a supernatural device to set right a disjointed world; but after nineteen centuries the world is still in a state of woeful imperfection, crying out for deliverance as passionately and as hopelessly as ever. Does not Mr. Mozley realize that if war is incompatible with a perfect state of society, it must be incompatible with Christianity, whose alleged function it is to produce such a state? And does it not necessarily follow that when a Christian joins in a bloody conflict, he thereby confesses that he is acting disloyally to his ideal in a world imperfectly Christianized? It may be true, as Mr. Mozley says, that "war, with all its evils, has been an instrument, terrible and clumsy, and yet neither wholly fruitless nor simply ignoble, in human and moral progress"; but he forgets that it has been so in a world swayed by purely natural and selfish motives, and over which the supernatural has never exerted the slightest influence. The emancipation of the slaves in America was achieved by force of arms, simply because the slave-owners did not perceive that slavery was wrong; but that war was not waged by the Church, but in defiance of her teaching, and the man directly responsible for it was an Agnostic, believing neither in Christianity nor yet in war. In that case, war was an instrument, terrible and clumsy, for the establishment of right by might, and Lincoln used it because no other means was available. It may be said of the French Revolution that it put an end to certain gigantic evils; but, like the American Civil War, it was not conducted in the name of the Church. The Church has never been distinguished as a factor in political and social reforms, many of which she has discouraged and even opposed.

Now, if in a perfect Christendom there would be no war, and if it be the mission of Christianity to produce a perfect Christendom, there is absolutely no escape from the conclusion that war is, in its very nature, anti-Christian, and that when a Christian fights for his country he proves that he is a patriot first and a Christian "a long way behind," and by implication Mr. Mozley admits the truth of this statement. And yet he declares that the Church "could not (for it was not her belief) proclaim that it (war) was either essentially and always a moral evil, or productive of evil alone." Consequently, he takes his stand with the enormous majority of Christians, affirming that there are occasions on which it is lawful for Christians to take up arms in defence of what they believe to be the right. The absurdity of this position appears when we realize that the Germans, as well as the British, are Christians, who are convinced that they are doing their duty in waging this frightful conflict, and that both sides are praying for victory to the same God.

As an apologètic, The Achievements of Christianity is a conspicuous failure. The section dealing with war is utterly irrelevant, for surely no one would ever dream of pronouncing war a Christian achievement. Mr. Mozley quotes Lecky, who says that "Christianity for the first time made charity a rudimentary virtue"; but is it not true that charity in the form of alms doled out to the poor has been a curse rather than a blessing? Christianity has never attacked the social and economic conditions under which poverty has invariably prevailed, but has contented itself with urging the poor to be duly submissive, paying proper respect to their "betters," and promising them a reversal of conditions beyond the tomb. Such is the direct lesson to be drawn from the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, and such has been the teaching of the Church in all ages. "Ye have the poor always with you" is a Biblical expression that has been fruitful of incalculable mischief. "Society," says Sir Thomas More, "is a conspiracy of the rich against the poor," which means that the rich have been guilty of exploiting the poor to their own advantage; and in the Church they have instituted charity as a virtue that covers up the sin of exploitation. Does Mr. Mozley really regard charity as a satisfactory substitute for justice? Our author states that the graces of chivalry did something to lighten the horrors of the battlefield; but chivalry is not a Christian virtue, but was introduced by the Goths. He further asserts that it was due to the faith of Christ that "a public conscience was created in connection with the character of sports and of theatrical performances," which resulted in the abolition of gladiatorial shows in the year 404; but, as a matter of fact, those humiliating spectacles were not discontinued till much later; and it is well known that throughout the ages the Church has winked at most cruel sports, even in Great Britain as well as in Spain and other countries. Tertullian, for example, condemned not merely the gladiatorial shows because of their brutality, but all forms of secular amusement. To him an actor was an abomination. He says:—

> No one that goes to the play thinks of anything else than to see and to be seen. Is it possible, while listening to the declamation of the actor, to think on the sentence of a prophet, or in the midst of the song of a eunuch, meditate on a psalm.....The Creator of truth loves nothing that is false, all fiction is, to him, falsification. He who condemns all hypocrisy will never pronounce him good who counterfeits voice, sex, age, love, anger, sighs, and tears.

To the writers of the New Testament and to the Fathers of the Church generally, the world and its things were hopelessly corrupt, spiritual pleasures alone being permissible. Tertullian, the most powerful and eloquent of all the divines of the third century, says:—

> Tell me, pray, have we any other desire than that which was the desire of the apostle, to depart, viz., from the world, and be with the Lord? Wherever thy wishes are there are thy pleasures.....For what is there more joyous than reconciliation with God, thy Father and thy Lord—than the revelation of truth, the knowledge of > error, the forgiveness of so many past sins? What greater pleasure than the contempt of such pleasures, and of the whole world?

According to Mr. Mozley the writers of the New Testament and the Fathers were radically mistaken, and "Christianity is not committed by its principles to think of the next world as its only interest"; but we venture to contradict his assertion. Christianity is fundamentally a religion for the world to come, not for this; but the priests exploited both it and those who professed it to their own enrichment and comfort here below. Consequently, its achievements, in relation to the people at large, have been few and far between, and, at best, indirect; but, in relation to the Church, as an institution, they have been multitudinous, and of a most substantial character. In so far as they possess evidential value the Freethinker finds them of inestimable service to the cause he has so much at heart. He claims them as witnesses against, not for, the truth of the Christian religion.

George Leslie Mackenzie.

> Alas poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio; a fellow of infinite jest; of most excellent fancy.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

The other day I purchased on a bookstall a soiled and well-worn copy of George Leslie Mackenzie's Brimstone Ballads, and it set me thinking of the personality of the man whose lively verses were, years ago, one of the constant delights of Freethinker readers. The book was to me a veritable link with the past. For the name on the title-page was of one who was my familiar friend. It was not often that we met, but I loved him well. If I were writing one of those chilly obituary notices, I could not make a great story of what he had done with his life. He was a minor writer, and not a famous author. Yet to those near to him he had the qualities which are quite as precious as those which make for fame and reputation. He had a merry heart and a kindly one. There was never a company not the merrier that he was in. Many are duller because he is dead. For he possessed that vagrant, potent thing which men call charm. No wonder he took hold of one's mind as he took hold of one's hand, with a warm, affectionate grip that lasted.

Although a good speaker, Mackenzie was never at his happiest in the garish light of publicity. He loved better a few friends with whom he could talk metaphysics and literature, especially of the great French authors, for whom he had a real liking. He had the spirit of the idealist without the sharp edges that sometimes make the missionaries of ideas less attractive to the world than one might wish. He was, above all, sociable in his idealism. A most modest man, he preferred the position of a common soldier in the Army of Freethought. This is the kind of work which does a man honour but brings him none. He would have sympathized with the modest Frenchman who, when Napoleon took him familiarly by the ear, and offered him the Legion of Honour, answered, "Thank you, sire, but could not your Majesty give it to my father?"

His professional position would have made most men cautious, but timidity was unknown to him. All his contributions to the Freethinker were signed with his name. It was in the scant leisure of a busy career that he composed his verses, and he chose the metrical form of writing because it demanded a certain amount of skill in using words. He was under no illusion as to the merits of his verses. "I know too well what a poet ought to be," he once told me, "to imagine I am one." For, in my impetuous way, I had dubbed him "The Laureate of Secularism."

Mackenzie only published one book, but it was, to use Lord Morley's expressive phrase, "a thunderous engine of revolt." Within a couple of hundred pages, Brimstone Ballads contained an astonishing amount of wit, satire, and argument. It was a happy idea on Mackenzie's part to commence his very profane book of verses with lines on "Genesis," and to finish with some verses on "Cremation." In this volume he proved himself the most uncompromising rhymester that ever attacked superstition in general and Christianity in particular. He showed the orthodox faith no sort of mercy, and his statement of his point of view is well worth reading. So comprehensive an indictment of a vulnerable institution could hardly fail to contain a great deal of truth.

I first met Mackenzie on a South London tramcar. We fell into conversation, and I offered him a copy of the Freethinker. He replied, "I not only read it, but I write for it." "Who are you?" I queried, and I recall his humorous smile as he answered, jocularly, "Mackenzie, if it doesn't mak enzie difference." My first impression was something of a shock. You could hardly imagine that this quiet, smiling, respectable, professional man could write a lyric, or turn a profane phrase against the orthodoxies of the world.

A thorough Freethinker, there was no shadow of turning, no trace of compromise about George Leslie Mackenzie. It was this, perhaps, even more than his ability which earned for him the confidence and admiration of his friends of many years. I saw him for the last time at Southend, and he then talked with difficulty, and I could not but admit that my dear old friend had then only a short time to live. Since then the fates have had their way with him. His name is with many other names, and the sight of his book has set me thinking of him. I can, in my mind's eye, see him now as he stood quietly watching the sun shining on the sea that stretched far away. Now he is—> gathered to the quiet west,

> The sundown splendid and serene,
> Death.

A Metaphysical Apology for Suffering.

Of all the square pegs which man has ever worried himself with the task of fitting into round holes, probably the most irresistibly seductive, yet hopelessly futile, is the postulate that an omnipotent, omniscient, and beneficent God is the "director and organizer" of sentient life, and implicitly the "author" of sorrow and suffering. And probably of all the defensive pleas which have been put forward for the assumption, the most sophistic and hollow is that advanced by the "individuation" apology of the metaphysician now revived by Mr. Archer in his book on God and Mr. Wells.

For the sake of those who may have not read the book we shall quote those sentences which are meant to convey or imply his contention and "argument." He starts by repudiating the idea that "sentience" > was an article capable of accumulation like money and merchandise, in enormous aggregates—as though pleasure, and more particularly pain, were subject to the ordinary rules of arithmetic, so that minor quantities added together, might mount up to an indefinitely gigantic total.

Though this statement does not lack in dogmatic emphasis, yet the argument is seen only "as in a glass darkly." Mr. Archer's allusions are too tangential to be explicit, and his language too rhetorical to be precise. For that reason we subjoin the following alternative expressions in case they might prove to the reader to be more definite or lucid:—

Digitized by Google

> Individuation forbids the adding of units of sentience.
> Individuation is, beyond doubt, the boundary and limit of human misery.
> The sufferings of victims cannot be added together.
> There has not been, and never can be, in this world more suffering than a single organism can sustain.
> Every sentient organism is immured in his oron universe.

The pith of this "individuation" morality, when divested of its metaphysical garb, seems to be that a responsible moral agent may inflict, or allow to be inflicted, as much suffering as he likes, without incurring any increase of guilt, provided only it falls to the lot of different or new individuals. For example, to starve, torture, or burn a million sentient beings is no bigger a crime than if only one victim were involved, since their agonies "cannot be added together." It is a moral principle quite befitting a fiend, Satanic or human, but one infinitely incompatible with the idea of a benign God. For, after the perpetration of one crime, it could freely indulge its villainous propensities without scruple or fear. Well may the Huns exult so deliriously over their ceaseless repetitions of the most revolting crimes, since, by this divine morality, it steeps them no deeper in guilt!

Mr. Archer, however, does not appear to have ever troubled himself with the task of inquiring into the meaning of "adding," either as a physical or as a mental process. The "aggregating" or "adding" of sentience differs in no particular from what it is in respect to every economic attribute of "money and merchandise."

In this contention Mr. Archer confounds two independent issues. He identifies sentience, or the capacity of feeling pain, with the pain itself. Sentience and suffering are, of course, "causally" related, yet they are wholly independent in respect of their computability, or of the moral responsibility attached to them. Sentience is an attribute of neural substance, and shares the nature of all attributes save that of extension, gravity, and inertia in being insusceptible of direct measurement for the obvious reason that no unit—the basis of all reckoning—can be delimited or carved out of it. The fact is not in the least degree unique to sentience, as Mr. Archer seems to think.

Sweetness, edibility, or any other economic attribute is no more measurable in terms of itself than sentience is. Extension, however, being spatial, and gravity through having spatial effects (motion or displacement), are divisable into portions which may act as units. These two attributes, being fundamental and absolutely general, are made to serve as proxy-units of any of the specific properties associated with them. The only calculation, therefore, that an attribute is capable of is that obtained through reckoning the individuals or units in which the particular property appears; that is, by counting the proxies of "volume" and weight. And the prevalence of sentience is estimated in exactly the same way by counting sentient beings.

When, however, we come to consider Suffering as an estimable quantity, we are on a totally new ground. We have shifted from the potential to the actual; from capacity to sensation or experience. Now, sensation, either as pain or pleasure, is the mental product of the acting and reacting capacities of object and subject conjointly. Sweetness is neither in the molecule of sugar, nor yet in that of the brain, but is the "physic offspring" of their joint activities. This mental offspring of pleasant or painful experience, however, is born into consciousness with two new and characteristic attributes —viz, a sense of Duration and of Intensity; and the measure of suffering, if practicably measurable, would be the product of these two factors.

But in the name of all reason, what would have been gained by measuring it? Would its sum total be any different through being expressed as a numerical multiple of some arbitrary unit of spatial elements, as if the act or process of calculating possessed some magic power over the computed magnitude! Calculation has no more effect upon the quantity calculated than a shadow has upon the object that casts it. Did Mr. Archer suppose that if the gigantic total could not be expressed in human units, the prosecution would be non-suited by a forensic quibble on a technical point, and that his august client would be thereby acquitted! Human devices of computation are wholly irrelevant to the question of divine guilt; the indictment is not preferred extraneously by some advocatus diaboli, but is implicit in each experience of pain, agony, or anguish, irrespective even of the status or of the individuality of the sufferer.

Mr. Archer, by the by, does not even refer to the time factor—a most remarkable omission, since to say the least, it is not of less moment than intensity in the ceaseless tragedy of sentient existence. The common question is not merely how acute was the pain, but how long it lasted? Hell's ineffably abhorrent fiendishness was due to its eternal duration rather than to its imaginary agony, though that was the most excruciating known to sentient flesh.

Again, as regards moral responsibility, suffering is likewise on a totally independent footing. Sentience implanted as a sentinel to safeguard the organism, is susceptible of a plausible defence, though very inferior to the instinct that intuits danger without having occasion to taste a single painful experience. The moral responsibility and guilt of the postulated author and director of sentiency arises not from the endowment but from the ordering of living existence in a way that the capacity is evoked into activity as bootless suffering. And above all, from the grafting upon the animal stock of rapacity and passion the endowment of self-consciousness —a superadded capacity to which the deluge of mundane evil is mainly due; it enabled man, with whip, lash, and goad, to exploit the sentiency of his fellow-creatures in order to gratify his natural cruelty and his insatiable greed.

The fact that each sufferer is "immured in his own universe" does not extenuate the divine guilt; on the contrary, it magnifies it to infinity. This fact makes it impossible for the sufferer to ease his pain by sharing it with his fellows; or for them to soothe his agony by sharing with him their life, health, or joys. The keen enjoyment of those who feast can bring no relief or soothing to the pangs of the starving, whether far or near. The predicament of a sentient being is not unlike that of a person immured in a building destined sooner or later to be set on fire, but which is so isolated that neither escape nor relief is possible; and thus imprisoned, he is doomed to endure his agonies alone. And this is the "individuation" predicament that Mr. Archer considers to confer upon the divine artificer immunity of guilt!

Inalienability is not, by the by, unique to sentiency; it is an essential truth of all attributes due to their functional nature. But though it is thus impossible to "aggregate" or intensify an attribute by any process of concentration, it is usually possible to amass its concrete embodiments so as to produce a simultaneous effect. One molecule of an explosive will burst no shell, but infinite millions of them will rend the toughest into fragments. You may make a bonfire sky-high by piling up masses of wood, but the combustibility of its ultimate elements is absolutely "inalienable," and is therefore, as such, incapable of being amassed or intensified. So with sentience; yet a hungry nation may demolish a throne, though a starving individual is impotent.

In his parable of the one hundred million people, each of whom is born with an allowance of £5, in which he cynically compares suffering to spent capital, he follows the abhorrent example of Paul, in which the Apostle defends his God for dooming his sentient creatures to an eternity of torture, by comparing his divine right to do so to that of a potter over his non-sentient clay! The method of apologists has not changed!

Mr. Archer usually admits or defends intrinsic absurdities, and critically discusses trumpery claims that merit nothing but ridicule or silent contempt. He fortifies citadels, but tilts like Don Quixote at some windmill, or charges some flock of sheep with amusing energy. But what is the use of erecting a picturesque literary structure if, as he freely admits, he has no better foundation for it than a bed of quicksand? Having admitted that 2 and 2 may make 5, whatever is then to be gained by elaborating a lengthy argument to "prove" that they cannot amount to 5¼! None, save that of having a book to sell. Nothing is better calculated to endow an absurdity with immortality than to discuss it seriously, or talk about it with straight faces; and for this reason I consider that Mr. Archer has done the cause of Rationalism a *dis*service by discussing the Wellsian God.

The problem of evil is created solely by the "postulate"; abandon that, and all mystery vanishes. It is the natural and inevitable outcome of the cosmic evolutionary process.

OFFICIAL EDUCATION OF POOR CHILDREN.

On one occasion, when I was in one of the largest and poorest of the London Elementary Schools, where the children looked as pitifully sordid and poverty-stricken as I have ever seen them, I asked a few questions of one small girl in the front row of a class. Her outside dress consisted of an old dilapidated waistcoat worn over a dingy flannelette nightgown, while a ragged piece of serge fastened around the waist with a safety pin did duty for a skirt. But she was only one among a classful of rags and tatters.

"What is your name?" I asked, by way of starting conversation.

"Victorine," the forlorn-looking little thing replied.

"And what is your lesson about?" I then inquired.

"Therdelfykorrickul," she informed me.

Seeing the bewildered look on my face, the head mistress, who was showing me round, said, "Enunciate your words more carefully Victorine, and speak slowly."

Victorine understood what "speak slowly" meant, and so she said very deliberately, "The—Delphic—Horricul."

"So you are learning about the Delphic Oracle. And what are you going to do when you grow up?" was my next query.

"I'm going to work in the laundry, like muvver!"

We went into another classroom; here more ragged, unwashed clothes greeted me on every hand. I had no need to ask the subject of the lesson, for the girls were facing a blackboard on which was written, "The Characteristics of Shelley's Poetry." After I had seen more tatters in a third room, where a lesson was being given on "Infinitive Verbs," I said to the head mistress, "If I had this school, do you know what I should do? I should take a class at a time, and give out needles and cotton, and tell them to do the best they could to sew up the rags in their dresses and their pinafores. I would not mind if they did not put on patches even to a thread in the regulation way, so long as they made some attempt to run together those rents and slits and yawning gaps. I would let the other lessons go, till this was done And I would not let a girl take her place in a class in the morning till she had mended, as well as she could, any rents she had worn to school."

The head mistress shook her head. "That would not be practical; you see, it isn't in the Syllabus."

I don't pretend to understand the inwardness of Syllabuses but I couldn't help wondering if there wasn't an opening here for a new one. While so much unpractical stuff is taught to the poorer classes in Elementary Schools, is it any wonder that the children know so little of the things appertaining to daily life?—Flora Klickmann, "Between the Larch-Woods and the Weir."

Acid Drops.

If God Almighty has a sense of humour, the world just now—particularly the Christian part of it—must keep his face "all smiles." He will have noted that, while his Christian followers could not tolerate Sunday labour in the interests of education or rational enjoyment, they can put up with it quite easily when it becomes a question of carrying on a war. He will also have observed that with the same people the preservation of babies has become a burning question, when there threatens to be a shortage of men for the armies of the future. Lastly, he will see that, after opposing the equality of the sexes for centuries, a number of Churchmen are now busy seeing how her services can be utilized in the "ministrations of the Anglican Church." Woman has the vote, and the more astute are realizing it is time that something was done. And, of course, full Christian warranty will be found for all they are doing—as it was found for all they have done.

Catholics believe in miracles at Lourdes and elsewhere, but they realize that all the saints in the calendar are powerless in the present world shortage of food. Cardinal Bourne has absolved English Catholics from the necessity of fasting, and exhorts them "to follow strictly the advice and regulations issued by the Government in the matter of food." In plain English, Catholics are exhorted to look to the Government, and not to God, for their daily bread.

Defenders of the design argument will be pleased to note that a Northumberland ewe, belonging to Mr. J. Dunwoody, a Sheffield district farmer, has given birth to four lambs, one of which has two perfect heads.

The wife of Thomas Geoffrey Wall Henslow, formerly rector of Stanton St. Quentin, near Chippenham, has been granted a decree nisi of divorce on the grounds of his cruelty and immorality. The restraints of religion are conspicuous by their absence in this case.

This from the Daily Sketch:—

> I wondered to what extent the Kaiser would give thanks to the Almighty over the peace with the Ukraine business. His speeches, messages, and telegrams have of late demonstrated a molto crescendo of blasphemous piety. In pre-war days I regarded the Kaiser as a cleverly foolish person, who walked about with a lectern on his head and had no sense of humour. Now he has proved himself a criminal lunatic of the first order, and any mental specialist will tell you that a constant invocation of the Deity is one of the surest symptoms of the malady.

The italics are ours. And, we may add, that a constant invocation of the Deity is not connected with certain forms of brain disease alone. It is just as common with rogues of all varieties.

Sacred images are not so carefully looked after by Providence in this country as they are on the Continent. Thieves who broke into St. Paul's Church, Sheffield, and failed to find money in the collection boxes, vented their spite by smashing up a religious figure.

Dr. Fort Newton, the American minister of the City Temple, London, in a sermon on "The Larger Rationalism," said: "When a man comes to me with intellectual difficulties I want to say to him—I do not always do so: 'What have you been up to?'" Dr. Newton has very quaint ideas of the charity that "thinketh no evil."

Wonderfully and fearfully made are the theologians of all schools. In his correspondence column in the British Weekly for February 21, Professor David Smith says that since it "took God countless ages to create the world by the patient process of evolution," it is no wonder "that its re-creation also is slowly accomplished." Does it not strike the reverend gentleman as passing strange that a world created by a perfect Deity should stand in need of recreation? Does he admit that the first creation of it was a colossal failure? And if the first creation turned out so disastrously, what guarantee is there that the second will fare any better?

Dr. Smith tells us that "the preparation for the Saviour's Advent occupied millenniums," and now since his advent nearly two milleniums have come and gone, but the kingdom he came to establish is still a thing of the future. So Dr. Smith solemnly informs us, and he is right; but it never occurs to him that he is unconsciously stating the most powerful of all arguments against the truth of the Christian religion. His acceptance of evolution renders his Theism and Christology laughably absurd. He knows the facts, but ignores their natural significance, thereby showing their absolute incompatibility with the so-called doctrines of grace.

Smaller newspapers, and its attendant restrictions, have not eliminated frivolity from the pages of the press. A recent paragraph is worth quoting: "Charlie, the pet seagull of the Bishop of Ely, who has been a feature of the palace garden for the past twenty-six years, has just died at the age of thirty-five."

The Christian World states that Gipsy Smith, the evangelist, has been asked by the Government to go to the United States on a special mission to help to draw England and America more closely together.

The Young Women's Christian Association is appealing for a modest sum of £183,000 to extend its work in connection with clubs and rest rooms, and the Young Men's Christian Association has already raised enormous sums for canteens and huts. Will this end in the endowment of Unsectarian Christianity?

The Bishop of London says he has made a habit of reading a chapter of a devotional book each morning. It is a pity his lordship did not give details. Thomas a Kempis and Billy Sunday's Sermons are both devotional works.

It is the business of parsons to gain adherents, and incidentally pecuniary enrichment, of their particular organization. It is, therefore, not a matter of surprise that, at the beginning of the War, they attempted to use the military machine for their own ends. Apparently they imagined that the horrors of the Front would cause the soldiers to be ready material for conversion to the dying faith. But the result has not come up to their expectations. Indeed, we may say they are disappointed. Undaunted, however, on this road, attention is now being paid to the raid-shelters of London, and in these assemblies, with the effrontery of their class, they are attempting to force upon people of all shades of opinion the nostrums of their trade.

An instance of this is reported to us from West Ham, where a cleric of St. Matthew's Church imposed himself upon the gathering in a Council school one evening last week, taking possession of the piano, handing out hymn-books, and, with the aid of one or two of his congregation, started something in the nature of a revival meeting. We are pleased to learn that, by way of protest, his little band of pilgrims were effectually silenced in the middle of a hymn by the rest of the refugees singing the popular song commencing, "What's the use of worrying?" Of course, it is quite impossible to expect that bigots will see that ratepayers have the right to use Council property without interference, but sharp rebuffs like this may teach them in time.

The Young Men's Christian Association made a special appeal for billiard tables, and received in response over eight hundred, the majority full size. Many people regard the Christian religion as a game, but few associated it with billiards.

Mrs. Sarah Begent, of Folkestone, has died at the age of 101, and editors are making paragraphs concerning her longevity. At that early age Methuselah was trundling a hoop.

The World's Student Christian Federation, which claims to have 189,000 members, advertises a Day of Prayer. Pity the sorrows of a poor old deity!

The Parish Priest of Clones is very plain-spoken on the question of the Church and the children, and for that we thank him. Addressing his congregation, he said that some of the teachers in Ireland were trying to do away with clerical management, and objected to the parish priests being their employers and paymasters. But, asks Canon McNeal, "Who else but the Church had the right to appoint them and be their paymasters? The Church must control the schools and appoint and pay the teachers, and not.....any official of the Civil Government." He also "warned the teachers to have nothing to do with a movement to do away with clerical management, and those who identified themselves with such would find themselves expelled from their positions." Now, that is good Christian practice, and again we thank Canon McNeal for being so straightforward. We know where to find him; and other people will know what to do with him.

An elderly lady died at Birmingham through swallowing her false teeth while singing a hymn at a local chapel. Had the lady been attending a Freethought lecture there would have been a powerful and impressive moral.

The glorious free press of England! The Times' Literary Supplement has been repeating the nonsense about the poet Shelley being "naturally Christian." Is it too much to expect that journalists should be "naturally truthful?"

Cardinal Logue has been speaking disparagingly of the Republican form of government. His Eminence has the consolation that heaven is his home.

"Out of 100 people who see visions, 99 are telling lies or are lunatics," says Mr. Hilaire Belloc. Presumably, the odd one-per-cent. is a truthful Roman Catholic.

The vicar of Goring was fined £5 costs for assaulting a choir boy aged fourteen. It seems the boy was singing out of tune, and refused to bow to the altar, so while the congregation were singing a hymn he sent the boy out, followed him, and, as a result, the boy's mother found behind the lad's ear a lump "nearly as big as a hen's egg," and other injuries. The vicar contended that he had a perfect right to thrash the boy, but the magistrates took a different view, with the result as above. But a vicar giving out a hymn to keep the congregation busy while he goes out to thrash a choir boy, and returning in time to finish the service, is quite a fine illustration of the inwardness of Christian ethics.

Four columns of the Times were taken up recently by Cardinal Bourne for a "Message to the Nation." The message is inserted as an advertisement, and, we presume, must have cost a good sum. And in the whole of the four columns Cardinal Bourne succeeds in saying no more than that the Catholic Church alone can save the world—which is precisely what all the other Churches are saying, and with just as much warranty in fact. We cited one passage from this "Message" last week, and our readers are therefore in a position to judge of its value. And when a Cardinal of the Catholic Church can insist, in four columns, that the Church to which he belongs has already stood for liberty, we can only congratulate him on the cool impudence of the assertion.

We should dearly like Cardinal Bourne's explanation of the state of, say Spain, which, more than any other country in Europe, has been under the domination of the Catholic Church. And the fact of one country after another being compelled to curtail the activities of the Church because its interference in social and political life threatened human progress, requires explanation. Cardinal Bourne says that people are becoming impressed with the ability of the Roman Church to bring back peace and justice to the world; and that, we take it, is no more than a bid for support from a class whose purpose is, not the progress of the world, but the conservation of their own interests.

And this, we think, gives the true inwardness of Cardinal Bourne's Message. The Times is not a working-class paper; it is not even a middle-class paper. It is the organ of the "upper classes," and, in the present state of the world, these feel anything but secure. They are beginning to wonder what will happen after the War, and the Churches are equally doubtful as to what will happen to them. And Cardinal Bourne's "Message" is just a bid for support, financial or otherwise, from those who have most to fear from any genuine scheme of social reconstruction. How far it will be successful we do not know. But we may be sure that the Churches and vested interests will work together till the end.

Lord Halifax is still greatly disturbed over the appointment of the new Bishop of Hereford. He says that if the Bishop's views are to remain unchallenged, it will be impossible for Christians to pray:—

> Grant us so to eat the flesh of Thy dear Son Jesus Christ, and to drink His Blood, that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His Body, and our souls washed through His most Precious Blood.

Why it reads like the invocation of a tribe of cannibals! Even as imagery it is disgusting. Not even a period of food shortage can reconcile the really civilized mind to such language. Of course, Lord Halifax would explain that the language doesn't mean what it implies, and, doubtless, it doesn't—to him. But those who know something of the nature of religious signs, will readily recognize the hopelessly savage basis on which such symbolism rests.

What funny ideas of Atheism some people have! Mr Max Pemberton, the novelist, says that Sir Robertson Nicoll told him of a man who lost all his money through the Whittaker Wright frauds. Then he went home and burned his Bible, and afterwards professed to be an Atheist. Evidently becoming an Atheist is like using Pear's soap instead of Sunlight, or wearing a soft shirt instead of a starched. You have only to say "I will be an Atheist," and the thing is done. The appalling ignorance (we use the term deliberately, for a man may be educated and yet appallingly ignorant) indicated by such a statement is marked. Or perhaps it is an indication of reliance on the ignorance of those who are being addressed.

The following story is reprinted from the Star:—

> While the Rev. Joseph Johnson, of Marlington, W. Va., was conducting a baptism in the river he felt something in one of his trousers legs.
> He stopped the ceremony several times while he was putting a convert under the water as a cold, clammy thing got further up his leg, and finally passed the belt line and got into the folds of his shirt.
> At the close of the service he found the intruder was a one-pound bass, which he took home and ate at dinner.

It is a pity that the reverend gentleman, having secured the bass, was unable to transform it into five thousand. Was the fish trying to pull his leg?

We have every sympathy with the idea of a League of Nations, which, indeed, seems the only way by which future wars may become less likely. But we cannot see the connection between that and the "Prince of Peace," who is invoked in a manifesto just issued, and bearing the signatures of a number of well-known parsons. Whenever the idea of a League of Nations actualizes, it will be due to forces that have no connection whatever with Christianity. And if the "Prince of Peace" has never been able to keep any group of his followers out of war up to the present, there seems little warranty in invoking his name now. The idea of a United States of Europe belongs to Thomas Paine—who first used the phrase "The United States of America"—as much as to any other man. But it would never do for the parsons to admit that.

The "Bishop's Coadjutor" of Colorado thinks that Denver City has too many Episcopal Churches, and suggests abolishing five of the existing nine. If this suggestion is acted on we hope the citizens of Denver will not be outdone in this line by the Bishop. They ought to close those remaining to show they appreciate his excellent example.

Our "Round-Up."

Some time ago we set ourselves, with the cheerfully given help of our readers, to secure a thousand new readers. In the midst of a world-war, with so many readers leaving the country, and with other difficulties to face, it would not have been a matter for surprise had we failed to accomplish our purpose. But, instead of failure, we have to report success. The thousand has been secured. The circulation of the Freethinker now stands at about one thousand copies per week more than when we assumed editorship.

But success is useless unless it leads to further triumphs. The new readers secured must act as a base from which to gain a still further increase. And we are now out for a second thousand readers. They can be got as easily or more easily than the first thousand. We venture to say that if a quarter of the number of our present readers set to work, we could have them in a week. There are thousands waiting to become subscribers, but they must first make the acquaintance of the paper.

And that is just where the help of our friends is indispensable. Nothing can take the place of their individual interest and assistance. It is only with their aid that our 1918 "Round-Up" can be made effective.

So we again ask the help of all to secure this new thousand readers, and to secure them now. We are pegging away under such difficulties as no Freethought paper ever had to face, and we are making headway. That is the compensation for all our struggles.

The Freethinker is at present one of the few papers, if not the only paper, in England that remains unaltered in size and price. We are keeping it so under a great strain, because we are thinking of the period after the War. When that time arrives, we want this paper to be in a position to command the attention of the country in a greater measure than it has yet done. And there will then be a greater need for the Freethinker than there has ever been.

Really, the future of the paper is in the hands of its readers. We know they are interested in it in a way that holds good of few papers published. That is why we do not hesitate in asking their help. It has been cheerfully and fruitfully given before. We know it will be cheerfully and fruitfully given again.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 3, Sheffield; March 17, Southampton; March 24, Manchester; March 31, Blaengarw; April 7, Goldthorpe; April 14, Glasgow; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.—H. Dawson, 2s; E. Langridge, 5s.; S. W. Soper, 5s.; C. F. Simpson, 10s. 6d.

"Tar Can" writes apropos of a Mr. A. C. Bowler leaving £40,000 to the Lancashire Congregational Union: "The 'Dead Hand' again! In these days the Christians have not the best intellects, or even a majority of believers, out of the population; but their wealth is enormous, and attracts parasites. Also they are well organized, so that if a religious pig squeals, it starts all the styes in the kingdom."

A. Wildman.—Very pleased to hear of the accession of new members and the growth in the number of Freethinker readers.

J. Bury.—The only work of the kind you inquire for is Mr. Cohen's Foreign Missions, but that is now out of print. The publishers of Mr. Clodd's work is Methuen & Co.; price 10s. 6d.

H. Y. C. Clark.—Book is being sent; but only 2s. was enclosed, not 3s., as stated.

H. Dawson.—Pleased to learn that the Freethinker "charms" you more than ever. We agree that the times are hopeful for a big Freethought offensive. The position of this paper after three-and-a-half years' of war is evidence to that end. And the membership of the N. S. S. is stronger to-day than it has been for years.

C. Broadhurst.—We are sending you a copy of the paper for a few weeks at our own cost.

S. P. (Manchester).—Sorry, but rather too lengthy for use in the Freethinker.

C. P. Milman.—Gibbon refers to stories that the Crusaders before Jerusalem were at one time so pressed for food that they ate human flesh, and similar stories were current in antiquity. But we do not recall any modern instances.

J. McCrachin.—See "Acid Drops." Naturally, the clergy will fight for the control of the children. It is vital to their interests. If they lose the child they lose everything.

S. Ames.—We note your suggestion for a series of articles explaining in non-technical language some of the more important experiments of Professor Loeb and his fellow-workers. Will see what can be done.

W. H. Owen.—Your lecture notice bore the post-mark "February 18, 8.30"; but it was not delivered at this office until the morning of the 20th. The delay may have been due to the air raids, but secretaries should see that their guide notices are sent in good time.

R. Chapman.—Sorry to hear of your indisposition. Hope it is nothing serious, and that by this time you are better. No report of the lecture was taken.

R. N.—Thanks. Can use next week.

C. F. Simpson.—It was very thoughtful of you to forward 10s. 6d. towards the increased cost of paper, which, by the way, is greater week by week. We are crediting the Sustentation Fund with your donation.

F. T. Knott.—Thanks for getting two new subscribers. We believe that with the French or Continental order of Freemasons the Theistic form is abolished. Many Atheists have declined to belong to the English order on account of the theistic pledge. We appreciate your regard for "our wonderful Freethinker."

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures to-day (March 3) in the Builder's Exchange, Cross Burgess Street, Sheffield. The afternoon meeting is at 3.30, and the evening one at 6.30. Admission to both meetings is free, and this will give a good opportunity for Freethinkers to induce the attendance of their Christian friends and acquaintances.

Lance-corporal Rite sends us the following from France:—

S. O. S.

> On my front the line of Christianity is being subjected to a most intense bombardment by your literature, so intense that this part of the line will have to be relinquished.

This is in reply to a parcel of literature that was sent out from this office for distribution. We are glad to know that our munition is proving so effective, and we should be glad to be able to send out on a more extended scale.

This evening (March 3) Mr. F. E. Willis lectures at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, on "Sacred Fetishes." Mr. Willis is just back from a visit to the Front, and will, doubtless, have something interesting to say about the state of religion as he saw it amongst the soldiers. A Freethinker's story will be worth hearing after so many parsons.

A South Shields stalwart, Mr. J. Fothergill, has been showing up a local parson, the Rev. S. Kearney, in a letter to the Shields Daily Gazette. A Sunday concert was given in the Queen's Theatre, Shields, in aid of the South Shields Soldier's Fund. The Rev. gentleman had taken exception to the hour, 7 p.m., at which the concert was held, evidently fearing that the inhabitants of Shields would go the concert rather than to church, and suggested it should commence at 8 p.m. Mr. Fothergill very sensibly points out the inadvisability of late hours for the young people, and strongly resents this clerical interference. We are glad to see the Editor of the Shields Daily Gazette has published his letter.

We are asked to announce that the postponed lecture of Mr. T. F. Rayner on "The Life and Work of Charles Darwin" will be delivered in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road, Southampton, this evening (March 3). Local Freethinkers will please note.

This paragraph is a hint to those N. S. S. members who have not yet sent on their annual subscriptions, they now become due in January. And while we are about it, we may remark that if members feel inclined to enlarge their annual subscription, no fault will be found. Needless to say, the Society cannot pursue its work properly on the basis of its minimum membership fee, and if non-members feel inclined to forward a substantial sum to the Society's funds, we are convinced the General Secretary's heart will stand the shock.

The annual report of Brechin Established Church notes that the total church collections works out at less than a halfpenny per member. The Rev. Mr. Bisset, commenting on this, says that he dreads the introduction of farthings into Forfarshire. For ourselves, we should hesitate to charge the congregation with niggardliness without knowing the quality of the sermons preached. Some that we have read would be well paid for at two a penny.

Owing to the transposition of a line, a contemporary was made to say, "The Archbishop of Canterbury has been confined," presumably referring to his Grace's indisposition. Hasty readers might have imagined that the age of miracles had not passed.

Belief in God.

A Lecture by the late G. W. Foote, at St. James's Hall, on October 29, 1909.

II.

(Concluded from p. 119.)

The savage was ignorant; he could not help believing supernaturalism. He could not help it in his ignorance of explaining the world in terms of his own nature, just as a little child will talk to a doll or a teddy bear, or even a chair or a table; so the savage who was, and is, the child of the Race, regards everything moving about him as alive.

You and I in a thunder-storm may be physically frightened, but we are not morally frightened. Why? Because we know something about the thunder-storm. We know that the noise, which is the most appalling part of it, is absolutely nothing; and the lightning, which may be dangerous, is, nevertheless (considering the few accidents that occur), of infinitesimal danger to any one of us; and so a man may, if he be of a certain temperament, feel his whole being dilating with the storm, and he may enjoy the magnificent spectacle.

But look at the savage: he knows nothing about thunder-storms; the noise is not a nothing; it is a grim reality to him. The noise is the roar of a being vastly greater than himself, but of the same nature; the lightning is the flash of his anger; and the savage prostrates himself in the dust, with eyes searching the ground, afraid to look up, and beseeching the great power overhead to sweep by and spare him, whoever else is lost. For you will find that religion and selfishness always did, always do, and always will go together.

Now, what makes the difference between the savage and the civilized being? Knowledge. That makes the great difference. Knowledge. And as all the gods in the world were created out of ignorance by the imagination, so reason, working upon knowledge, will destroy them all.

I say that religion and supernaturalism are one and the same thing. If you understand a thing, what does that mean? You can assign its natural explanation; and if you don't understand a thing its ten to one you will say God or the Devil is in it. All the clergy trade upon ignorance. I never heard a clergyman try to prove the existence of God from anything which he understood. He always asks: "Do you understand this material fact?" and you say "No." "That is God."

Why just take an illustration or two: You know the clergy used to say "Who made the World?" and as nobody knew (they are always ready to rush in where other people fear to tread) they said: "God made it," and the people who heard it said: "God made it." And the two ignorances countenanced each other. But by and by, you know astronomers explained the origin—the growth and decay—the destruction of worlds. Everlasting creation and everlasting destruction out of the same infinite reality in nature's method; and so the clergy gave up who made the world. They said we must drop that now. So they asked: "Who made all the species of animals, to say nothing of plants, in the earth?" Species, you know, they said, which always keep apart from each other, and however much they may seem to be running into each other, nevertheless maintain parallel lines. "Who made them? You don't know? You give it up? God made them."

By and by Charles Darwin came. He explained the origin of species, and the clergy dropped that. Then they asked; Who made man?" And they stood up with that supreme air of wisdom which characterizes them, and said:—"Brethren, who made man? Who made you? Who made me? Brethren, do you think that anything short of infinite wisdom made me?" If you had looked at him you would not have thought it. Which reminds me of Mr. Victor Hugo. Addressing the priests, he said: "You tell me that God made man in his own image, then if he is like you, he is a very ugly thing."

Now, Charles Darwin explained at last the origin of man, and the clergy said to each other (the knowing ones, I mean): "We must drop that." So now they ask: "Who made life? you don't know; you give it up? God made it." The same old answer of impudence to ignorance. Science has explained all along the line, and you and I await the further explanations of science.

Whenever a catastrophe occurs, many men and women become at once religious. If an earthquake occurs, that is the hand of God. If a volcano belches out lava and destroys the whole population of a city, that is the hand of God. On the other hand, if a great good fortune happens, the same people see the hand of God in that too.

In anything unusual which they cannot explain, there is the hand of God—but more usually in evil. If a man is going out with money in his pocket, and his wife or his sweetheart on his arm for a good day's outing, he is not religious. Talk religion to him, he says, "to-morrow." But if the train gets into an accident and he pulls through, he feels religious at once; and without troubling his head about all the poor devils who are dead, religion drops in, and he says: "Thank God I am alright."

And men pray to God—not all of them now—but still most do at times, if not, regularly. They ask for what they know in many cases they will never get. Ingersoll said: "People ask God to do sheer impossibilities. Why the other day I heard a man, with his eyes shut, asking God to give Congress wisdom." Well, we do as bad. I don't want to discuss politics, but look at the House of Lords. I say, look at them; and yet if the Church of England is read up you would find that the Lord is supplicated to endow the Lords of the Council and all the Nobility with grace, wisdom, and understanding. And they have not got it.

Thomas Carlyle, in his old age, said despondingly to Mr. Froude that "God does nothing new." The philosopher of Chelsea need not have taken so long to discover this truth. He might have perceived it fifty years sooner if he had not been blinded by the religious prejudices—or, as they are generally called, the religious principles—of his early training.

We do not deny, we are not concerned to deny, the Pantheism of a Spinoza, or the idea of God as a vast irresponsible power, governing the universe by general and unchangeable laws, and working out far-distant ends without a special attention to the individual happiness or misery of his sentient creatures. Such was the deity of Pope, who sneeringly asked, "Shall gravitation cease as you go by?" He overlooked the fact that the constancy of gravitation is a poor relief to the man whose head is broken by a falling chimney-pot. He also overlooked the fact that the God behind such a law does not come into any sort of moral relationship to his "children." Indeed, it is nonsense to call them his children. He is not even their step-father. To call him "Our Father" is a wretched abuse of language. But the other God, the God of the clergy, the God who sees and hears and notices all that happens—that God is fairly entitled to be called a Devil. To know that outrage and murder are to be committed, and not to move a finger to prevent them, is the sublimation of infamy. The outrager is inspired by his lust, the murderer by his passion, but the callous onlooker is the lowest of the three in the sink of degradation.

Cambridge and Education.

An Oxford man of my acquaintance who, by the way, is nothing if not malicious, assures me that sausages are the only things associated in most people's minds with Cambridge. As I always make a point of avoiding this article of food, I am unable to question the truth of his assertion. I willingly accept his eulogy of its gastronomic virtues. If nothing else, it is both solid and mysterious, and thus is, perhaps, no unfitting symbol of the spiritual characteristics of the English race. Yet I am not wholly inclined to agree that Cambridge scholarship shows up badly against the Cambridge sausage, however good it may be. The University has always been, and is now, very strong in science. In history, Prof. Bury has a European reputation for both knowledge and acumen; and in English letters, Dr. Greg, Mr. McKerrow, and others, manage to combine exactitude with enthusiasm; while Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch brings to his lectures on our literature an unacademic skittishness, a refreshing want of reverence for official critical opinion and accepted reputations. I am afraid that my Oxford friend knows as much about Cambridge scholarship as I do about the sausage; or, shall I say, as Mr. Belloc does about Gibbon.

I.

However that may be, Cambridge does not always give us that light and leading in intellectual matters which we have a right to expect from her. The bulky co-operative History of English Literature is a mere dead weight—a vast mausoleum. As a memorial to the great dead it is as impressive as the hideous mortuary sculpture in the Abbey. And now we have Cambridge Essays on Education (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d., net) on similar co-operative lines, and equally futile, if not so preposterously dull. It is made up of eleven essays, edited by Mr. A. C. Benson, who is not remarkable for breadth of thought, and it is introduced by the amiable and fussy publicist, Lord Bryce. The object of the book is to restate and enforce by argument sound principles in relation to education. And in view of this laudable design it is curious to note that elementary or democratic education is quietly passed over. If here or there it happens to be mentioned it is nowhere discussed. When we consider that 80 per cent. of the democratic educative material of the country passes through the elementary mill, we wonder at the fatuity of Mr. Benson in not inviting a specialist to give us his views on this side of the subject. But education for Mr. Benson and many others simply means public school education—the training fitted to turn out good bureaucrats and "vocal," not thinking journalists and politicians. Then too, strangely enough, Mr. Benson, from his masculine point of view, seems to think that women have no need of education; at any rate, he has forgotten to ask a woman to write on the principles underlying the education of her sex. There is an essay by the Master of Mill Hill School on education as a preparation for practical life for which women have shown, as we might have expected, pre-eminent aptitude. Yet you may search in vain for the slightest hint that the services of women, practical or intellectual, are of any importance whatever. Can any man in his right senses wonder at the feminist movement when intelligent men are so stupidly highhanded?

The fault lies less with the writers of the different essays than with the editor who invited them to instruct us on certain subjects. It was for him to provide and see that every side of the subject should be discussed. But Mr. Benson is merely an amiable man-of-letters with a charming style, and a little practice in one branch of education. He is the last man we should have asked to bring together a collection of essays on the principles of education. Then, again, co-operation does not make for breadth and poise of ideas. It is questionable if any one of the writers would have ignored two important aspects of the subject if he had had to cover the whole ground himself. The title of the book, if not a misnomer, it is certainly misleading. We are led to expect a complete survey, and are put off with a sectional one.

II.

But I would not have the reader assume from my depreciation of the volume as a whole, that it is not good in parts. It is both very bad and very good; and some of the most stupid and some of the wisest things are said by parsons. The Master of Wellington School writes on the subject of "Religion at School." Now, the healthy school-boy is, by nature, non-religious. He is inclined to associate religion with sneaks and prigs. If chapels are compulsory he attends, of course; and habits once formed may last throughout life. But mere acquiescence in the national form of religion is in itself a dubious blessing. It makes for hypocrisy; or, at least, indicates easy-going pragmatism, which sets truth below utility. Mr. Vaughan believes in compulsory attendance. He also insists on the moral effect and religious value of confirmation at school, which he thinks will last on through life. It may, in some cases; but I doubt if these particular boys would have been any the worse if they had not been confirmed at school. On the other hand, I have known many boys on whom it had no effect.

No doubt I may be told that the teaching is at fault. "How seldom," the writer says, "does a Christian education teach one anything worth knowing about Christianity?" He then goes on to desiderate the qualities of an effective teacher of the national religion. He must be as broadminded as he is devout. He must assimilate the ideas of Harnack and Inge on the philosophy and history of religion; and, I suppose, must face the more disturbing criticism of Professor Drews and Mr. J. M. Robertson. But he will treat, if not the Old Testament, at least the New Testament, with becoming reverence. Of course, he will not try to drag his pupils to the point to which these books have brought him after years of study—that would not be a wise economy of truth. But what if one or two pupils of a more inquiring turn of mind should bring back with them some of the R.P.A. cheap reprints which they may have heard their parents and friends discuss? What a deep impression will be left on the mind of a boy who finds that his religious and moral guide has been hiding the truth from fear of its consequences, and supporting doctrines and facts in which he no longer believed. The ideal of religious education for Mr. Vaughan is that the boy should know in his heart (not in his head, which has nothing to do with religion) the meaning of the mysterious terms Incarnation, Atonement, Resurrection. And this heart-knowledge will no doubt save him from scepticism when, later on in life, he finds that these cardinal facts of Christianity are either rejected or symbolized by the more intelligent, if less logical, of the supporters of Christianity.

As to the inculcation of the so-called Christian virtues of truthfulness, temperance, chastity, courtesy, I venture to think that a Rationalist with the moral fervour of Mr. F. J. Gould would do more in six months with ordinary tractable material, the average decent-natured boy, than the parsons would in six years.

III.

I do not wish to give the impression that all the essays in the volume are as nugatory as the one on "Religion in the School." There are at least two that are a pleasure to read. Dean Inge is always interesting because he always allows himself a freedom of thought which is noticeably piquant as coming from a parson. He writes on "The Training of the Reason." The aim of education, he says, "is the knowledge, not of facts, but of values. Values are facts apprehended in their relation to each other and to ourselves. The wise man is he who knows the relative value of things. In this knowledge, and in the use made of it, is summed up the whole conduct of life." He points out that we English gave too much importance to common sense, and that in all classes there is a profound distrust of ideas, often "amounting to what Plato called 'misologia,' hatred of reason. An Englishman, as Bishop Creighton said, not only has no ideas, he hates an idea when he meets one. We discount the opinion of a man who bases his judgment on first principles." We are not a quick-witted race, and if our actions are, in the main, on the side of rectitude, it is more by instinct than thought.

"Recent philosophy," he tells us, in a witty passage,— > has encouraged these advocates of common sense, who have long been pragmatists without knowing it, to profess their faith without shame. Intellect has been disparaged and instinct has been exalted. Intuition is a safer guide than reason, we are told, for intuition goes straight to the heart of a situation, and has already acted while reason is debating. Much of this new philosophy is a kind of higher obscurantism; the man in the street applauds Bergson and William James because he dislikes science and logic, and values will, courage, and sentiment. He used to be fond of repeating that Waterloo was won on the playing fields of our public schools, until it was painfully obvious that Colenso and Spion Kop was lost in the same place. We have muddled through so often that we have come half to believe in a providence which watches over unintelligent virtue. "Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever," we have said to Britannia. So we have acquiesced in being the worst educated people west of the Slav frontier.

This surely is as well said as it is worth saying, and Dean Inge is equally wise when he says of the Englishman's call of "duty" that it is an empty ideal until we know what our duty is. He notes the confusion of means and ends implied in irrational accumulation, and the unhealthy reaction of the so-called practical man on educational ideals. Wisdom, he assures us, must be sought for its own sake, or we shall not find it. The trained reason is disinterested and fearless. He is dead against the examination system, with its dependence on the memory, which has been "called the most worthless of our mental powers." The importance of a good curriculum, he thinks, is exaggerated. It matters less what a boy learns than how he is taught. He would have him trained in two branches, science and humanism; and it is a sign of more intelligent ideals of education that he insists that the Greek and Latin should be read in mass in translations. In fine, the essay is packed full of ideas. It is a genuine contribution to educational thought.

IV.

If Dean Inge's attitude is refreshingly rational, Professor Bateson's is outspokenly rationalistic. His essay on the place of science in education goes to the root of the matter. Some of the things he says will startle the official educationist. He holds that many men are congenitally unscientific; they form the section from which are drawn the heads of government, temporal and spiritual—the lawyers, administrators, and politicians. To force science upon them would not alter their cast of mind in any way, this intellectual type being vocal rather than rational. We remember the foolish blunder a Home Secretary made over glycerine some while ago, and only lately the Bishop of London said that Nature helped him to believe in God, basing his belief on the fact that we are not "blown off" the earth as it rushes through space, and "declaring that that catastrophe had been averted by 'Someone's' wrapping twenty miles of atmosphere round the planet."

"Does anyone think," says Professor Bateson,— > that the Bishop's slip was due to want of scientific teaching at Marlborough.....I would rather suppose that such sublunary problems had not interested him in the least, and that he no more cared how we happen to stick on the earth's surface than St. Paul cared how a grain of wheat germinates beneath it, when he similarly was betrayed into an unfortunate illustration.

Professor Bateson's suggestion—and in my opinion a wise one—is that every boy should be taught science in such a way as to confirm his scientific bias, if he has one; if he is congenitally unscientific, the fact will soon show itself, and he can be trained for one of the "vocal" professions, the basis of which is a more or less pragmatic compromise. He may become a light in the Church, in politics, law, or journalism, where ideas do not count for much, but he will be out of his element in science.

Professor Bateson has a righteous contempt for the humanists (often parsons) who are fond of telling us that science is vulgarly utilitarian—that it does not work in the sphere of ideas. "The splendid purpose which science serves," he says, "is the inculcation of principle and balance, not facts." The man of science to-day is as much opposed to religion, with its apocryphal glosses of evidential truth, as was Huxley to revelation. And "were Huxley here he would treat Bergson and his allies with the same scorn and contumely that he meted out to the Bishop of Oxford." "Agnosticism," he goes on, "is the very life and mainspring of science." We must believe nothing under compulsion. The whole essay is a proof of the value of ideas based on Rationalism the lead of which is followed with unwavering courage.

The other essays, which discuss the places of Literature, Athletics, Citizenship, Leisure in Education, do not call for any special comment. They say many things with which one agrees, but do not break new ground. They do not compare with the outspoken work to which I have given prominence.

BIOLOGY AND GOD.

To the Editor of the "Freethinker."

Sir,—You have before now received letters asking for advice with regard to books which would be useful to the student of Freethought. On one or two occasions lists of books have been given in our beloved paper. Will you permit me to draw attention to a small introductory work on Biology, which I have found to be both interesting and instructive? It is Biology, by W. D. Henderson, M.A., B.Sc (Jack's "The People's Books," 7d.). The above-mentioned work contains so much compressed writing, in its eighty odd pages, that I think the Freethinker who takes a non-expert interest in Biology would do well to read it. This subject being the Science of Life, it is one of the most important spheres of study to the modern Freethinker. And who is the Freethinker who does not wish to know something of the scope and method of Biology?

In his "Introduction," Mr. Henderson maps out the field of biological study, pointing out "that Biology does not concern itself with the particular kinds of plants and animals; that is the aim of the special sciences of Botany and Zoology, but it has to answer questions dealing with the form and structure of living things, with their activities, their origin, and the factors in their evolution" (p. 9).

The work contains chapters on "The Origin of Life," "Cell Division," "Sensitivity in Plants and Animals," "Response to Certain Stimuli on Plants and Animals," "Reproduction," "The Struggle for Existence," and "Heredity." Of all these I cannot write now, but the impression left after the reading of the book, which is written only from the standpoint of a scientist, is that Biology is on the side of a Naturalist philosophy of the universe—if the reader be not of a biased mind. Without being dogmatic on the subject, the author sums up the modern biological position relative to the "Origin of Life":—

> Looking now at the evolution of living matter by the light which is shed upon it by the evolution of matter in general, there must have been a gradual process of change from material which was lifeless to material which has all the characteristics of what we call living matter. Now this gradually evolved material may have been in the form of minute ultra-microscopic particles, and so no traces of it are found in the geological record (p. 12).

This last sentence should be well kept in mind. The chapter on "The Criteria of Life" impresses upon us the difficulty of drawing a strict line of demarcation between the living and the non-living. While the chapter in which the evolution of the single-celled forms of life to the multi-cellular organism is outlined, causes us to reflect—if step by step we can trace the connection between lowly forms of life and the most complex forms, why should it not be possible for the lowest forms, to have developed from non-living forms of matter? But I must leave the reader to his own reflections, and close with the following quotation, which will give food for thought on the struggle for existence:—

> If anyone doubts the reality of this struggle, let him take a brief glance at the various forms of animals. Throughout the world there is a superabundance of weapons and of armour. From the simplest forms with their offensive threads we pass to the stings of insects, the large pincers of crabs and lobsters, the teeth of sharks, the horns and hoofs and fangs of mammals. With armour it is just the same; thus we have the shells of crabs and molluscs, the scales of fishes and of reptiles, and the hair and feathers of mammals and birds (p. 74).

What agents for the expression of divine love!

WHY A CLERGYMAN?

Sir,—I am an Atheist, father of ten children, eight of whom are living. I have tried to give them a good education, also tried to teach them the duties of being truthful and honest to others; in fact, I have done my best to make them, as they became men and women, fit citizens of the country. I find that they have to suffer for the supposed sins of their father, as witness the following: In response to an invitation from a large Tyneside firm a daughter of mine presented herself recently for a test examination for a clerkship. On the form she had to fill up was a request that she must give names of at least two persons of whom inquiry might be made as to character, etc. To this no sensible person could object.

But, mark, one must be a clergyman! Think of it! In this country where one hears such blessed words as Freedom, Toleration, and Equality, I, an Atheist, must go to a clergyman begging a favour of him, or otherwise my children will be punished. Well, my girl went through with the work set down for examination in spite of the fact that she was unable to give more than one person's name for reference. Until now she has not heard anything from the firm; of course, she may not have satisfied them as to her efficiency, but I expect that the clergyman's name being omitted has prejudiced her case. If such has been the fact, is it not intolerable that such a thing should take place at the present day, especially when we are boasting so much about freedom? It seems hard that after keeping them at school beyond the age when they could leave, my daughter is nearly sixteen years of age and still going to school, and I have paid a large fee to get her into a Higher Grade School, she has attended private classes in the evenings, all of which means a sacrifice. In conclusion, let me say my object in writing is to draw the attention of the public to the above facts, in the belief that any fair-minded person who has any such condition attached to the employment of anyone beginning their apprenticeship, will at least give them a chance to choose whom they may select for references, instead of a hard and fast line as in the present case.

Justice.

EXISTENCE OF GOD.

Sir,—I quite agree with "Freethinker's" suggestion in your last number as to adopting the measure, in discussions with Christians, of first asking them to define their idea of God.

"Freethinker's" friend gave the definition—"the spirit of goodness," etc.—and "Freethinker" says that we scarcely disagree with this.

May I be allowed to point out that the expression used is ambiguous? It may mean the idea (or ideal) of goodness, as it may mean the spirit (or spiritual being) with the attribute of goodness. From the account given, it is obvious that "Freethinker's" friend used it in the latter sense, and in that sense we do disagree.

Society News.

South London Branch N.S.S.—It will be seen from our list of to-day's meetings that a debate will take place at the Trade Union Hall, 30 Brixton Road (near Kennington Road Tube Station). The subject is, "That Modern Secularism is Useless as an Instrument of Social Reform." Mr. F. Vickers, a well-known South London Socialist, will open in the affirmative, and Mr. P. S. Wilde will oppose. The question is of current interest, and a good attendance is being anticipated, as the moon will not be favourable for a hostile air-raid. The Annual Meeting of the Branch will be held on Wednesday, March 6, at 8, at the above hall.—W. Hanmer Owen, Hon. Sec.

West Central Hall (London).—Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's excellent lecture was received with much applause, and followed by a good discussion. This is the final lecture of the series, as we are unable to obtain the hall for next month, much to our regret.—E. M. Vance, Gen. Sec.

North London Branch N. S. S.—Miss Boyle is always inspiring and stimulating, and, in spite of the ever-dreaded air-raids, a fair audience enjoyed her lecture on Sunday evening. To-day, Mr. Joad, of the Fabian Society, pays us his second visit. We expect a brisk discussion, and hope North Londoners will attend in full force.

Nuneaton Branch N.S.S.—Mr. T. F. Palmer delivered two greatly appreciated lectures here on Sunday last. Everyone present appeared to enjoy the addresses, and there was quite a good sale of literature. Our next lecture will be on Sunday, March 10, by Mr. Willis, of Birmingham.—A. T. Johnson, Hon. Sec.

Unconscious fun is often very happy. In the Admiralty Court recently a marine witness, taking up the card on which the oath is printed began loudly, "I swear by the Admiralty God."

Rita, the well-known novelist, has published a book, entitled The Wrong End of Religion, which her publishers describe as a "slashing attack on the hypocrisy of modern religion." Although the thunder is borrowed from Freethought writers, the book should flutter the dovecotes of orthodoxy.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

Miss E. M. Vance, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable iberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

Digitized by Google

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

A Religious Revival.

It is generally agreed amongst religious writers that the last twenty-seven years of the eighteenth century, and the first twenty-five of the nineteenth, witnessed a great revival of the religious spirit in England. And there is much to justify the statement—always bearing in mind the compensating fact that it was a period during which popular Freethought also made a great advance. But limiting our survey to religious activities, we have to note that the Wesleyan revival was in full swing, and Evangelical Christianity was never so busy, nor, apparently so full of promise. That it was a period of great religious activity is undeniable. The British and Foreign Bible Society was founded in 1802, the London Missionary Society in 1800, the Religious Tract Society in 1799, the Church Missionary Society in 1796, the Mission to the Jews in 1808, the Christian Knowledge Society in 1804. And putting on one side a number of smaller societies, we have to note that Parliament voted a million for building churches in 1813, and a further half-million in 1824. Finally, between 1801 and 1831 no less than 500 churches were built. If religious activity meant increased happiness and well being, the England of the first quarter of the nineteenth century should have been an ideal place.

Religion and the People.

Now, we would like our readers to pay special regard to the intense religious activity of these years, because it has a very direct bearing on what follows. For some time we have been intending to deal with The Town Labourer, 1760-1832, by J. L. and Barbara Hammond.[1] As a study of one phase of English civilization, the importance of the book is beyond question. As a study of brutality under a gloss of morality and religion the book is profoundly interesting—even where it rouses moral nausea. It is a story of the practical enslavement of a whole class of the population, of the exploitation of young children and women in the interests of a "soulless" commercialism, and by a people who, all the time, professed the utmost concern for the religious condition of their serfs. Mr. and Mrs. Hammond lay but slight stress on the religious side of the picture, nor do they point out the way in which the Christian religion helped to perpetuate the horrors they describe. To do so would have been outside the scope of their purpose; but it is quite within ours. Indeed, our purpose in writing is to point to the conclusion that but for religion the things that Mr. and Mrs. Hammond depict would have been almost impossible of realization. And this not alone, because of the influence on those who suffered, but also because of the influence of religion on those who perpetuated the injustice. That provided the moral outlet essential to the occasion. And the moral we wish to emphasize was never more important than to-day.

The English Factory System.

Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's book covers the period during which the manufacturing power of England was organized and consolidated. The Common Lands had been taken from the people; agriculture was discouraged or deliberately obstructed in order to drive the labouring classes into the towns and to furnish material for the factories. The factory system was established, huge fortunes were made, and the commercial prosperity of England went ahead by leaps and bounds. Everything that made for greater profit seemed allowable. Says our authors: "Immense fortunes were made in cotton, wool, iron, and coal, but on the workers in these industries there fell degradation and distress.....The general feature of the times was the rise of a large class of rich employers and the creation of a large and miserable proletariat." It is, perhaps, impossible for anyone to-day to realize the full horror of the English factory system or of the conditions of labour generally a hundred years ago. Women worked long hours in factories and in mines—in the latter places with chains belted to their waists, drawing trucks of coal from the face of the seam to the bottom of the shaft. Men were poorly paid, and there were rigorous laws against any attempt at combination to raise wages or secure any change in the conditions of labour. But worst and most revolting of all was the universality and the character of child labour. Workhouse children were purchased by employers, and remained practically at their mercy. In the Macclesfield mills children under five years of age were at work. In other mills the official age was six or seven. The various parishes apprenticed their unwanted children to mill-owners at the age of seven, remaining until they were twenty-one. They were kept working from twelve to fifteen hours per day, and thrashed for offences. Their bed often consisted of a dirty blanket to lie on, and another for covering. But it is cheering to know that, against charges of cruelty, it was retorted that the children were taught to read the Bible and the New Testament, and "every attention was paid to the strict observance of the Sabbath." In the mines, children of seven were employed—underground, be it remembered; and older girls, "chained, belted, harnessed like dogs in a go-cart, saturated with wet, and more than half naked, crawling upon their hands and feet, and dragging their heavy loads behind them." Children were also employed to sweep chimneys—a practice unknown outside the British Isles. These were sent up narrow chimneys, brush in hand, and often straw lit behind them to encourage quickness of movement. Their flesh became broken, but in about six months hardened to the work. Some masters washed them once a week, others just left them alone. The boys were stunted in growth, blear-eyed from the soot, 'flapper-kneed' from climbing. Deaths were common. Yet in 1803, when a mild Bill was introduced into the House of Lords, regulating the trade, it was rejected by a House consisting of one Archbishop, five Bishops, three Dukes, five Earls, one Viscount, and ten Barons. During the existence of these complicated horrors, and the systematic slaughter of children for pure gain, the country was bristling with renewed religious activities, punishing Freethinkers for circulating Paine's writings, and fighting France for the preservation of freedom and the security of civilization.

Digitized by Google

How Religion Works.

Education during this period was at a low ebb. Churches were plentiful, and ignorance was general. In Oldham and Ashton, with a population of 105,000, there was not a single public school for poor children. As late as 1840, 40 per cent. of the men and 65 per cent. of the women could not write their own names. Where schools existed, the schcolmasters were often of the most ignorant type, "the refuse of other callings." England was, in the matter of education, behind the rest of the world. Said Dean Alford in 1839, "Switzerland is before us, Prussia is before us, France is before us." England alone left the education of the poor to charity schools and Sunday-schools. There was, however, method in the madness. It was said by one authority that education given to the poor—> would teach them to despise their lot in life, instead of making them good servants in agriculture and other laborious employments to which their rank in society had destined them.....It would enable them to read seditious pamphlets, vicious books, and publications against Christianity; it would render them insolent to their superiors.

But if education was scanty and oppression rife, at least religion was well looked after, and that atoned for much. Hannah Moore consoled the poor of one parish with the reflection that "in suffering by the scarcity you have..... the pleasure of knowing the advantage you have had over many villages in your having suffered no scarcity of religious instruction." To the women of Shipham, in 1840, she wrote that their sufferings had been "permitted by an all-wise and gracious Providence.....to show the poor how immediately dependent they are upon the rich, and to show both rich and poor that they are all dependent upon Himself." So also Wilberforce—keenly interested in the abolition of slavery, with the maintenance of which English manufacturing interests were not vitally connected—wrote, in his Practical View of the System of Christianity, that religion taught the poor to be diligent, humble, and patient, and advises them—> that their more lowly path has been allotted them by the hand of God; that it is their part faithfully to discharge its duties and contentedly to bear its inconveniences.....Having food and raiment they should be content.....that all human distinctions will soon be done away with, and the true followers of Christ will all, as children of the same Father, be alike admitted to the possession of the same heavenly inheritance.

It was not without cause that the ruling classes of a hundred people years ago dreaded the growth of Freethought. They at least had grasped the lesson that nothing would so serve their purpose as a properly taught religion. It would be well if all reformers saw that truth with equal clearness to-day.

Pietistic Activities.

Finally, our survey of the period would be incomplete if it failed to notice the activity of the authorities against Freethought. This, of course, lies outside the scope of Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's work, but its importance is great nevertheless. The influence of Paine was great, and his writings were a source of terror to the authorities. Associations were formed for their discussion, and prosecutions were numerous. Paine himself was tried and condemned in his absence. Many people, in both England and Scotland, were imprisoned or transported under various charges. It was the period of the series of Carlile prosecutions. Carlile himself spent over nine years in prison for selling the Age of Reason. One of the cases connected with Paine, noted by the authors, is decidedly humorous. In 1819 a man was arrested for selling Paine's works. He was thrown into prison, and remained there until some "respectable gentleman" wrote the Home Office pointing out that a mistake had been made. The pamphlet was against Paine—not for him. It was a peculiarly vile production, composed by Mrs. Trimmer, of the Religious Tract Society, giving a lying and repulsive picture of Paine's life and death. We happen to have a copy of this pamphlet, and we can answer for its objectionable character. The man was, of course, released. But it was, probably, the only case in connection with Paine's writings that deserved severe treatment.

There is one other, and most important, aspect of this subject with which we hope to deal next week.

Chapman Cohen.

"A People's Soul."

The Cambrian Daily Leader for February 19 contained the report of a remarkable speech which the Rev. Dr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, had just delivered at the Walter Road Congregational Church, Swansea. It was an appeal, in "moving words," to the Nonconformists of South Wales to bestir themselves and prepare for the mighty changes which the War is sure to bring about. Dr. Selbie began his address by asserting that "the spiritual side of a nation's life was the most important." Clergymen seldom open their mouths without indulging in some vague expression of that kind. Usually, by the spiritual life is meant the religious exercises in church and chapel which professing Christians are supposed to go through with unbroken regularity. Such exercises are generally described as public worship, the neglect of which is one of the chief of our national sins. We must, however, do Principal Selbie the justice of chronicling the fact that, in his estimation, the spiritual quality of man means simply his "morale." He finds many instances of this out on the battlefields. "Men who were regarded as being of but little use in the world—mere wasters—face to face with the terrible conditions out there had made good." This is doubtless true enough, and is a source of genuine rejoicing, though we utterly fail to see how it shows "the immense power of the spiritual over the material." But what does our divine understand by the term "material" as opposed to spiritual? He contends that prior to the War "there had been a preponderance of the materialistic view of things in this country"; but he is careful not to supply us with a definition of what he calls the materialistic view of life. Newspaper correspondents, like all others, have their faults; but it is quite possible that some of them are as well versed in history as the Principal himself, though their interpretation of life may be different from his. He is certainly mistaken if he imagines that so-called Materialists regard the strength of empires as resting "on material force alone." We confidently challenge him to name one accredited Materialist who can legitimately be charged with such an error. He is reported to have said:—

> The history of the Babylonian, the Roman, the Greek, the Spanish Empires demonstrated that their downfall had taken place not when they were weak, but at the moment of their greatest material power, when they had reached the acme of their strength. Suddenly they had faltered, failed, and were destroyed—when the hearts of the people had become unsound, when they were sunk in materialism and sensuality.

We do not accuse Dr. Selbie of ignorance of history but we cannot close our eyes to the fact that he distorts it to serve his own purpose of discrediting what he falsely calls Materialism. The fall of dynasties is always preceded by a decline. They do not suddenly collapse when at the zenith of their power; and both the decline and the fall of the Roman Empire, for example, occurred after it had become Christian. Long before its end came it had been, intellectually, morally, and even physically, seriously on the down grade. In consequence of climatic conditions, and the inevitable falling off in the physical qualities of men and women in consequence of inferior men becoming fathers through the absence of the physically fittest on distant battlefields. The only rational conclusion, therefore, is that the Roman Empire fell, not when it had reached the acme of its power, but when it had undergone fatal deterioration in every respect. The historians trace that gradual degeneration through many generations.

What Principal Selbie means by the soul of a nation he does not tell us, nor does he attempt to define the term "vital principles"; but he is of opinion that a nation may lose its soul, whatever it may be. Etymologically, spirit, soul, or ghost signifies wind or breath. That is the primary sense of the words, while in the secondary sense they denote the life and disposition, or character, of individuals and nations. It is clear that Dr. Selbie does not employ the word "soul" in either of those senses. He means it by "reverence for the Unseen," "spiritual powers and faculties"; and he concludes that if the British people lost their soul, as thus defined, "then, however large the Navy or Army, they would perish, and nothing could stay their fall." To the Principal, evidently, the Unseen is only another name for God, and spiritual powers and faculties are the means of communion with Heaven for the cultivation and maintenance of which the churches exist. The pious divine explains his position fully in the following passage:—

> The churches existed to worship God, to keep the soul alive. Thus was their existence justified. They were doing as great and as good a work—yes, that night in thinking of God and the things of God—as if they were actually fighting at the front. They were fighting a greater enemy than Germany or Austria. They were fighting the internal enemy of the soul of man. So long as the world continued, that fight would have to go on. Germany might be conquered, but the Devil would be unconquered still, and they would have to fight for the soul of the people.

Beyond a doubt the soul of a people is their capacity for belief in and fellowship with God, without which they cannot prosper. Such is the contention of one of the most prominent leaders of the Free Churches They all seem to believe that it is thinking of God and the things of God that makes an individual or a nation great and powerful; but the fact that stares us in the face is that God has not succeeded in persuading individuals and nations to think of him and his things with sufficient energy and ardour to make them invincibly great. The Churches have a greater enemy than Germany thirsting for their blood, and that is godlessness; and it is to fight this foe that they exist. The curious thing is that the soul of a people resides alone in the professing Christians to be found among them, and that the Christians of every age have failed to communicate it to outsiders. It is a more astonishing fact still that Germany, despite her evangelicalism and the growing orthodoxy of her churches and universities, is said, with "good reason," to have lost her soul. What that "good reason" is we are not informed, though, reading between the lines, we infer that it is her alleged responsibility for the present War.

Apparently, the main difference between Germany and Great Britain is that the former has lost her soul, while the latter is only in danger of losing hers. In both countries the Church is the army of God, and in both its mission has been a signal failure. It is only natural for Dr. Selbie to think highly of the institution whose servant he is, and upon which he is dependent for his livelihood; but there is no getting away from the fact that this God's army is the most inefficient force in the world. No great world-movement is aware of its existence, or has been affected by it in the least. The Principal tacitly admits that this is true. He says:—

> He thought that one of the greatest things that had been impressed upon the mind by the circumstances of the War was that the churches were not ends in themselves, but means to an end. Jesus Christ came into the world not to found churches but to establish the kingdom of God. The Church was set up as a means to that kingdom. The Church was not a comfortable coterie of people, but it was here on earth as a living instrument in the hands of God.

That extract puts a most cogent argument into the hand of the critic of the Church. The claim made for the War is that, somehow or other, it has brought home to the Churches the great truth that they are but means to an end, namely, the establishment upon earth of the kingdom of heaven. Assuming that the War has made such an unlikely revelation, the only possible conclusion is that the Church has come deplorably short of answering the object of its existence. Even Principal Selbie has not the timerity to assert that the kingdom of God has been set up on earth. But the Church has been a failure, not as a human institution, but as "a living instrument in the hands of God," which is tantamount to saying that God himself has failed. Does the Principal not realize that this is the only natural import of his statement? Of course, he shifts the blame from God to the instrument, saying: "It is no use crying over spilt milk." That is true by whomsoever the milk is spilt. Dr. Selbie holds the Church responsible, and observes:—

> There was among Christian people to-day a real spirit of penitence because the Church had not been able to do more. But it was far more important to ask themselves what they could do rather than sit down regretting. Repentance was not remorse. Repentance was not the headache next morning. It was a change of mind, of attitude. It was a fresh start.

In reality, however, he who needs repentance is God, not man. God ought to repent in dust and ashes, and in his case repentance should be remorse, the headache next morning, for having created a being capable of committing suicide, or endowed with a natural tendency towards that which is evil. He ought to repent, besides, for having chosen the Church as his instrument for remaking the world. It is his fault, and his alone, that what goes by the name of the kingdom of heaven is still a dreamed-of reality of the future. A well-known divine said not very long ago: "The wonder of wonders is that God has appointed us to do his work, when we know that he could have done it infinitely better without us." The truth is there's not a single scrap of evidence that there is a supernatural being in the business at all. Indeed, speaking of the child, Dr. Selbie says: "So long as there is necessity for a society such as the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, we should be modest about our Christianity." Surely, no remarks could be more opportune. Christianity has either woefully neglected or shamefully maltreated the child. It has always endeavoured to train it for heavenly rather than earthly citizenship, with the result that Christians regard themselves as strangers and pilgrims upon the earth, whose only treasure is in heaven, where their hearts should be also. What is needed is a system of education in which life here and now is the only thing that matters, and in which no supernatural dreams find a place.

Gerald Massey.

The genius that can stand alone
As the minority of one,
Or with the faithful few be found
Working and waiting till the rest come round.
—Gerald Massey.

GERALD MASSEY, poet, ethnologist, and Egyptologist, had a very interesting career. To use Browning's expressive phrase, he was "ever a fighter." He fought every day of his long life, which was prolonged beyond the usual span, and his sword was in his good, right hand until the day of his death. Massey's early life is the grimmiest of comments on the "good, old days." The son of a bargeman, he was born in the grip of poverty. At an age when more fortunate children were at school, he was working in a mill for eleven hours daily at the weekly wage of one shilling. This was not the worst. He became a straw-plaiter, and for three years lived in the black shadow of starvation, often prostrated by illness. Writing of that awful, early life of his, he said afterwards, "I had no childhood." Think of it! The author of those beautiful and tender poems, "Babe Christabel" and "The Mother's Idol Broken," "had no childhood." It is a tragedy "too deep for tears."

In spite of it all, young Massey learned to read and write, and became familiar with The Pilgrim's Progress and Robinson Crusoe. Brave, old Bunyan and "unabashed" Defoe are not bad schoolmasters for a quick, intelligent boy, for they wrote their books in two languages—in literature and in life. At fifteen years of age Massey came to London and became an errand-boy. In the great Metropolis books were procurable, and his literary appetite was voracious. He read everything he could lay his hands on; "going without meals to buy books, and without sleep to read them." What a picture of the past, the old days of storm and peril, when the soldiers of freedom arose almost every day to meet a fresh difficulty or a new danger. For Massey lived right through the heroic age of English liberty. It was during that stirring period that he laid the foundation of that encyclopædic knowledge which made him one of the noted critics and scholars of his time.

The revolutionary movements of 1848 greatly impressed Massey, and many of his verses are the direct outcome of this period of struggle. Republicanism was in the air, and he became a Republican. At twenty-one he was editing The Spirit of Freedom, a revolutionary publication, mainly written by himself. Then he contributed to Thomas Cooper's Journal, and other democratic papers. He became known, and numbered among his friends the warm-hearted Charles Kingsley, and Frederick Denison Maurice, a Christian minister, who is remembered for his denunciations of one of the chief dogmas of the religion he professed.

Massey's first book of verse was issued when he was but nineteen. Later came his Voices of Freedom, which showed a notable advance. Hepworth Dixon, of the Athenæum, was greatly attracted by the fiery and impassioned Song of a Red Republican, and recognized it as the work of a man who had something to say and could say it well. Among the admirers which Massey's early poems won for him were Landor, Ruskin, Tennyson, and Lytton. A still greater honour awaited him, for "George Eliot" made him her model for the hero of Felix Holt, which was like having his name written in gold on the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral.

It was "Babe Christabel" which made Gerald Massey famous. With this he stormed the bastions of success at one leap. Lion-hearted Landor praised it, and the author was hailed as a rising star. The following lines give some idea of the poem:—

Babe Christabel was royally born!
For when the earth was flushed with flowers,
And drenched with beauty in sun showers,
She came through golden gates of morn.

The tenderness and grace of this poem are in direct contrast with the stirring music of his political songs, which recalls the effects of sonorous metal blowing martial sounds. The Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny roused the poet, and he never sang so finely as in his War Waits, a volume which is well worth reprinting. He was never so near being a great poet. Despite his limitations, Massey was a real singer, and his verses came straight from his heart, and are charged with passion. There is the true lyrical note, and he sang to a richer music in a clearer tongue than many of his contemporaries. One of his poems, "Scarlett's Three Hundred," indeed, challenges comparison with Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade."

In the maturity of his powers, Gerald Massey deliberately put aside the laurel wreath, and devoted himself to the nobler work of the emancipation of his fellows. He turned away from verse writing and put all his energies to a scholarly and philosophic exposure of the greatest religious fraud of all the ages. His books, The Book of Beginnings, The Natural Genesis, Ancient Egypt; the Light of the World, have had to be reckoned with. For Massey shows that the holy mother and child—the one a virgin, the other a god—were worshipped in Egypt many centuries before the Christian era. It was there that all the dogmas of early Christianity, and all its myths and legends, were manufactured. In a pregnant passage in The Natural Genesis, Massey says:—

> The writer has not only shown that the current theology is, but also how it has been, falsely founded on a misinterpretation of mythology by unconsciously inheriting the leavings of primitive or archaic man and ignorantly mistaking these for divine revelations.

It was not an easy task that the poet-scholar had imposed upon himself. In the noble dedicatory verses to The Natural Genesis he shows, with rare pathos, the isolation of a scholar's life. He compares himself to a diver whose friends watch anxiously for his return:—

Year after year went by,
And watchers wondered when
The diver to their welcoming cry
Of joy, would rise again.

And still rolled on Time's wave,
That shortened as it passed;
The ground is getting toward the grave
That I have reached at last.

Child after child would say—
"Ah! when his work is done,
Father will come with us and play"—
'Tis done. And playtime's gone.

A willing slave for years,
I strove to set men free;
Mine were the labours, hopes, and fears,
Be theirs the victory.

When George William Foote was in Holloway Gaol for "bringing the Holy Scripture and the Christian religion into disbelief and contempt," Massey wrote to Dr. Aveling and, referring to Foote, said, "I fight the same battle as himself, although with a somewhat different weapon." Massey wished clearly to be reckoned as a fellow-soldier in the Liberation War of Humanity. Yet, at his death, the "glorious free press of England" concealed the fact that the scholar-poet was a Freethinker. One specially "Liberal" paper proudly claimed him as a "Christian Socialist." The plain truth is, that Massey spent half of a very lengthy life in showing the mythical nature of the Christian superstition. And he did wisely. The instinct of Massey's maturity, which led him to forsake poetry for Freethought, was a perfectly sound one. His poetry largely belongs to the past, but his scholarly criticism of Christianity has helped, materially, to hasten the dawn of Freedom.

The Last Day.

A Vision of Judgment.

That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away.

Whether I believed or disbelieved, I cannot quite remember, but I used to imagine it fearfully enough. The picture must have been early engraven on the mind, for I cannot recall a time when it did not appear, more or less vividly, far or near, in the vista of childish psychology. I can see it still when I choose. It was very grand in its way. The Lord of Hosts, like a great military commander, had made his headquarters at the end of a green and rocky valley. The valley is verdant, the dear old rocks are vivid still, because mundane and familiar, perhaps; all else is vague, but omnipresent—celestial messengers going and coming, fiery aerial chariots, seraphim with swords of flame, and, browsing somewhere, all the horned and hydra-headed menagerie of the Apocalypse; the angels and the vials of wrath, lit in the baleful glare of subterranean fires; all the quick and the dead from our bucolic neighbourhood, from hamlet and cemetery, the halt and the blind, hurrying to be damned! It was the last great assize, the ultimate court-martial. The Crown Prince was on his way, somewhere between Jupiter and the moon, as foretold in the line, "Lo, He comes, in clouds descending," but this time coming to condemn; militant at last, and mighty, as "So spake the Son, and into terror changed his countenance." The celestial Kaiser ought, also, to have been clothed in "fear and majesty," but was merely a vague, indefinable Presence. Poor devils—I mean of earth—on whom the rocks of calamity had been falling all their lives, were on their knees, calling to those dear old rocks to complete their destruction, and hide them from the awful gaze of "Deity offended." Had my dream been more realistic, and not merely idyllic and picturesque, what nameless myriads would have surrounded the throne! One could not have seen the play for the actors. As it was, it was merely a kind of Mauchline Holy Fair. I have often thought of Ingersoll standing there, smiling, candid, courageous, giving God a "red face," heaping coals of fire on the almighty head by telling him that he passed most of his life on earth strenuously defending the divine reputation; but who, according to the Code, would have been hurried off and directed hellward, according to the formula, "Depart from me, ye accursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels." Poor Ingersoll! Poor Bradlaugh, Foote, and Cohen! Alas, poor me!.....

As a matter of fact, every day is the Last Day—the past for the pleasures of memory, the future for the pleasures of hope. The present moment is the life of man. So I thought as I sighed to-night, as I saw the day die out of the sky. "Be ye also ready, for at what hour ye know not the Son of man cometh." This is good counsel, but it should be "at what hour the Son of man goeth." It was the counsel of a secular sage that we should have all our affairs in order, as if we expected every day to be going out of the world. And the lugubrious Doctor Young, of the Night Thoughts, rather grandly advises:—

Be wise to-day, 'tis madness to defer,
Next day the fatal precedent will plead.

. . . . .

Procrastination is the thief of time,
Year after year it steals, till all are fled,
And to the mercies of a moment leaves
The vast concerns of an eternal scene!

The scene before concerned the sombre theologian. What he leaves behind is the concern of the good Freethinker. And that, if not so "vast," is of infinitely greater importance. All down the ages the imaginary has obscured the actual and clamant issues of life. The fiction has fettered the fact. A pale ghostly vampire and "palpably nugatory" supernatural has sucked the blood from an otherwise wholesome and happy natural. And the end is not yet. Contrary to report the Devil is not dead—at least the story of his demise has been greatly exaggerated. He is lurking still in ignorant and simple skulls, and has lodged there so long he has become one of the family. His landlord, indeed, is quite proud of him, and would defend him to the last gasp of his last day. Although a creature of lurid light, the Devil's guest chamber is always kept dark. To light the room is to lose the lodger. No one is more careful than the clergy to keep the shutters up. And no wonder, for so long as there are devils to exorcize the exorcist, will never be out of a job. And when the remuneration for this kind of work runs from £300 to £15,000 a year, only that bigoted consistency, which is the bugbear of little minds, could reasonably look for the last Devil till the Last Day.

Those winter sunsets are wonderful. Again, it is the last hour of the last day. The scene is simple but sublime. There is a great lofty wall of misty drab-grey cloud piled round the S.W. (seaward) horizon. The red sun passing behind peers for a moment in a crevice. In the pale yellow skies above a large "gold fish," or rather, crimson cloud is floating, with other "minnows" hovering near, all steeped in solemn, quiet, crimson, fire; all merged at length in the grey battlement of cloud; so the shadows fall, and the night wind croons its eerie monotone.

Andrew Millar.

It is easy to say that opinion cannot be coerced. But this is true only of the small minority of mankind who are in the habit of thinking for themselves; and, secondly, if it were true, it would only show that, in some cases, persecution is too late to be effectual.—Sir F. Pollock.

Richard Wagner.

In writing for some sections of the public at the present time, it would, I suppose, be impossible without an apology, and difficult even with an apology, to devote an article to Wagner. For some people, it would appear, the guilt of the present German rulers extends, by some mysterious logic, to the whole German race, past as well as present; and a German musician, though he died as long ago as 1883, is in some way responsible for the crimes of the Prussian war-lords a generation after his death—on the same principle, perhaps, as the infant born yesterday is held by Christian theologians to be a partaker in the mythical peccadillo of Adam and Eve. I shall pay the readers of the Freethinker the compliment of refusing to offer any such apology. I take for granted that those who read this are Rationalists; that they hold, as I do, that a criminal action brands the doer, not the children or ancestors of the doer; and that they are as willing to recognize the genius and appreciate the masterpieces of Richard Wagner as if this present deadly conflict were not raging between his nation and ours. For my part, it will be one of my bitterest reproaches against the authors of this War that, thanks to them, we in England are likely to be debarred for many years to come from hearing and enjoying the greatest of those masterpieces.

Richard Wagner was born in Saxony in 1813, and in his early life developed two enthusiasms, one untiring and permanent, for the art of music, the other unstable and soon spent, for revolutionary politics. On the latter I touch here on account of its natural interest to us as Freethinkers, and of the influence it had on Wagner's work. In 1843 Wagner became musical conductor to the court at Dresden, and during his tenure of that office wrote and composed Tannhauser and Lohengrin. 1848 was "the year of revolutions." In 1849 there was an abortive revolution in Dresden, in which Wagner took part, and for which he had to fly into exile. In this exile he wrote the libretto of his greatest work, The Ring of the Nibelung, in which the influence of his revolutionary enthusiasm is clearly visible. That enthusiasm, however, did not long survive disappointment, and in 1854 Wagner became a convert to the pessimist philosophy of Schopenhauer. The next ten years were a period of wandering and failure, during which Wagner wrote the words of Tristan and Isolde and The Master Singers, and composed the music of the former, but could not get it performed. In 1864 the eccentric king of Bavaria extended his patronage to the composer, who was thereby enabled to produce Tristan, finish The Master Singers and The Ring, and end his life in the sunshine of royal favour. As might be expected, the effect on Wagner's genius was decidedly reactionary. His later music, that of the last part of The Ring and of Parsifal, is as superb as his earlier; but we miss in Parsifal (as Nietzsche missed in it) the defiant, revolutionary Freethought that inspired The Ring, and we regret that the revolutionist of 1849 should have ended by wallowing in morbid mysticism for the edification of the Catholic court of Munich.

It is tempting to draw a comparison between Wagner in the world of music and Swinburne in the world of poetry. Both had something of the same greatness and the same infirmity. Both were daring innovators in the technique of their respective arts, and with wondrous results; both lead themselves to weak imitation and to parody. Both first became known as fearless singers of liberty and revolution; both exhausted their enthusiasm in middle life, and ended up as reactionaries.

Wagner's most popular work in England, though by no means his greatest, has, undoubtedly, been Tannhauser. For most music-lovers, I suppose, this opera has served as their introduction to his work. I shall always look back on my first hearing its gorgeous overture as a decisive turning-point in my musical taste, which, in one day, revealed to me something greater than I had ever before known. It is a commonplace to sum up the theme of Tannhauser as the theme of "sacred and profane love." Yes; but with what a difference! Wagner does not preach or moralize (it was hardly in his character); he simply states both sides. And in what a wonder-language he states them! No one can say that he does not give the flesh its due; and yet he brings out the spirit triumphant. What listener does not feel a thrill when, in the overture, after the severe theme of the pilgrims' chorus has been stated and worked up, one weird chord translates us, unwarned, into the forbidden realm of Venus? How the music whirls us on through one mazy theme after another, till the whole orchestra peals out Tannhauser's triumphant praise of the goddess! We are reminded that Swinburne made his name by similar audacity:—

> What ailed us, O gods, to desert you
> For creeds that refuse and restrain?
> Come down and redeem us from virtue,
> Our Lady of Pain.

From this climax Wagner leads us back with a genius only equalled by that with which he led us up to it. I confess I have never liked the so-called "Paris" version of the overture, which carries us straight into the first scene of the opera without solving the antithesis. Wagner's first conception was better. I prefer to hear the slow notes of the pilgrims' chorus gradually making themselves heard through the bacchanalia, and persevering till they emerge victorious, supported, but not drowned, by "the pulses of life, that throb and leap for joy in this song of salvation."

Tannhauser is an excellent introduction to Wagner; but he does not know Wagner whose studies end there. I must pass over The Master Singers, that wonderful mosaic of melody, which I am afraid it will be long, long before we are able to hear again on British soil. The same, I suppose, applies to The Ring. The Ring, a music-drama consisting of four parts—"The Rhine Gold," "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried," and "The Twilight of the Gods"—is the work in which Wagner gave to the world his best message, the message of Freethought and emancipation of the individual. Nothing could be further than this from the Moloch of Prussianism which has since claimed the worship of his countrymen, of which some ridiculously see in him a precursor. He casts his iconoclastic thesis into the mould of old northern mythology—the same mythology which William Morris presents to us in his noble poem of "Sigurd the Volsung." Wagner's drama tells how the supreme god Wotan, to stave off his inevitable overthrow, built him a mighty castle, and was constrained to pay the builders of it with the accursed ring, which the evil dwarf Alberich had stolen from the daughters of the Rhine in his lust of world-dominion. It tells how the god went in guilty fear lest the dwarf should win again the ring and master him thereby; and how he sought to save himself by raising up a hero, Siegfried, to whom fear was unknown; and how the hero not only gained the fatal ring, but shivered the spear of Wotan, who had raised him up. And it tells how Siegfried in his turn, mazed by a treacherous draught given him by bad friends, would not give up the ring to the Rhine maidens; and how its curse rested on him, and he was murdered by his friends. And it tells how the ring was in the end restored to the Rhine, and how the castle of the gods, and they that dwelt in it, and the old world of oppression which they ruled, were burnt with fire and passed away. You can read this allegory as you like: I know how I read it.

And the music! Never again, perhaps, shall we have a chance to sit, packed in the vilely uncomfortable gallery at Covent Garden, to enjoy delights which the royal box itself could not make more delightful; to wait breathless before the first bar of "The Rhine Gold," and hear the long, deep note growing out of the silence, and becoming the "nature motive" out of which that endless network of themes, which sustains the drama, is to take shape. But if we can no longer enjoy the whole on the stage, we can at least listen to priceless parts of it in the concert-hall. There is the excerpt called "The Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla," which has a sinister magnificence. Onward move the gods into their castle to the glorious music of the "Valhalla motive." Up from the distant river comes the Rhine maidens' lament, silencing for a moment the pomp of godhead. Then the procession passes on over the rainbow bridge, to the blare of trumpets and the roll of drums, like the jackboot of authority trampling upon humanity. There is, too, the piece called "Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Magic," taken from that part where the god condemns his own daughter for disobeying his unjust command, to sleep on a mountain ringed round with flame till a fearless hero shall wake her. And "fire-magic" it is! The flames flicker, leap, and blaze on the orchestra, for any novice to hear. There are few such wonderful things in music. There is, above all, the incomparable "Closing Scene" of The Twilight of the Gods, when the world's great wrong is righted, and the gods perish in the avenging flames. Here again, for the last time, we hear the great "Valhalla motive," breaking out in one key after another, in a sort of dying agony, through the leap of the flames and the glad song of the daughters of the Rhine, until the turmoil subsides and peace reigns. Wagner's conception is identical with that of Swinburne in his "Hertha":—

> Lo, winged with world's wonders,
> With miracles shod,
> With the fires of his thunders
> For raiment and rod,
> God trembles in heaven, and his angels are white with the terror of God.
> For his twilight has come on him,
> His anguish is here;
> And his spirits gaze dumb on him,
> Grown gray from his fear;
> And his hour taketh hold on him stricken, the last of his infinite year.
> Thought made him and breaks him,
> Truth slays and forgives;
> But to you, as time takes him,
> This new thing it gives,
> Even love, the beloved Republic, that feeds upon freedom and lives.

We are emerging from an age of commercialism, but there are sure signs that we are moving towards an age of humanity. The Victorians may have imagined that the world was a very pleasant place—at any rate, for the well-to-do. We are learning that it is not. There is room for improvement. And improvement will not come by thinking less about the Paradise that awaits the saints and more of the earth that was made for man.—R. B. Ince, "Globe."

A manifesto on the War has been issued by, what the Daily News styles, "Church leaders," and the document supports the idea of the League of Nations. It is, however, of interest to note that the signatures to the manifesto include, among others, the Archbishop of Canterbury, four bishops, a member of the Society of Jesus, a number of Free Churchmen, and Messrs. Arthur Henderson and George Lansbury. The document mentions, respectfully, the Pope's Appeal to the Powers, and the action of the Convocation of Canterbury. But what we should like to know is how the two Labour leaders got into such company. A democracy that remains Christian is a democracy that will always be getting there and yet never arrives.

Elim Welsh Congregational Church, Cundare, has discharged its minister, says the Aberdare Leader, for preaching that war and preparations for war are irreconcilable with the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ. When the Germans invoke Jesus to justify war they are accused of blasphemy. When a British parson says Jesus is against war he gets the "sack." Which proves how fitted Christianity is for man under all conditions.

Clergymen pretend that they are engaged in work that is on a higher plane than ordinary business, but there are exceptions. A parson advertises in a daily paper that he supplies "Commercial training for one shilling weekly." He will require a large number of pupils before his salary approaches that of the Bishop of London, to say nothing of that of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Lord Hugh Cecil declares that "Christianity presupposes the brotherhood of man." Heigho! In the Christian scheme the bad brothers outnumber the good ones.

Miss Helena Normanton, of the Women's Freedom League, pleads for the wearing of brighter colours in clothes, and a return to older forms of costume. Perhaps the lady admires the highly coloured blankets worn by the twelve disciples—in pictures.

"There is no getting away from the fact that soldiers are very superstitious," says the Pall Mall Gazette. Of course they are, otherwise this would not be a Christian country.

Sir William Robertson Nicoll says that we know our loved ones much better when they are dead than we did while they were living amongst us. He also maintains that our fellowship with the dead is purer and nobler and much more intimate than with the living. He does not mention his authority for such a statement; but, if there is any truth in it, will he be good enough to inform us why believers in personal immortality mourn for their dead much more hopelessly than unbelievers? Is it not a fact that Sir William bases his teaching upon mere belief, not upon knowledge, and that belief invariably breaks down when confronted by the grim realities of Nature?

Sir William is a sentimentalist, and not a calm, cautious reasoner. He tells mourners that Christ will comfort them if they love and trust him; but, as a matter of simple fact, Christ does nothing of the kind. We admit that there are times when the belief in Christ does minister consolation to those who are contemplating bereavement as a possibility; but when it becomes an actuality the belief collapses, and then those who have it are much worse off than those who never possessed it. It is a characteristic of Christianity that it is of absolutely no avail in the great crises of life. It can no more do away with mourning than it can prevent or put an end to a War.

a picture palace orchestra. Then complaint was made by a Cathedral dignitary of impropriety within the Cathedral precincts. The Chief Constable took up the challenge, and the sequel was forthcoming in the Police Court on Thursday of this week, when, strangely enough, almost the first man to be dealt with by the police was ——, the sub-sacrist of the Cathedral, and a well-known Y.M.C.A. worker."—Norwich Mercury, February 16.

According to Truth, the Russian Church is immensely wealthy, and the convent Churches are full of splendid tombs and rich shrines, lavishly adorned with gold, diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. No wonder the Patriarch of Russia has cursed the Bolshevists because they have deprived the priesthood of its property and privileges.

Dr. William S. Bruce, the well-known traveller and explorer, advocates the use of whale flesh as an article of diet, and says that whales are canned in America. What a change from the time when a business-like whale "canned" the prophet Jonah?

What noses the clergy have for nastiness! The Bishop of London raised a discussion on prostitution at the House of Convocation, and at a meeting in London to consider the question of Army morals, the speakers included Dr. Orchard and Miss Maude Royden, the assistant minister at the City Temple.

A religious contemporary complains that few people are converted after they are thirty years of age, and calls it a "saddening fact." It also notes that twelve, sixteen, and twenty are the fruitful ages for conversion, and professes inability to explain the phenomenon. We think we can explain it in a sentence. It is simply the exploitation of adolescence.

The Life of Christ is to appear on the film. The Bishop of London, Cardinal Bourne, and F. B. Meyer are among those who guarantee its "reverential treatment"; so the pious may go to the "pictures" with safety. But by a greasy hypocrisy that seems inseparable from English Christianity, the title of the film is "Christus." Why not Jesus Christ? Perhaps it is thought that English Christianity wouldn't stand it. But the device is so English! It is like the English Christian letting himself go on the Continent under the pretence of conducting a moral investigation, or some of our clergy wading neck deep in filth and persuading themselves that they are animated by a desire to improve public morality.

Writing in the Daily News, the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell quotes the bitter saying: "I forgive him as a Christian, which means that I do not forgive him at all."

Professor Scott Lang, of St. Andrew's University, speaking before the Perth Presbytery, said that: "In the whole Church the average contribution per member for the year was a halfpenny per Sunday, and even that was an overestimate." The inference is that the work of the Church is of small interest even to believers.

At Newport Pagnell, the Revs. W. Rice and W. L. Eaton were each fined £3 for infringements of the motoring order. Apparently religion does not always make for good citizenship.

This month, in the presence of the Pope, the decree of the beatification of Oliver Plunkett, a former Archbishop of Armagh, will be read. In these strenuous days is it not like children playing with dolls in a nursery?

Prebendary A. W. T. Perowne says that one proof of the failure of the Church is that the men in the Army don't understand what the Church stands for. We don't think that is quite correct. The trouble—to the Church—is that the men are beginning to understand what it stands for. They don't believe in what it says it stands for. But that is quite a different thing.

Dean Inge advises all whom it concerns that it is quite right to pray, but we have no right to expect that our prayers will be answered. Therefore "we must not expect that the prayers which we offer for dear ones in danger and for the restoration of peace would at once be answered." The plain English of which is that prayers may be offered, but answers will not be given. That is precisely our own counsel. Only we wonder how people will pray, knowing that they might as well try to ward off an air-raid by playing a concertina.

Erasmus once said that the Bible was a nose of wax, which could be twisted any way that suited. The Church Times realizes this, and has been girding at pious folk who quote Biblical texts against war and monarchy, and upset the religion of simple men. There is little doubt of the simplicity of religious persons, but Freethinkers will be amused at the spectacle of the engineer being "hoist with his own petard."

A newspaper paragraph had the attractive headline, "Bishop and a Tank." It did not relate to a deed of heroism, for it recorded that the Bishop of Peterborough was to speak from a tank in the quiet surroundings of the cathedral town.

The Salvation Army's bold advertisements in the press of its "Self-Denial Week" show that this organization is getting respectable, and can now command large sums of money for purely advertising purposes. The results of Salvation Army work are immensely exaggerated. Salvationists have all to be teetotalers. What effect has that on the national drink-bill? Salvationists have all to be non-smokers. What effect has that upon the tobacco trade? The Army boasts that it takes religion into the slums. And the slums are no better for it. The Salvation Army's motto is "Blood and Fire"; the blood of Christ and the fire of hell. This is plain Bible teaching; this is Christianity.

"E. A. F.," in the Daily Mail, raises a protest against schoolboys being allowed to spend their money on food, but being asked to "disgorge" for church bazaars and missionary work. The protest seems to apply to adults no less than to children. If economy is really a vital need for the country, it would be only the proper thing to withdraw contributions from church and missionary work, the latter of which is certainly the most useless service to which one can put money.

Mr. T. Vivian Rees, addressing a Conference of Sunday-school officers, said that "The pettiness and stupidity one came across at times in Sunday-schools are tragic, criminal and devilish. Some of the schools were slaughter-houses for human souls." But the slaughter is inseparable from the system. Their purpose is to prepare the "lambs" for shearing by the time they become fully-grown sheep.

Pilate.

A Sonnet-Problem for Christians.

Dear Christian friends who love your enemies
More than the tongue of man can ever tell,
And loving thus much, sentence those to hell
Whose faith from yours by hairbreadths disagrees,
Whilst lately sitting 'midst your devotees
I chanced to speak of Pilate, and there fell
From someone's lips—your looks approved him well—
The one word "Coward!" Now I think I seize Your meaning; but suppose awhile that he Had liberated Christ because he showed
No fault, and all the horror of that cross
Set up for sinners on sad Calvary
Had never been, nor had his blood outflowed
For all your sins. Would that be gain or loss?

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

E. F. BROWNE.—The matter is common knowledge with all who know anything about pre-revolutionary Russia. But we give you the following from The Russian Jews, by L. Errera, published by David Nutt: "The right of residence in every city of Russia is granted to prostitutes who are provided with a yellow card for this purpose. This imfamous passport has more than once been solicited by respectable Jewesses, desirous of being enabled to penetrate into certain great cities in which they are not permitted to dwell.....A young girl came to Moscow to learn shorthand. She demanded and obtained the yellow card; but after a time the police expelled her, because they discovered after watching her, that she refrained from following her assumed trade" (pp. 27-8).

C. F. BUDGE.—We cannot say whether it is true or not. Should like confirmation.

H. M. DABALL.—We do not confine the question of God to the deity taught by Jesus. Our survey includes all religions, but we are unable to detect substantial differences between the gods of the leading faiths.

PTE. W. WALDEN.—We are sending a parcel of literature, free, to the soldier's address given. Thanks for your offer to provide a copy of the Freethinker weekly in the reading-room. We hope it will be accepted.

J. G. HOWARTH.—Literature is being sent. Thanks.

WE inadvertently last week gave the publishers of Mr. Clodd's book on Spiritualism, The Question, as Methuen. The book is published by Grant Richards.

R. W. BLAKELEY.—Probably some injustice is done to Professor Alexander by the compression of his argument. It is, however, a pity that people so play with the word "God," which is bound to mislead, because it has a fairly fixed connotation in the general mind.

G. PROCTOR.—Ivor Tucker's Evidence for the Supernatural and Edward Clodd's The Question would probably give you what you want.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—G. S., 2s. 6d.

J. G. BUCKLE.—Thanks for copy of letter, which we have read with interest and appreciation.

J. EFFEL.—Thanks for portraits. We hope their future will realize all that their faces promise. Please do as you suggest.

O. A. PENSIONER.—We do not know anything of "a well-known Atheist lecturer" named Musgrave Reade. A person of that name was, we believe, a member of the Manchester Branch many years ago, and he or his friends appear to have been exploiting his connection with the Society. A well-known Atheist lecturer is pure imagination.

MERANDER.—Next week.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We have to thank many correspondents who have written concerning "Our 'Round Up'" in last week's issue. These communications prove that what we ask for is being done, and with success. Meanwhile, we may note that paper gets scarcer and dearer month by month. Even the paper we printed on last week, and of which we hold about another four weeks' supply, represents a twenty-five per cent. increase on last year's prices. The new Paper Order also cuts down the supply of imported paper-making material to half that of last year, and as the War seems to be settling down to a permanent institution, the outlook is not very cheering. All we can say is that we shall avoid making any change so long as it is possible to do so. How long this will be must depend upon circumstances.

The following communications have reached us regarding our notes of three weeks ago on compulsory religious service in the Army. One comes from the Army and the other from the Navy. We take the Navy first. It is written from one of our chief naval bases:—

> I was very pleased to read your very pointed article in the Freethinker on Compulsory Army Church Parade. Your remarks apply equally to the Navy There is more profane language over this order for Sunday Church than over any other order we may get. It is altogether inconsistent is this forced religion. A very big church has now been added to the Naval Base, and by compulsory means it is over-packed for the morning service. An evening service is also held, to which all are welcome. On Sunday, February 4, I happened to pass whilst all was in motion. The congregation consisted of eight sea scouts (boys) and four naval ratings. Comment is needless. Church is looked upon by the "Command" really, I think, only as a habit, and not for the good of men who have to attend, but as something in numbers for "Acting Chaplain, R.N." to show in his weekly report. It is the compulsory business we do not like. We have to sleep, drink, eat, and do everything by numbers, but the sooner the authorities get it into their heads that we do not think by numbers then this Church Parade will stop.

And this from the Army; from a soldier home from the Front, wounded:—

> It may interest or amuse you to be informed that I sent my Freethinker, with the splendid article "Religion and the Army," to the Colonel of my present Battalion. Of course, I did not give my name. But I think your article gives vent to a great grievance soldiers suffer in the Army, irrespective of their opinion on religion, either for or against. The majority of the soldiers hate—I prefer the word "hate"—going to Church Service; and if the Christian religion is true, I have no hesitation in saying that the Church Service is the cause of more men being damned in hell for ever than it saves, by compelling men to go against their will. There is more cursing and swearing by men getting ready for Church Parade than any parade of the week. It is the most unpopular parade of the week.....You will have, and deserve, great thanks if you can force those in authority to make Church Parade optional. The men only go because they are forced to go.....When we came forward to assist the country in her hour of need, we did not sacrifice our right of opinion; and the Army Council should understand that men's opinions are not issued out like so many tons of bully beef or tins of plum and apple jam. The sooner Church Parades are abolished, there will be less crime in the Army; for it is the cause of much petty crime. Let the Army Council give no Church Parade one month's trial, and they will have overwhelming evidence that the Church Parade is the most unpopular thing in the Army.

The testimony from both branches of the Service as to the bad language generated by Church Parade is striking. And it is very evident that the compulsory attendance at church is felt as a real injustice by many thousands of the men in both the Army and the Navy. The men know that it is not essential to their doing their duty as soldiers and sailors; they naturally resent being ordered to prayers; and we hope that the Army Council will follow the example of our American Ally, and make the Church Parade quite voluntary, even if it does not imitate the French, and abolish it altogether.

The following, from Pte. W. Walden, is also of interest :—

> I am writing to thank you for forwarding the Army Council Instruction No. 179, re Religion in the Army. When I showed it to the S.-M., he stated that he was not aware till then that anyone could join the Army without professing a religion. I am pleased to state that he has since rectified the error dealing with me. I feel certain that if men did not display so much timidity in reference to religion when joining the Colours, that the lot of "Tommy Atkins" in connection with Church Parade would not be so unpleasant as it is.

With the latter sentiment we quite agree. Anyway, we are glad to have been of use in this particular case, as we have been in many others.

Mr. Harry Snell is lecturing for the Birmingham Branch at the Repertory Theatre, Sunday, March 10, at 7 p.m.—"Religion from Martin Luther to Sir Oliver Lodge—and After." It is a few years since Mr. Snell lectured for the Branch, and he is sure of a hearty welcome from his old friends. Those who have not heard him should make a special effort to do so.

We are asked to announce that Mr. F. E. Willis lectures at Nuneaton, in The Palace, Queen's Road, to-day (March 10), at 6.30, on "What is the Use of Prayer?" We hope there will be a good muster of both Freethinkers and Christians.

The Manchester Branch of the N.S.S. is holding a Social Evening—whist drive, concert, and dance, on Saturday, March 16, at 7 o'clock, in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Ardwick. Tickets are 1s. 6d. each, and can be obtained of the Secretary, Mr. H. Black, 446, Great Cheetham Street, East, Higher Broughton. We hope the meeting will be a success.

Dr. Arthur Lynch, M.P., is an outspoken advocate of Republicanism, and is opening a debate on that subject before the North-West London Branch to-day (March 10), at 7.30. There ought to be a good audience and an interesting discussion.

The Queen of Night.

Our planet's pale attendant, the moon, is a spectacle of fascinating interest at any time to the student of Nature, and the ruler of the night has, from the earliest ages, attracted the attention of man. The constant waxing and waning of the lunar orb probably impressed primitive peoples to an even greater degree than the comparatively changeless sun. And now, again, at least in latitudes subject to uncanny visitations from the air, particularly on moonlit nights, an unusually large amount of interest attaches itself to our silvery satellite. In reality, one of the smallest celestial objects visible to the unaided eye, our moon, owing to its proximity to the earth, seems an orb of considerable dimensions, and appears equal in diameter to the mighty sun itself, and this deceptiveness is increased by the fact that our nightly companion confers upon us a far greater amount of light than all the planets and stars combined, the lord of day alone excepted. The telescope reveals innumerable heavenly objects, many of which are immeasurably smaller than the moon, but these lie quite beyond the range of the naked eye.

The lunar diameter is 2,160 miles, and is therefore slightly more than one-fourth of that of our globe. Its mean distance is about 240,000 miles, but this varies considerably; so that at perigee, when the moon lies nearest to the earth, its distance is reduced to 221,600 miles; while, when our satellite is at apogee, that part of its orbit most remote from the earth, its distance extends to 253,000 miles. Thus we see that the path pursued by the moon, in her monthly revolution round the earth, cannot be a true circle, while even the form of our satellite's orbit is variable. In consequence of the varying attractions of the earth and sun, the moon's elliptical orbit becomes a little more or a little less eccentric. These fluctuations are responsible for the fact that the moon appears appreciably larger at one time than it does at another.

The disc of the full moon contains 7,300,000 square miles, and is therefore slightly larger than the continent of South America. One aspect only of our satellite is presented to us. No mortal has ever viewed the other surface of the moon. There are numerous conspicuous features on the moon's face, which have been noticed from the earliest historical times, and whenever the lunar orb is visible, these identical markings appear. One reservation only need be made, and this is that the moon's surface is sometimes slightly tilted, with the result that the lunar landscape, near the edge, varies somewhat. There is every reason for the belief that the unseen surface of the moon is a mere variant of her visible disc. In any case, of the 7,300,000 square miles of surface open to observation, about 2,900,000 comprise those mottled areas which were long regarded as oceans, while the remaining 4,400,000 represent a rough and torn territory environed by the apparent remains of once energetic volcanoes, whose enormous craters exceed anything of the kind existing on our planet. So immense are several of the lunar volcanoes, that it is estimated that a single explosion of one of these titanic mountains would have sufficed, on our earth, to shake it to its very core.

It seems strange that while the sun and planets all revolve on their axes, and present every feature of their surfaces to us, that the moon should turn one face only to the earth. Many have contended that the moon possesses no axial rotation whatever, but this belief is entirely erroneous. Our satellite unquestionably revolves on its axis, but its period of rotation is equal to that of its revolution about the earth. Newcomb, Serviss, and others have cogently illustrated this curious phenomenon. Another most convincing illustration is supplied by Ball in his Starry Realms. That able expositor imagines a horse galloping round a circular course with a human spectator standing at the centre. The running animal, as he careers round the course, will necessarily present one side of his body only to the observer, while the other side of the animal will remain hidden from sight. So far this is what happens to the earth-dweller as the moon journeys through the sky. Now, it is self-evident that when the horse has travelled the complete circuit, it has not only completed a revolution round the course, but it has also rotated. The animal in making the circuit must have moved successively towards every point in the horizon, because in the course of his journey he is compelled to travel north, south, east, and west in order to complete the circuit. As Ball states :—

> It is clearly impossible that the horse can have faced north, south, east, and west, without performing a movement of rotation. Unless he rotated he would necessarily be always journeying towards the same point of the compass. Suppose that, at the moment when he was facing due north his right side being turned towards the spectator in the middle, we bring him to the opposite side of the course, and again place him facing due north. It is clear that the left side of the animal will now be towards the spectator. In such a case it is plain that the movement has not been at all like that of the moon, the characteristic feature of which is that the same face is always directed towards the earth.

It is, therefore, perfectly certain that if our satellite did not turn on its axis in the course of its monthly journey, or lunation, as it is termed, then every part of its surface would appear in succession, although only at periods of full moon would an entire hemisphere be illumined by the sun. At the time of old and new moon the side presented to our planet would, in the absence of rotation, prove exactly the opposite to that displayed at full moon, while during the last quarter, the lunar region facing our earth would be the reverse of that presented to the earth at first quarter.

This striking coincidence between the period of the moon's axial rotation and its revolution round our globe has been traced to definite causes. As we have seen, the moon's surface displays a dead world of barren rocks and stones. But the extinct lunar volcanoes were once active, and in that remote age our desolate satellite was the theatre of great internal heat and energy. The further we peer back in time, we picture the moon growing hotter and hotter, until we reach a period when it was partly, or even entirely, molten. Its rugged scenery sufficiently indicates that the moon was once the seat of titanic volcanic upheavals greatly exceeding any so far known to have occurred on the earth.

To-day the moon exercises powerful tidal influences on our planet's waters. In early ages, before the moon became a burnt-out cinder, oceans rolled over its surface. Then, the earth, a much larger body than the moon, generated tides on the lunar seas which immensely surpassed those now raised by our satellite on the earth. Even in the absence of water, our planet's gravitational powers would exercise an enormous pull on any liquid or viscuous substances on the moon. When the moon was still a molten globe, the earth's influence would be exerted over every portion of its mass. The same forces which originally gave birth to the moon when it was separated from its earth-mother and thrust off into space are responsible for our satellite's inability to show us her hidden face. Both of these phenomena are traceable to tidal friction. The giant tides raised on the unsolidified moon by the earth's attraction acted on the rotating orb like brakes on a wheel, and at last they lessened its rotation until its period coincided with the moon's monthly revolution.

As the centuries stole away, the moon gradually radiated its heat into surrounding space, and evolved from a molten into a solid state, on its surface, at least. At a later stage of its history its oceans appeared, and life may have arisen; but if so, it has had its day, and ceased to be. The moon's exterior seems quite dead; and if heat be absent, no liquid remains, even in the orb's interior. Some astronomers surmise that the earth no longer exercises tidal control over the moon. But the adjustment established by past tidal authority persists, and this truth is most clearly exhibited in the changeless face with which our sad satellite looks down on the inhabitants of the earth.

The Poet of Mortality.

It is in the sonnet that Marston's genius is supposed to show itself most unmistakably. These sonnets of his, at their best, have qualities which, in the main, would justify a critic in his placement of them extremely high in the sonnet-literature of the later Victorian period—perhaps, even, in ranking them superior to those of any other contemporary poet, after the generous and intensely artistic series by the author of The House of Life.—William Sharp.

Whatever we barbarian Britons are compelled to cede to other nations as our peers in the fine arts, in belles-lettres, and in poetry, certainly, we can surely claim precedence. Still, it is a curious anomaly, that we are, as a nation, less appreciative of poetry than nations of lesser literary repute. At any rate, the number of our so-called "minor poets" who have been relegated to the top shelf of the book-case, is considerable. Yet, in glancing over the names of some of these, the thought constantly recurs to me, that had some of these "minor poets" been cradled in any other land but Albion, they would probably have been heralded among its literary glories.

Among the moderns, perhaps, the "best neglected" of the "minor poets" is Philip Bourke Marston (1850-87), yet no less masters than Rossetti and W. Scott Bell placed him in the first rank of lyric poets. Indeed, Rossetti said of Marston's Garden Secrets that it was not too much to say that they were "worthy of Shakespeare in his subtlest lyrical moods." I remember praising Marston to G. W. Foote on one occasion, and with youthful enthusiasm, I spoke of him as the first of modern lyricists and sonneteers. G. W. Foote, who, by the way, knew the "blind poet" (he met him in company with James Thomson, B.V., at the literary salons of a certain well known author) did not agree with so sweeping an estimate, and said that Marston's work, as a whole, would not stand this criterion, but he admitted that probably his best work, taken by itself, would perhaps stand favourable comparison with any of our best modern poets. I mention this especially, as Foote's opinion in a matter of this sort is of the highest importance, although it falls short of the estimate of William Sharp. I do not think that many will deny this to Marston, for surely those remarkable sonnets in All in All, such as "Not Thou but I," the gorgeous imagery of Garden Secrets, say, for instance, "The Rose and the Wind," as well as a host of truly exquisite lyrics—"Come, Buy," "Love has turned his face away," etc., are without equal.

One of the main points urged against Marston is that his limitation of "forms" is bound to tell against him. True, Marston rarely deviates from the sonnet or lyric, yet where he does, such as in that remarkable poem, "A Christmas Vigil," written in his nineteenth year, we see that he was equal to it. Yet, even so, I fail to understand why we should suspend judgment merely because we do not know what Marston could do in certain "forms." Surely it is sufficient for us to judge him by what he did use. Why the small genre painter, or the song-writer, such as Jan Steen or Hugo Wolf, should not be admissible for comparison with artists of larger "forms," such as Rubens and Richard Strauss, passes my comprehension. It does not matter to us what the artist presents, or what he selects to present it in. It is how he presents his art that is, or should be, the sole criterion.

William Sharp, in his sympathetic and appreciative memoir of Marston, is replete with all sort of moral and philosophic "conditioning" with regard to the poet's art-work. He assures us that nowhere does Marston manifest any depth of vision into the life of nature or of man, nor any genuine knowledge of the great motors and complex issues of human nature in general. Although, personally, I do not admit of this criterion in any art or literary judgment, I am "in arms" against Sharp in this case, because, in point of fact, he seems to be strangely inaccurate. Why, Marston's particular themes—Love, external nature, the travail and uncertainty of life, prove the very opposite. Take, for instance, his love themes. None but a poet with the deepest vision of life could have penned such realism as Marston. The love that is brought into rhapsody by him is not the love ordinarily dwelt upon by poets, but a strong, sexual, natural, human thing, naked and unadorned. His many arraignments of Providence, and his indictments against the philosophy of "All 's right with the world," again reveal to us that Marston most certainly had a "depth of vision into the life of nature." This is especially noticeable in his treatment of Christians and religion in general.

Sharp tells us that Marston belonged to no sect in "matters of religion," but leaves the question there as though we may understand that the poet was merely a Freethinker in regard to sects. That is not so, as we know from his poems, as well as from other sources, that Marston repudiated Christianity and was an Atheist. In spite of Sharp's strictures concerning Marston's "knowledge," the poet was sufficiently logical to see, for instance, the falacy of Pantheism in deifying the actual as an escape from the ideal of the conventicle. In his remarkable sonnet, entitled "Atheist to Pantheist," he openly boasts his Atheism (it can mean nothing else), and denies that it is possible to distinguish Pantheism from Atheism:—

> .....Absorbed in all pervading God,
> You think to live, conscious, yet knowing naught
> Of all the past with pain and joyance fraught,
> An Atom, where the atoms onward plod.
> What you call God, I Nature name, and hence,
> Am Atheist; but where the difference?

Although the life of the "blind poet" was an extremely sad one, yet the religion which promised rest and consolation to the "weary and heavy laden" found no response in the breast of Marston. In that finely sustained dramatic poem, "A Christmas Vigil," he openly inveighs his scorn where he makes the wanton confess herself:—

> Too blind perchance it may be to discern
> God's mighty mercy, and the boundless love
> That all paid, praying preachers tell us of.

And as for the man with whom her shame began, she admitted that both were to blame, although

> He was the snare in which my soul was caught,
> . . . . .
> Yet God, not he, my wrath of soul shall bear,
> God set the snare!
> God made him lustful, and God made me fair.

Orthodoxy seemed almost a theme for merriment with Marston. His ballad, "Caught in the Nets," is a story which the poet found in Sir Richard Baker's Chronicles, about a merman which some fisherman caught, and although "oftentimes brought to church, never showed any signs of adoration." This part, in Marston's versification, is the merman's story:—

> I heard them say it was the time to pray,
> And one man cast a chain my neck about,
> And with a mighty grasp he dragged me out,
> Right out into the sunlight and the wind,
> And some men walked before, and some behind.
> So on we wended, till we reached a hall,
> Where all around upon their knees did fall,
> And made together a most dismal noise.
> Then one cried to them, in a louder voice,
> Whereat more wail upon the air they poured,
> Then rose. Next in their midst a monster roared,
> Whereat they yelled; yea, all they yelled as one,
> So that I thought by fear they were undone;
> And much I marvelled that they kept their ground,
> For still that monster made the dreadest sound;
> Then ceased he, and they ceased, and one man rose
> And shouted to them, and with many blows
> Did beat himself, and long and long he screamed,
> And like some fearful dream that I had dreamed
> It seemed to me, and full of dread I was,
> Not knowing well what next might come to pass.

Commenting on the religiosity of the Northcliffe press, the Daily News asks, satirically, "Is Lord Northcliffe taking holy orders?" Cynical folk imagine that his lordship is taking all he can get.

Up for Judgment.

Towards the end of last summer I went with Uncle Joe and Aunt Jane to the local cemetery to witness the burial of a young soldier who had given his life in the service of his country. It was a beautiful day, and the flowers round many of the graves looked lovely and fresh; the fragrance from them being very pleasant and exhilarating. The young soldier had fought in several important engagements in France, and had been seriously wounded; but when he recovered from his wounds, he was sent back to France, and fought in further engagements until, at last, he was gassed, and then he was sent home, where he developed lung trouble, from which he ultimately succumbed.

Besides the large crowd of spectators, there was a small contingent of officers and men of the regiment to which the dead soldier belonged, and these came to pay the last tribute of respect and admiration to the gallant young fellow who had given his life for his fellows, and to fire a volley over his grave. The scene at the graveside was most impressive and touching—many of the spectators being moved to tears.

After the ceremony, Uncle Joe, Aunt Jane, and I walked through the cemetery and looked at many of the massive monuments erected to the memory of important parishioners in what is called "the consecrated ground," and then we went and looked at many of the small tablets erected over the graves of what are called the "common interments."

While we were gazing at these I could not help remarking to Uncle Joe that, even in death, class distinctions were made, and the wealthy had massive marble monuments, while the poor had only small tablets—most of them wooden—and these were often trampled into the earth during the wet weather, so that many were unable to find the spot where their dear departed friends had been interred.

Uncle Joe who, although a Conservative and a Churchman, was very democratic in many of his views, could not help acknowledging that he did not like these class distinctions, and that it appeared to him these great marble monuments were erected more for the gratification of the living than for the benefit of the dead.

Then we began to discuss many of the inscriptions and verses on the tombstones and monuments, and I noted that most of the dear departed were buried in "a certain hope of a resurrection," and that some of them had gone straight into the arms of Jesus. I noted, further, that most of the verses suggested that the dead had either gone to heaven or awaited the great day when they would be called from their long rest to their heavenly abode above the skies, and none of them even hinted at the possibility of their going to the other place down below.

"Yes," said Uncle Joe, "that is the best of the Christian religion—there is hope for all. The repentant sinner can always find salvation, even in the last hour; but the final judgment rests with our Heavenly Father."

"Then do you really believe in the resurrection of the body, Uncle Joe?"

"Most certainly I do. Does not the Church Service say, 'I believe in the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting'? Yes, I believe it. But I do not believe that we shall rise with the same body we had on the earth. We shall have a celestial body, not a terrestrial one."

"What is a celestial body?" I asked.

Aunt Jane smiled, but said nothing; she felt instinctively that Uncle Joe was getting out of his depth.

"A celestial body?" said Uncle Joe, with something in his voice approaching indignation; "how can you ask me such a question?"

Digitized by Google

"Well, I thought you knew something about it, since you say that you believe in it."

"No; it is what we are taught to believe as Christians, and I see no reason to doubt it. We cannot rise with the same body; we know that. We know that our body turns to dust. Besides, look at the thousands of bodies that are cremated nowadays. Well, those people could not rise again with the same bodies—that stands to reason," said Uncle Joe, with great vigour of expression, "therefore they must be celestial bodies that rise again; and that is what I believe, and that's what the bulk of Christians believe also."

"Indeed! Oh, very well. And do you believe we all come up for judgment on the last day?"

"Yes, I think so."

"Well, how can it be the last day if the glory or the condemnation that is to follow are to last for ever and ever?"

"Why, the last day on this earth, of course," said Uncle Joe, with an air of confidence, glancing at Aunt Jane to see how far his remarks would meet with her approval.

But Aunt Jane only looked puzzled and sad. The questions were rather calculated to unsettle her belief than otherwise.

"Oh, the last day on this earth, eh? So we all leave the earth together, some to go up above and the remainder down below. And then the earth will be destitute of all the people, and so I suppose it will go to smash or become engulfed in the sun, or something of that sort?"

"I don't know," said Uncle Joe, quietly.

"And have we all to be judged on one day, or shall we have a fair trial, and hear the evidence of our guilt on all the charges that are brought up against us?"

"I certainly think that God would give us a fair trial," said Uncle Joe, "the justice of the case would at least demand as much as that."

"God the Father will preside, I suppose?"

"Yes, I think so."

"With God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost on the bench?"

"Yes."

"Then the whole affair would be converted into a great assizes?"

"As Tom Hood says:—

> "Then turning round his head again,
> He saw before his eyes
> A great judge and a little judge,
> The judges of a-size."

"Now, my dear boy, please do not joke on so serious a subject," said Uncle Joe, warmly.

Aunt Jane smiled again. She had a good sense of humour.

"Oh, very well; only I can't help laughing—the idea is so ludicrous," I replied.

"Fancy, millions of human beings coming up for trial—all the millions of people who have lived in all the ages—not only all the Christians, all the Jews, all the Mohammedans, all the Bhuddists, all the black races."

"Stop!" said Uncle Joe, "I said nothing about black souls—I mean the souls of the blacks. That's a question I shall have to submit to our vicar; indeed, I think it is a matter that might be put to the Archbishop himself."

At that moment the church bell began to toll, and we knew that the body of another poor soul was to have the beautiful burial service of the Church of England read over it previous to being consigned to its last resting-place—the grave, or more properly speaking, to mother earth—from which we all spring, and to which we all return.

The Blank Wall.

IX.

The question of the sanity of man is one with which few minds are troubled. Perhaps the question is, in itself, a little mad! On the other hand, how is it possible for those clear brains so much alive to the fact of life as to be perpetually at war with the extraordinarily stupid conventions of the human race, to avoid for any length of time the problem of the sanity of man? Almost every manifestation of civilization is so deliberately sordid and ugly as to create a feeling of revulsion. The tone of popular thought, if it can legitimately be termed thought, is on a plane of obvious decadence and insanity. Vacuous newspapers, puerile novels, vapid and dull plays, cant, pornography, hypocrisy, and ignorance everywhere. The seeker after truth and beauty, dignity of purpose, and the enlightenment of the human species generally, discovers practically no vital response to his exertions. He is pushed outside the feverish stream of current "life," and more and more is driven inwards to live his dream unseen, unheard, neglected and labelled "Crank."

Where, then, the pertinent question arises, is to be found sanity, or at least a desire for its establishment on earth? A people possessed of one tenth the sanity of the reformer or revolutionary would not tolerate the existing conditions of life for twenty-four hours. A sudden lightning stroke of sanity would cause the people to realize that the precious gift of life was being thwarted in a thousand sinister ways; that an existence which might be made a radiant journey of delight and decency was being converted into a monstrous nightmare far worse in many respects than death itself. With a universal War in full swing we may well wonder whether the seeker after Truth and Life, is not, after all, a mere curiosity. The sacrifices of to-day may not count at all in the future; the dreams of to-day may become nothing more than a glorious and haunting memory to the select few. May we not, in all seriousness, be merely repeating such experiences as were the lot and destiny of those who would be with us to-day, but who are now something less even than memories? Despair, however, will not prevent us from handing on the torch.....A time may come.....who knows?

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....

> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable iberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

Digitized by Google

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Religion and the Social Sense.

In judging the evils current in any state of society, there is always a tendency to consider the class that profits from their existence as deliberately and consciously perpetuating them. This view, however, involves a totally false estimate of the quality of the social forces and of human nature. Conscious villainy is not a powerful factor in human affairs. The number who can plainly say, "Evil, be thou my good," is never more than a very small minority. Paradoxical as it may sound, deliberate and conscious villainy implies a degree of moral courage possessed by few. Man's nature is so socialized that he must needs, in the vast majority of instances, find some moral or social justification for all he does. We have seen, in the case of the present War, that every nation engaged claims to have a moral or social justification for its conduct. Nor is this a piece of deliberate hypocrisy; it is rather an evidence of the truth that man's socialized human nature, while it may be misdirected, cannot be denied. And the same holds good of classes within the State. A social justification must be found—some outlet must be found, so to speak—for moral energy. And it is the peculiar function of religion, in all modern societies, that it provides an outlet for moral energies and aspirations, and thus perpetuates social evils that would otherwise stand self-condemned.

The Narcotic of Faith.

Last week, in dealing with Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's The Town Labourer, we pointed out the period covered by that work was characterized by (1) the development of the factory system, which evolved not alone the enslavement of a whole class, but the employment of young children and women under conditions to which the world offers no parallel; (2) an outburst of religious zeal, as shown by the lavish erection of churches and the creation of numerous organizations for the evangelizing of the world; and (3) a burst of anti-freethinking prosecution and persecution The connection between these phases is closer than appears at first sight. Indeed, our point is that number two was in a sense inevitable to number one, while number three was the necessary result of a movement of opinion that tended to bring men and women face to face with facts. In such a state of affairs, religion serves as an outlet for moral feeling that is checked in other directions. It gives a justification for existing institutions and conditions by an appeal to a supra-moral sanction. It provides a mental drug for those at the bottom, and a moral narcotic for those at the top. As Mr. and Mrs. Hammond say:—

> The resignation of the upper-class world to the torture of children.....the fresh hope of a decent or civilized life on this side of the grave for the majority of people in the new towns, are not to be attributed solely to the atmosphere of capitalists and landlords. .....We must take into account the way in which men and women capable of self-devotion and sympathy were brought through the associations of religion and inspiration of the evangelical Revival to regard the world around them.

Freethought and Progress.

First of all, we have to note the influence of the French Revolution. Monarchical and oligarchic England was thoroughly afraid of that movement. It did what it could to crush it abroad. It did what it could to limit its influence at home. And that influence came to England with the added odium of involving an attack on the Church.

> At the time when half Europe was intoxicated and the other half terrified by the new magic of the word citizen, the English nation was in the hands of men who regarded the idea of citizenship as a challenge to their religion and their civilization; who deliberately sought to make the inequalities of life the basis of the State, and to emphasize the position of the workpeople as a subject class.

The fear of this governing class was intensified by the fact that so much of the work of reform was actually associated with men of pronounced freethinking opinions. One notes the following among the names given by Mr. and Mrs. Hammond as men who agitated for reform: Paine, Robert Owen, Hardy, Thelwall, Place, Cobbett, Bamford, Prentice, Detrossier, Doherty, Hetherington, Carlile, Lovett, and Godwin. There are many others who are not mentioned by our authors, and who might be well named. But these names were enough to rouse the religious bias, and if one were to wipe out the work of these men from the social history of the century, English history would read very differently to-day.

How Religion Works.

To the governing class, Christianity came as the most useful of instruments for its purpose. In this sense evangelical religion was even more useful than the Established Church, since it exerted more influence over the working class. Wilberforce, keen to seek the freedom of the slave, supported with all his might the savage Combination Laws of 1799 and 1800, which had so baleful an effect on the lives of the working classes. When, during the debates on the suspension of the Habæus Corpus, Burdett pointed to the number of persons thrown into prison without trial, kept in solitary confinement, and forbidden communication with the outside world, and asked Wilberforce what a Christian was to think of those who not only did not visit the prisoner themselves, but would not allow others to visit him? Wilberforce replied that "religion had taught him to value the blessings the country enjoyed and to hand them down to posterity unimpaired." It is well said that "For such minds Christianity was not a standard by which to judge the institutions of society, but a reason for accepting them." Philanthropy was, of course, not wanting. That was one of the teachings of current religion. The rich must be kind to the poor; the poor must be grateful and respectful to the rich. The evil was reciprocal. There is only one thing more demoralizing to the average character than that of having people dependent upon one for the necessaries of life, and that is the effect of such conditions on the dependents themselves. "The poor ye have always with you," said Jesus, and the poor, overworked, and under-fed, badly housed, and uneducated, were told to be content, to be grateful for the mercies shown them, and to look forward for reward to the world to come.

The Cant of Dissent.

Writing in 1824, Cobbett said of the Methodists:—

> The bitterest foes in England have been, and are, the Methodists.....The friends of freedom have found fault, and justly found fault with the main body of the established clergy.....but, hostile to freedom as the established clergy have been, their hostility has been nothing in point of virulence compared with that of these ruffian sectaries.....Books upon books they write. Tracts upon tracts. Villainous sermons upon villainous sermons they preach. Rail they do like Cropper and Bott Smith, against the West Indian share-holders; but not a word do you ever hear from them against the share-holders in Lancashire or Ireland. On the contrary, they are continually telling the people here that they ought to thank the Lord for the blessings they enjoy; that they ought to thank the Lord, not for a bellyful and a warm back, but for that abundant grace of which they are the bearers, and for which they charge them only one penny per week.

With this sweeping condemnation of the most evangelical form of Christianity, and on behalf of which Methodists of to-day make such extravagant claims, Mr. and Mrs. Hammond do not substantially disagree. They point out that the general view of the leaders of the working-class concerning the Methodist revival does not differ from Cobbett's. In a careful analysis of the relation of the Methodist Church to working-class betterment, the authors say:—

> If we look into the life and teaching of this new religion, we can see that the whole spirit of its mission was unfavourable to the Democratic Movement and the growth of the Trade Union spirit. The Methodist movement was a call not for citizens, but for saints; not for the vigorous, still less for the violent redress of injustice, but for the ecstatic vision.....In so far as this religion touched on the affairs of this world it tended to reflect the spirit of its first missionary. It taught patience where the Trade Unions taught impatience. The Trade Union movement taught that men and women should use their power to destroy the supremacy of wealth in a world made by man; the Methodist that they should learn resignation amid the painful chaos of a world so made, for good reasons of his own, by God.....It set up a rival to the ideal of civic freedom. It diverted energy from the class struggle at a time when wise energy was scarce, and money when money was still scarcer. It would be extremely interesting to know what money was spent on religion by a class that was thereby diverting its resources from a war for independence.....The teaching of Methodism was unfavourable to working-class movements; its leaders were hostile, and its ideals, perhaps, increasingly hostile.

The Social Function of Religion.

The moral pointed by Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's book is, to my mind, clear. It is not merely that the resources of the people, mental, moral, and financial were, as the authors point out, diverted in a wrong direction, not merely that religion acted as a drug so far as they were concerned, but also that it served to reconcile the governing classes to the injustice and misery around them. Human nature may not be as noble as many of us would wish to see it, but it is not so vile that whole classes of men and women can consciously put aside the tendencies of their moral nature sufficiently to embark on a course of deliberate wrong-doing. Some outlet for their moral and social energies must be found, and it has always been the function of religion to provide this ethical safety valve. And that gives us the historic reason why religion has in all ages been found in close alliance with all forms of social wrong—slavery, serfdom, the enslavement of a class, and the subjection of women. Religion blinds people to the vital social issues. It excuses social wrong by an appeal to a "Providential order," it soothes the social sense by schemes of religious philanthropy, and thus perpetuates evils worse than those it professes to remove. It is not because religion deliberately teaches wrong-doing that it stands as the historic enemy of genuine social progress, but because it stands in the way of that wide-eyed, open-minded acceptance of vital facts which can alone make progress certain and profitable.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Newest Apologetic.

VI.

WE have learned from history that the achievements of Christianity are largely the creation of the theological imagination. Holding its record face to face with its claims no other conclusion is honestly possible than that it has been a gigantic failure. Not only it has not emancipated woman, but has rather put her in a position of undignified and humiliating subjection to man. Indeed, some divines, such as the Dean of Manchester, deliberately repudiate St. Paul's teaching on this subject. Christianity permitted slavery to exist for many centuries without uttering a single word in condemnation thereof, and when emancipation was effected it was in spite of the bitter opposition of the Church. It is a notorious fact that Christianity, not only has not abolished war, but has been directly responsible for many of the most devastating wars the world has ever seen. Neither can any one maintain that it has put an end to cruel, blood-thirsty sports, such as fox and deer hunting in our own country. These are counts against the popular religion of which it is impossible to acquit it. We have also seen that it has discouraged and set its face resolutely against the advance of secular learning, and was for many ages the sworn enemy of science. And yet, despite all these well-attested and generally-acknowledged facts, Christian apologists have the temerity to speak of the achievements of Christianity. Some of them go the length of alleging that it has redeemed the world, wildly glorying in what they call the mighty miracles of Divine Grace. The Rev. J. K. Mozley, B.D., whose ingenious little book, The Achievements of Christianity, we have reviewed in these columns, does not hesitate to characterize as perverse those who deny "a real nexus of cause and effect" between the Christian Faith and social reforms, ignoring the undeniable fact of the Church's angry resistance to nearly every one of such reforms. The third chapter in his work, entitled "Christianity and the Arts," deserves special attention, not because of its merits, but on account of its specious but unconvincing argument. We are in full accord with the thesis that "great indeed is the happiness which comes through the æsthetic side of life," but cannot possibly approve of the further assertion that "incomparably poorer would humanity be apart from the contributions to this side of life made under the inspiration of the Gospel." However, Mr. Mozley makes wonderful, even fatal admissions, thereby hopelessly removing the ground from under his own feet:—

> History does show very wide separations between art and Christianity at certain periods. The Fathers of the Church in the early centuries were more alive to the falseness and the frequent impurity of the religion represented in the great poetic works of the Greek and Roman writers than to the beauty of the poems and the grand ideals which often inspired the poets. The Puritan attitude to art was not all that we have been accustomed to suppose (Milton and Bunyan were at once great Puritans and great artists), but Puritanism was suspicious, and was also responsible for the destruction of a great deal of material beauty which, whatever might be thought of the religious uses to which it had been put, was very precious artistically. The attitude of Christians, Catholics as well as Puritans, towards the dramatic art and its exponents has, at times, been savagely hostile. And even to-day one could easily find Christian people who looked on the artistic temperament as something hardly compatible with true and deep religion (pp. 69, 70).

We hold that such has been the attitude of Christianity to art in all ages of its history, and that, from its very nature, no other attitude was possible to it. With much of what Mr. Mozley says about art, as such, we are in happy agreement; our only point of difference from him being the relation of the Christian Gospel to works of art. What does Christianity aim to accomplish in the world? If we take the New Testament as our guide, there is no escape from the conclusion that Christ came into the world to provide a way for guilty sinners to flee from the wrath to come. By nature we are all doomed to spend eternity in the lake of fire prepared for the Devil and his angels. Jesus was born that he might save his people from their sins and restore them to the favour of Heaven. Faith in his finished work secures eternal life, and eternal life consists in the knowledge of God. The redeemed of the Lord are treated as subjects of the kingdom of God, which is described as not of this world, either in origin or in nature, and its subjects are spoken of as citizens, not of earth, but of heaven. Now, it naturally follows that the world is a place, not to dwell in, but to escape from; not to love as a home, but to be despised as a prison. Christians are obliged to remain in the world for a little while, but are solemnly warned against being of it. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world," is an apostolic injunction. Art, on the contrary, is at once of earthly origin and nature, and deals exclusively with earthly phenomena. Even so-called Christian art is subject to all the limitations which Nature imposes, and to other restrictions of a purely religious character. When Mr. Mozley says that "the kind of world, the outlook upon existence which art desires, and which is necessary for its finest inspiration and achievement, is bound up with the Christian interpretation," he gives expression to an untruth. It is well known that Greek art, which was not bound up with the Christian interpretation, has never been excelled, and probably never will be. It would be absurd to expect our author to think and speak well of Materialism; but we are surprised to find so capable a man allowing himself to deliberately misrepresent it. Though he lacks the audacity to affirm that "a universally accepted mechanical or naturalistic explanation of the world would be the ruin of great art," yet he is convinced that "it would most severely restrict it, and confine it within far narrower limits than its genius demands." He grants that if such an interpretation were accepted as ultimate truth, art would have to bow before it, but the loss would be unspeakably great.

> Materialism would explain all things, including the human spirit, in terms of matter and force; it would look on every sort of human activity as the necessary effect of causes purely physical; for any free action of the spirit it leaves no place at all. Idealism, mystery, and hope are all cut short in its presence. Not into mystery but into nothingness do all things vanish. Let us not think that the danger from Materialism has departed, because in recent years it has, as a philosophy, found it more and more difficult to hold its ground. Materialism, in some form or other, will always be the creed of the multitudes, when they have lost grip of the great beliefs in God, Freedom, and Immortality (pp. 71, 72).

That is a miserable caricature of Materialism. Mr. Mozley did not take the trouble to ascertain what the materialistic creed really is, nor does he mention his authority for his grossly inaccurate summary of it. Professor Tyndall was a scientific Materialist, and yet he had his idealisms, his dreams, his love of art, and his hope for the future of humanity. Shelley was an Atheist, and yet no poet of his age ever surpassed him as a devotee of the highest species of æstheticism. He was a passionate lover of beauty, and his poetry kindles the love of beauty in all who read it with appreciation. The same thing is true of Keats, Swinburne, and Meredith. Materialists do not believe that all things vanish into nothingness, their great, central conviction being that matter neither comes into existence nor goes out of existence, but is perpetually changing its forms. Mr. Mozley expresses the opinion that the beauty studied and admired by art is not "simply the beauty of line, colour, and sound, but the beauty which is through these made visible but not created," but will the reverend gentleman be good enough to tell us what this so-called higher beauty is, and where it is to be found apart from that of line, colour, and sound? It is admittedly invisible, but how does anybody know that it exists, or that it is other than the beauty of line, colour, and sound? It is true that we read in the Bible of the beauty of holiness, but everybody is aware that in such a connection beauty is merely a metaphor. Mr. Mozley says:—

> Under the magic touch of the great artists, the painters, the architects, the poets, and the musicians, the beauty which runs through Christianity, though not on its surface, has been brought to the light, so that men have come to see that the great Christian doctrines of the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the Resurrection are æsthetically as well as morally moving. And Christianity has provided the artist, not only with material of unparalleled richness upon which he may work, but with an inspiration capable of drawing out his finest powers. From the Gospel the artist has gained a vision in the light of which the world can be beautified as well as strengthened, and that redemption of which it tells leaves no faculty of man outside its quickening power (p. 73).

We ask how the great Christian doctrines of the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the Resurrection can be rendered æsthetically as well as morally moving? They cannot even be shown to be true, much less æsthetically and morally moving. They are cardinal articles in the Christian Creed, but their beauty is as difficult to discover as their truth. Whether true or false, neither the Incarnation nor the Resurrection possesses any moral qualities, while the theory of the Atonement brings us face to face with the quintessence of immorality; but not one of the three can be said to be æsthetically pleasing. As works of art, Raphael's famous picture of the Madonna and Child and Perugino's Crucifixion are truly beautiful; but their beauty is not marred in the least by the belief that the supernatural elements woven into and around them are wholly mythical. The Madonna is simply a beautiful woman, an affectionate mother, wrapping her child up in her radiant aura. The Crucifixion is, likewise, a wholly human incident, and the picture itself is an entirely human product, not even suggesting any supernatural connotation except to those who believe in it. The same thing is true of Handel's Messiah, whose music is nothing more than a scientific arrangement and combination of sounds, conveying no ideas whatever except those which the hearers succeed in appropriating. Thousands of people thoroughly enjoy and are powerfully moved by the Messiah, to whom the Christian religion is anything but true. It is the music alone that charms them.

It is perfectly true that many Christians are ardent lovers and enthusiastic patrons of the arts, but not because they are Christians, and it is equally true that not a few artists have been and are devout believers; but Christianity, as expounded in the New Testament and the Creeds, is by no means an æsthetic religion. In reality, between the Christian and the artist a great gulf is fixed, which cannot be annihilated except at the cost of reconstructing Christianity itself, which is a task upon which several eminent divines are now engaged. Art is much older than Christianity, and destined to survive it. Greek sculpture, music, and poetry have never been surpassed, and, as some aver, remain unequalled to this day; and it is an unquestioned fact that the gradual decay of Christian belief is unaccompanied by any corresponding decline of the arts. We are convinced, moreover, that the passing of supernaturalism will result in the emancipation and glorification of all high art.

"The Glorious Free Press."

The Free Press, by Hilaire Belloc. Allen & Unwin. 1918.

Indefatigable, if not profound, Mr. Hilaire Belloc has written a book on the free press, and the volume appears at a time when newspapers are less free than at any other recent period of their history. The first master of the art of advertisement in this country is Mr. George Bernard Shaw. The second is Mr. Belloc. This is not an expression of reproach, but one of admiration. He has survived four years as a cocksure military critic, and now he has turned his guns on the pressmen. The papers are full of him and his dexterous criticism and camouflage.

Mr. Belloc sets out to lash the English press, and his most telling criticism is that the power of the editors and the writers has been constantly diminishing of late years, and the power of the commercially-minded proprietors constantly increasing. He might have added that all have become the slaves of the advertisement manager.

Journalists can neither do justice to themselves, nor serve the public honestly, in a press dominated by advertisers and vested interests. In spite of their rivalry, the British newspapers are of one mind in suppressing advanced thought, which is understood to be fatal to fat dividends. The conspiracy of silence against Freethought is wonderful. The papers devote columns to the most brutal murder cases, and report verbatim all the salacious details of divorce and police-court cases. In the summer, when space is plentiful, there is always the sea-serpent or the big gooseberry. In the midst of a world-war room is found for circumstantial accounts of "angels" on the battle-fields, or of the miraculous happenings to stone statues of the Madonna. Let there be no mistake on this point. The writers of this trash do not all believe it. It is not entirely due to fanaticism or ignorance, but is simply done to promote huge circulations. It is, in the last analysis, largely a matter of business. Journalists know better than that Freethinkers are weak, foolish, and ill conditioned persons, but they wish to curry favour with the many-headed orthodox. The imbecilities of the Bishop of London, and other clergymen, are reported weekly in the newspapers, but the leaders of Freethought seldom have a line devoted to their work.

The result is, that readers of newspapers are kept in blissful ignorance of the intellectual ferment that goes on outside the very narrow limits of the "respectable" press; that is, the press which is only a money-making concern. Mr. Belloc sees this clearly enough with regard to Socialism, but he has little to say about Freethought. There is plenty of room for a serious criticism of the English press, but it must be undertaken by someone with more independence than Mr. Belloc, who prefers the days when news was spread, not by the press, but by word of mouth. The latter he describes as "the natural system," which is an astonishing preference. With all their suppressions and exaggerations, newspapers are better methods of communication than reliance upon the garbled conversations of ignorant and illiterate people. As for the press, Mr. Belloc holds it in high-sniffing contempt. Journalists serve proprietors of newspapers, individuals, or syndicates. They may be ever so ignorant, ever so shallow, and ever so disreputable; it is enough if they can write in a taking way, and flatter the prejudices and passions of their readers. They are also irresponsible, and after they have fomented enmities, flattered vested interests, and written "puffs" for advertisers, no one can bring them to book. Personally unknown, merged in the identity of a journal, they are nothing to the world.

Newspapers are commercial speculations. The "glorious free press" is one of the greatest impositions of the age. It exists to pervert and corrupt the public mind, as far as possible, in favour of certain interests which are never openly stated. It is the obedient, humble servant of the advertisers. The only really free press in England consists of a few journals founded and maintained for the promotion and defence of principles. They have relatively small circulations, they derive only a very little of their revenue from advertisements, and that they continue to live at all is a tribute to the animating power of conviction, and the talents of their editors. Journals of this kind have many difficulties of publication. They are starved by the neglect of advertisers, and they are subjected to a boycott which prevents them finding their way to more than a fraction of their potential purchasers. They are perpetually between the proverbial devil and the deep sea, and their existence is a miracle more marvellous than any related in the Gospels.

As an example of the difficulties of conducting advanced periodicals, it is no secret that over nine thousand pounds was spent on Justice during twenty years, and it fell on evil days at last. The arresting personality of Mr. Hyndman could not make the paper a commercial success. The Clarion has had a much larger circulation than Justice, but even Mr. Robert Blatchford's deserved popularity could not make his paper pay without subsidies from his readers. And if two such men cannot make such papers a commercial success, how is the thing to be done at all?

Freethought in this country is represented in the popular press by the Freethinker. And a wider circulation for this journal is the best antidote to the conspiracy of silence and misrepresentation of the commercial press. If our readers do a little missionary work, and do it regularly, the boycott will soon be a thing of the past. A thousand new readers have been obtained through the editor's appeal. The process can be continued indefinitely, and contribute towards the final triumph of, what George Meredith called, "the best of causes."

Theosophy in Belfast.

Judging by advertisements of meetings and courses of lectures during the past year, Belfast Theosophists have been displaying considerable activity. It is about a quarter of a century since I dabbled in re-incarnation, soul transmigration, and kindred mysteries, and so, being caught in the rain one Sunday evening, I wandered into a hall where a lecture on Theosophy was being delivered.

The title was "Body, Soul, and Spirit," and the speaker was a Miss Isabelle Pagan from Edinburgh. There was a good audience, and as it was evident that the majority were believers in the Blavatsky doctrines, it may be worth while to review some of the ideas of the lecturer, and to put them to the test of common sense—I will not say reason.

As Theosophy can only make an appeal to those who have had some education, I was genuinely interested in the psychology of the movement. After hearing this one lecture by an earnest and cultured lady, and having noted the demeanour of the audience, I have solved the problem. These people are believers, they believe this, that, or the next thing for the simple reason that they were brought up to believe. What it is they believe, however fantastic or idiotic is of no account; the basic fact is that they believe, that they possess faith, which is equivalent to saying that they subordinate reason. Oh, yes, they may have had doubts, doubts as to some article of the creed in which they were reared, doubts about the Bible, about the teachings of Jesus, but they have always given the will to believe precedence over the desire to know.

I cannot labour this point too much (although it is nothing new to Freethinkers) for it explains completely why many educated men and women, gifted with fine intelligence in secular affairs, subscribe to speculative doctrines so ridiculous that a child of a Rationalist could confute them with logic. Positivism was described as Catholicism without Christ, and Theosophy is Christianity plus camouflage. In a final analysis all religions are the same, the first principle being that man can achieve greater knowledge and wisdom by faith than by the exercise of the reason.

Now, we know where we are with Catholicism. The faithful have to accept without question, and it is sinful even to entertain a doubt. But Theosophy affects to make an appeal to reason; when, however, we look into it, we find that nearly everything has to be taken on trust. In her lecture, Miss Pagan early showed that she had always been a believer, and the easy way she glided over man's survival of bodily death, his three-fold nature, his numerous bodies (likened to so many waistcoats) re-incarnation, psychometry, astrology, ether, and the aura, and the way the audience accepted it all, fairly took my breath away. Her ideas about the physical body were platitudinous, and some of them silly. The opinions of unmarried persons about the care of children are invariably foolish. I see nothing funny in the story of the man who thought his children ought to be sponged before kissing him! Preference for Swedish gymnastics over German drill is, of course, to be commended—we are not at war with Sweden. Small talk about literature for children, with just a touch of the blood-curdling element recommended, shows clearly the taint of early religious "pithing," for who, in the name of goodness, would ever be curdled about ghosts or bogey men unless fear had been inculcated in them from infancy?

The lady's lack of logic, and her ignorance of the problems of free-will, heredity, and environment which are inextricably bound up with man's every action, was clearly manifested by such phrases as "doing a thing against his will," "self-sacrifice," "the force that compels a man to perform an unpleasant duty, when it would have been much easier to have refrained," etc.

When it came to mind training I sat up and took notice. It appears we do not spend enough time in contemplation and meditation. If we cultivate our "intuitive faculties" there is scarcely any limit to the possibilities of knowledge opened up to us by this means. We were told how some fortunate students of the occult could foretell that they were to receive letters, and even to be certain of the contents, and how certain children of California possessed marvellous intuition and could differentiate between sealed packets of salt, sugar, rice, etc. A wonderful instance of this intuitively acquired positive knowledge was given. An engineer had put up some elaborate machinery. A friend of his—a brother engineer—told the inventor that he would require to take his work to pieces as there was a flaw in a small but important wheel that would completely upset the working. Now, "as he could not possibly have seen the part" which he alleged was faulty, the inventor testily asked why his friend thought there was something wrong. "I do not think, I know," was the reply of the spiritualistic engineer. The machine was, at great cost, taken to pieces, and, lo, there was a mighty flaw, and intuition again triumphed!

At question time I asked for a clear definition of intuition, and requested further particulars respecting the talented juveniles of California. The reply to this latter query completely bears out what I maintained earlier, that, at all hazards, these people want to believe in hanky panky. California is a long way off, and yet Miss Pagan never questions the honesty of the proceedings. "Yes," she said, naively, "the child just concentrates, and holds the envelope to his brow, so."

"They could smell it," I interjected.

"They don't smell with their foreheads, and there is no difference in odour between sugar and salt," retorted the lecturer, and the audience tittered at my folly. Now, it is strange argument for Theosophists, who know that savage man retains many senses that civilization has dulled or robbed us of, that it would be impossible for an acute nose to discriminate between two substances held within an inch or two. Besides, an envelope is translucent, and, placed near the forehead, might be seen through. But as I indicated in the framing of my question, the children are in California, and doubtless, if there are Theosophists out there, they will tell wonderful tales of the occult exploits of Belfast nippers. Miss Pagan assured me that it would take her till midnight to give all the authenticated instances of knowledge gained by other than the ordinary channels known to experience. It was common practice, she said, for men to use intuitively acquired knowledge in their business; there was a growing number possessing the faculty to a wonderful extent, and it could be cultivated by anyone.

It is profoundly pathetic in these terrible times to listen to such nonsense, and to reflect, that while there is so much to be done for poor suffering humanity, that thousands of earnest people take this "philosophy" as having a serious bearing on the affairs of life. Far from it being true that there are hundreds of instances where intuition has accurately foretold events, there has never been a solitary instance that would convince a committee of reasonable persons with powers to investigate, while the frauds, and quacks, and charlatans, from the founder of Theosophy down to the meanest medium, have been innumerable. It has been well said that the proper investigators of "psychic phenomena" are the detective, the conjurer, and the pathologist. I have some knowledge of showmen and of "fakes," and there is not a "black-art" worker in the kingdom who couldn't make an impromptu thought-reading show, assisted by a strange boy, that would equal the revealed exploits of the Californian prodigies. I challenge Miss Pagan or anyone else to demonstrate before me and a committee some similar manifestations by children, and I will wager any sum of money that I will give a reasonable explanation of the occurrences, and then show exactly the same tricks by my own children.

As to the story of the machinery, was not the second man also an engineer? Now, had be been a baker, it might have been considered wonderful; but the whole yarn is just as vague as tracts of the Atheist Shoemaker type. Names, dates, and details are wanting; and if it is common practice to use knowledge acquired by intuition, why are technical schools not superseded by contemplation colleges, and why does not telepathy render the telephone obsolete?

Now, if I were lecturing on Theosophy—which heaven forbid!—I could find more convincing illustrations of intuition than those employed at this lecture; but evidently any old thing will do with those disposed to religion. If I said to my wife, "I have an intuition that the Edinburgh tramcars will break down to-morrow," she would only laugh at me, for she belongs to Leith, and knows that the prehistoric tanks of Princes Street break down every day; there is nothing very wonderful in a business man having a "feeling" or an instinct or an intuition—or the complete trinity of the emotions—that he would receive letters by the morning; but then I am a sceptic, and would not be surprised if I were told that some of the letters would begin "Dear Sir" and end up "Yours truly," or maybe "Yours faithfully," have the previous day's date on them, and some to be typewritten.

It is so easy to prophesy things that are always happening, and yet so perverted is the religious mind that a natural explanation will be rejected for one that savours of the mysterious. Take Miss Pagan's story of the "intuitional warning" given to the young man, which compelled him to look into a shop window, and so save his life, for lower down the street a chimney fell, and would have killed him. "It was a thing utterly foreign to his nature to look at a window," we were told, and nobody laughed. I feel rather ashamed of noticing such imbecility. It is the old religious explanation that always satisfies the religious mind. The man who was saved received a "warning"; for him who was killed, "his hour had struck." God is a winner both ways, and is justified whatever happens. Had the youth felt that some force would suddenly lift him up to the chimney, and if that happened, it might be worth looking into.

Of course, our old trusting friend, Sir Oliver Lodge, was spoken of with deep reverence, and St. Paul was frequently quoted, to my surprise, for I do not think that deceased author approved of lady lecturers. Children should be taught to emulate "great men" (who are the judges?) regardless of the fact that, despite the foolish utterance of a poet, their lives have seldom anything sublime about them; and reverence for religion is, of course, imperative.

All this is the usual hocus-pocus of Christianity; but it is surprising that Theosophists can even go one better in idiocy than orthodox believers. Telling us that God will be pleased or he will be angry is presumptuous; but I simply cannot keep my face straight when I have to listen to a solemn rigmarole about "what the Angel Gabriel would do at half-past twelve," the spiritual exaltation of repeating rhythmically, "Alfred Tennyson, Alfred Tennyson," like his bally brook; and when a supposedly educated woman hailing from the noble city of Edinburgh asks me to see a deeper meaning, a longing or a yearning, in the absurd gyrations of a dancing Dervish, and to be respectful about the silly creature, I can only retire from the investigation, and make way for the pathologist.

CLERGY AND RAID SHELTERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In the Freethinker of March 3 there appears, under the heading "Acid Drops," certain remarks concerning something that took place recently at an air-raid shelter in West Ham which need some correction, as they are far from a truthful account of what happened. The clergyman concerned did not "impose himself upon the gathering," as is asserted; he had been asked by several who are in the habit of frequenting this shelter to come and help them with songs and hymns. On the evening in question, when he first arrived at the school, he asked the gentleman who at other times had used the piano to play for them, as he had done the previous evening (Sunday); this he did for part of the evening. While the people were assembling, songs were sung, and then, at the request of some of the children, the well-known children's hymn, "There's a friend for little children," was sung, during the singing of which some objection was raised, and five or six men and lads started the song, "What's the use of worrying?"

In order to show the spirit of charity towards the few who differed, the hymn was stopped, and the lady at the piano struck up the same popular air, in which many joined. After some more songs, the hymns were resumed without further interruption, and as a climax, towards the end, practically all present joined heartily in the hymn, "Crown Him Lord of all." No interference with anyone's rights took place, and we should like to ask if Christians who make use of Council property have not the same right as so-called Freethinkers?

BY ONE WHO WAS PRESENT.

[We based the paragraph on information supplied by a correspondent whose accuracy we had no reason to question. It does seem that an attempt at religious propaganda of a kind was made, and that was the central point in the paragraph questioned.—EDITOR.]

INTER ALIA.

SIR,—The actual occasion of this letter is concerning the reference of "Mimnermus" to G. L. Mackenzie, in the Freethinker for March 3. G. W. Foote, in his preface to Mackenzie's book, specially notes "Miracle" and "The Salvationist's Prayer." We were most entertained by the rather long poem, "Jurisprudent Jehovah," in which occurs:—

THE TEMPLE OF THE TRINITY.

'Tis thus: Believe that I and Christ and Ghost are one in three;
That I, as Christ, was nailed to death, to bribe the Ghost and me;

Digitized by Google

That I, as Christ, began to be, yet always was, my son:
That each, yet none, is I, and I am each, and all are one!

These statements—strange to those who ne'er for godly knowledge thirst—
Are simple when you know them; but you've got to know them first.

Alas, poor Yorick! MENANDER.

Acid Drops.

The Bishop of London is another sufferer by the War. In addition to Fulham Palace being used as a Red Cross Hospital, presently, he has given up half of London House, and has put all his spare cash into War Loans. This is very distressing, but he may, perhaps, find some consolation in the reflection that Fulham Palace and London House are given to him rent free, and money allowed for keeping them up, so that there may be a little gain in a curtailment of expenses without a diminution of income. And investing all one has at five per cent., gilt-edged security, has certain compensating features also. Nature is full of compensation, as Emerson pointed out. But, we suppose, Bishop Ingram doesn't bother much about Emerson.

The Bishop asked his audience to think of Russia. Well, some of his audience might think of the Russia the Bishop praised for its nobility and religion—the Russia of the Czar, with its pogroms, and police spies, and Siberia, and ignorance, and suppression of nearly all that made life worth living. And the better informed of his audience might know that the new Russia—in spite of its military collapse, and the disadvantage of that to the Allies—has created thousands of Peasant Councils, provided a large number of new schools and hospitals, established 40,000 new Co-operative Societies, and arranged for 5,000 new schools to be opened. However great may be the military disaster of the revolution, the intellectual ferment continues, and the seeds of a social regeneration are sown. But one cannot expect the Bishop of London to attach great value to these things.

The Bishop of Birmingham has been throwing bouquets at Cardinal Bourne, and says that "I would accept nine-tenths of the programme of the Cardinal in regard to social life in the future." If the dogmas of the Church are true, "the social life in the future" will be too hot to be pleasant for quite a number of people.

Reuter's agency states that the Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem has arrived safely in that city. You can always trust that the Church Militant will mingle discretion with its valour.

The clergy maintain that the War was sent by a benevolent deity to punish a naughty world for its sins. A London magistrate declares that, since the War, immorality has increased one hundred per cent.

The Sheffield Catholic Association has passed a resolution pledging support to their bishops in their opposition to the New Education Bill, and also protesting against the proposed legislation for cheaper divorce. Evidently divorce is a luxury that should only be allowed to people with long purses. In our opinion where divorce is advisable there is very much more reason for it in the case of poor people than wealthy ones. The former has few opportunities of getting free from the inconvenience of an undesirable union.

No one need be alarmed at the talked-of invasion of Siberia by the Japanese. The Daily Mail publishes a letter from a correspondent pointing out that this is in fulfilment of prophecy, and is part of the "unfolding of a great purpose." So it is all part of God's plan in the War, the Russian revolution, and the advance of the Japanese Army. And we suppose Germany must be brought in somehow.

Dr. Fort Newton, despite his vaunted love of freedom, cannot be even just to those who do not share his faith. In a sermon preached in the Cathedral of Glasgow, and published in the Christian Commonwealth for March 6, he speaks of "the bitter tragedy of Atheism," and says "there is no keener pain than a loss of the sense of the reality of God." The reverend gentleman is either hopelessly prejudiced or profoundly ignorant, or both, when he so utterly misrepresents the nature and the effect of Atheism. Convinced Atheists are the happiest people in the world. The loss of the sense of the reality of God is to them an unspeakable relief. What they have lost is belief in a myth, but what they have gained is a new and heart-lifting conception of Nature, and their own relation thereto.

Dr. Fort Newton makes a quotation from Nietzsche, which, taken out of its context, conveys an entirely false impression. The preacher overlooks the fact that the great Pole is speaking sarcastically when he so pathetically describes the imaginary sorrows of the unbeliever. No one can honestly read Thus Spake Zarathustra without perceiving what a real advantage it is to be an Atheist. It was a saint, to whom the love of God was all in all, who tried to prevent the good man from carrying his glad tidings to the masses. After his interview with him Zarathustra pitied him, and excused him by saying: "He has not heard that God is dead." In reality the Atheist has lost nothing: he has simply been delivered from bondage to a superstition, and his heart overflows with joy. There are thousands of such people within a few miles of the City Temple, though the pastor pretends to be unaware of their existence.

Dr. Fort Newton tells us that Nietzsche had the courage "to face the raw horror that lies at the end of the logic of denial," which is the opposite of true. Nietzsche did not lament the loss of "his right to pray," for he did not believe in prayer; and in his Human, All Too Human, he almost goes out of his way to expatiate on the absurdity of praying. Since he was convinced of the non-existence of God, how could he regret his inability to pray? As it generally does come, Atheism came to him as a deliverance, and he often actually revelled in it.

Once more, Dr. Fort Newton does not understand what Atheism is. He takes it for granted that to an Atheist purity is a delusion, justice a fiction, and hope a dream, an error for which there is absolutely no excuse. Besides, the reverend gentleman does not know that "God is there," however firmly he may believe that he is. He often denounces dogmatism in the most scathing terms; and yet in this sermon he comes before us as one of the most bare-faced dogmatists in Christendom.

A correspondent of the Star (March 6) has unearthed the following advertisement from the "Personal Column" of the London Times:—

> For sale, the advowson of Aveton Gifford Rectory, near Kingsbridge, Devon. Net yearly value £690 (about); population about 700. The parish is pleasantly situated near a river and a short distance from the railway and the sea. The church is in beautiful state of repair. The rectory, which is a handsome Elizabethan residence, standing high in nice grounds, is in perfect order; good outbuildings. Present incumbent aged 67; no curate is required.

And yet parsons are never tired of talking about the "spiritual" side of their calling.

Following the death of Lance-corporal Evans, which was noted in these columns, and whose exemption by the Tribunal was refused, chiefly on account of his freethinking opinions, a lively correspondence has been going on in the Wood Green Sentinel. The Freethought side is being well upheld, and we congratulate the editor in permitting both sides to express an opinion. A Mr. A. W. Elliott figures prominently in this correspondence, and his measure may be gauged by his statement that Bradlaugh could not stand the fire of his cross-examination, and that "Foote deliberately lied in my presence." The editor curtly remarks that Mr.

Elliott appears to be eaten up with self-conceit and to have a passion for self-advertisement.

The controversy seems to turn on the decision of the Tribunal that Lance-corporal Evans could not have had a conscientious objection to military service, since he was an Atheist. Hence the decision of the Tribunal to send a young man into the Army whose physique unfitted him for the life. We have noted many cases in which Tribunals have decided that to have a "conscience" one must be religious, and the the decision of the mental calibre of many who have been entrusted by the Military Service Act with the ordering of men's lives. It is bad enough that such ignorant bigots should be in a position of authority, but to place them in such a position is a public outrage.

We wonder what the Minister for Education thinks of the following questions that were given to a class of children in the Sonning (Berks) Boys' School:—

> (1) Write out the answers in the Church Catechism to the following questions:—(a) Which be they? (b) What meanest thou by the word sacrament?
> (2) Who spoke the following words to whom, when, and where?
> (a) "Do not lie unto thy handmaid."
> (b) "What said those men and from whence come they unto thee?"
> (c) "Lord, open to us."
> (d) "Put up thy sword again into his place."
> (e) "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him."
> (f) "I will hear thee when thy accusers are also come."
> (3) What are the first words that Our Lord is recorded to have spoken after he rose from the dead?
> (4) Write shortly what you know of Abana, Rabshakeh, Darius, Shushan, Caiaphas, Arimathea, Demetrius, and Euroclydon.
> (5) On what days are proper prefaces appointed to be said? What is said or sung immediately after such prefaces?

To call this kind of thing education is ridiculous. To claim that it has any influence in forming character is downright knavery.

None too soon some of our judges are making a stand against the idea that a certain amount of licence must be given to a man who has served in the War. And, naturally, when the Bishop of London speaks of all soldiers as "saints," and any statement that soldiers are as other men, subject to the same influences, and animated by the same passions, is treated as an insult to the Army, it is not surprising if some think that a civil offence, if committed by a soldier should be winked. In justice to the soldiers themselves it should be said that they are the last to take this view. It belongs to empty-headed civilians. A soldier feels himself one with the rest of the people, and desires to be judged by the same standards. And, on the whole, we think more of the soldiers in this War than of the bulk of civilians.

All the same, we welcome Justice Darling's remark in a recent case that—> the judges of the King's Bench Division had noticed a growing practice in the courts of the country of allowing soldiers who had committed crimes to go practically unpunished, and it was well that it should be plainly stated that this practice of treating a soldier who had done service differently to civilians when charged with similar crimes had tended to place judges in a very difficult position when sentences came up for revision. Certain people held the view that good military service could be set off against civil crime, and that a man who was a good soldier could commit murder or any other crime and go practically free. If that view was to prevail it would mean that a mention in despatches for a Military Medal would be a licence to commit crime. It was the considered opinion of this Court that there must be an end to the view that soldiers could commit crime with impunity. The Court could not allow that good military service entitled a man to commit crime with anything approaching impunity, and each case must be judged on its merits.

Special circumstances may arise in the case of a soldier that do not obtain with civilians, but Justice Darling's ruling strikes us as sound and timely.

While we are on this topic we commend to those civilians who are so enamoured of militarism as to wish for some measure of Conscription, after the War, the following words of General Sir William Robertson, late Chief of Staff:—

> People at home might be asked to submit to still further sacrifices before the War could be brought to such a conclusion as would prevent a recurrence of the horrors, the miseries, and the loss of valuable lives that we had witnessed during the last three and a half years—until we could remove the disgrace to civilization so-called which we saw existing before this War began—he meant the waste of labour and the waste of life in nations maintaining great armies for the purpose of destroying each other.

That, as we have often said, is an end worth fighting for. The state of preparing for war by maintaining large armies in times of "peace" is only one degree less hateful and injurious than actual warfare. And, again, it is a soldier who points to this truth. Countries that need armies to watch each other can no more be properly called civilized than a street can be said to be honest when each house demands the special attention of a policeman to prevent robbery.

Mr. Asquith, in his speech at the Holborn Restaurant, quoted the words of Voltaire: "The wise should have preferences, but no exclusions." It is pleasant to find the great French Freethinker a source of inspiration.

The time's out of joint; but so, apparently, are the seasons. The first cuckoo has appeared at Folkestone, and has been followed by the first butterfly at Leigh-on-Sea. It almost looks as if poor old Providence is getting old. At any rate, it shows great carelessness.

Bearing in mind the way in which the Government has scattered tons of printed paper about, it is cheering to know that a more economical spirit is prevailing. Asked by Lord Ribblesdale for a return showing the number of people appointed by the Government, the reply was that it could not be done, as paper was short. We are glad to see an economical use of paper, even only though it only involves the use of a few hundred sheets.

The Bishop of London, Rev. F. B. Meyer, and Father Bernard Vaughan were all speaking from the same platform the other day. It was a touching picture of Christian brotherhood, the only thing to make the cynic smile was that they were together to impress upon people the importance of attending Church on Sunday. Professional interest brought them together, as professional interest often drives them apart.

The Sunday Chronicle reports a secret wireless installation in Bethel House, the headquarters of the International Bible Students' Association. Bethel House was founded by the late Pastor Russell, and the outfit was presumably to be used for communicating with the enemy.

Lady Glenconner has been telling some amusing stories concerning children. One of the best is that of a child seeing a parson mounting the pulpit steps, and asking, "Is he Jesus?" "No." "Then is he Punch?"

Lord Rhondda says he is proud that his father was a grocer. Why should he not be? It is said that "god" was a carpenter.

The Archbishop of York is at the front—at Washington—where he has dined with President Wilson.

"Who was the first man to fly?" asks a contemporary. According to the Bible, Elijah ascended to heaven in a chariot of fire, and the hero of the Gospels went up "on his own."

A daily paper had a leading article, "Wide-Awake Rip Van Winkles." What an admirable description of the clergy!

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 17, Southampton; March 24, Manchester; March 31, Pontycymmer; April 7, Glasgow; April 14, Liverpool; April 21, Goldthorpe; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.—G. F. Dixon, £1; S. Clowes, 2s. 6d.; Ernest, 10s.; C. B., 2s.

C. Diggory.—Parcel of literature for distribution is being sent. Hope it will be found useful.

A. Atherton.—The article is very striking, as you say, appearing in a Church magazine. We hope its readers will draw the correct conclusions as regard their own faith.

E. Russell.—Thanks. Papers are being sent.

W. Lamb.—We are obliged for your congratulations. If our friends could only secure us paper with as much ease as they seem able to get readers, we should sleep easier. The problem ahead seems how to print without paper.

H. Austin.—We are continuing the subject in this week's "Views," as you will see. It is quite possible the articles would serve a useful purpose if republished; but the cost of printing now is very great, and that gives us pause.

T. Fowler.—It is a question of using what one can get. Paper is now costing at least thirty per cent. above last year's prices, and is still rising.

G. Thompson.—Our objection to the practice in question is general—moral, physical, and social. We do not care to measure the importance of each. Much would depend on the circumstances in each case.

F. Smith.—The present plan of datting "A.D." was adopted in the latter half of the sixth century. Glad you found the parcel of literature so useful.

S. Clowes.—We quite appreciate your concern, and also suggestions, which we will bear in mind. As you say, the financial burden of conducting a paper under present conditions grows steadily greater; but we are cheered by the knowledge that we can rely upon the loyalty of our readers. No editor could ask for a better band of readers than we have.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (March 17) Mr. Cohen pays his second visit to Southampton. He will lecture, morning at 11, evening at 7, in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road. Judging from his last experience, the hall should be well filled on both occasions.

On March 31, Easter Sunday, Mr. Cohen has arranged for a lecturing visit to Pontycymmer, S. Wales (not Blaengawr as stated last week). Big meetings are expected, and it is hoped to form a new Branch of the N.S.S. there. Other meetings would have been arranged for Aberdare and Pontypridd, but halls were not available or suitable. Anyway, Freethought is going ahead in South Wales, and we are looking forward to much greater activity in the immediate future.

We continue to receive many letters from soldiers acknowledging the parcels of literature we have been sending, and "testifying" to the good its circulation is doing. In dug-out and hut the pamphlets and papers form the topic of keen discussions, and many have placed before them Freethought views which otherwise they might never have heard. The literature, in brief, is doing exactly what it was intended to do. It is making many converts, and they will come back from the War with their religious beliefs quite cleared away.

Ever since the War started we have been sending out from the Freethinker office in this way as part of a deliberate plan of campaign. The soldiers in our armies have come from everywhere, and when the War ends will return to everywhere. Those who have become acquainted with Freethought during the campaign will, in many cases, become so many active missionaries for our cause, and we expect to see the fruits of our policy in the very near future. It was for this reason that we would have liked to have sent out a hundred times as much as has been sent. But we have done all we could within the limit of our resources, and perhaps more than our financial means justified. Still we are quite satisfied with the result so far. And there is something that appeals to us in using this war of nations as a means for carrying on a war on behalf of human reason and intellectual freedom.

Mr. Lloyd lectures at the Tillery Institute, Abertillery today (March 17). The afternoon meeting is at 3, and the evening at 6.30. It is almost superfluous to hope for good meetings. Mr. Lloyd is too well appreciated in this district for them to be otherwise than good.

The Swansea Branch of the N.S.S. has arranged for the lectures to be delivered by the Rev. W. H. Walker, late of Manchester. The lectures will be at the Docker's Hall—afternoon at 3—on "Free Thought and Free Belief"; evening at 7 on "Evolution and Revolution." The questions and discussion should prove interesting.

Those who require a clear and unambiguous statement of the case for Birth Control would do well to read "Population and Birth Control," the Presidential address of Dr. C. K. Millard, Medical Officer of Health for Leicester. The case is clearly and temperately stated, and it is unencumbered by the many side issues and irrelevances so often present in such discussions. The publishers are Messrs. Thornley and Son, Leicester, and the price one shilling.

By the will of the late S. M. Peacock, of South Shields, the Secular Society, Limited, benefits by one tenth of the residue of his estate, which has a gross value of £7,668 18s. 6d.

The price of papers continue to go up, and their size to go down. The Times has advanced still another penny, the Telegraph has doubled its price, and John Bull, in addition to issuing fewer pages, is now two pence. Where it will end no man knoweth.

The Queen of Night.

II.

Although the moon is a very minute body in comparison with the sun, the lunar orb's proximity to our planet enables it to play a predominant part in generating the ocean tides. Solar tides there are, but the moon's tide-producing powers far exceed those of the sun. At times, the sun and moon act together, while on other occasions they pull in different directions. During the periods of full moon and new moon, the solar and lunar orbs pull together, because then they are either on opposite sides of the earth, or both on the same side. On such occasions as these, we experience the highest tides at all our sea ports. Conversely, when our satellite is in its first or last quarter, its position, as seen from our globe, is at a right angle with a line drawn to the solar orb. The sun then raises tides in one direction, while the moon raises them in another direction. As the outcome of this phenomenon, the earth's tides are then at their lowest.

Apart from all ordinary interest, a complete knowledge of these details is of supreme importance to mariners, for many invaluable harbours are rendered available for the navigation of large vessels at seasons of high tide only. The Nautical Almanac publishes the tables which accurately predict the times and heights of the tides for the principal seaports of the world. Not merely does the moon serve to adorn the heavens at night, but it also makes serviceable to man such waters insufficiently deep for the passage of ships, save at those times when the tides run high. Moreover, tidal activities are instrumental in scouring river courses, thus preventing the detrimental accumulation of mud and other materials swept down by the streams as they travel towards the sea.

Gravitational attraction varies with the distance of the attracting body. The distance from our earth's centre to that of our satellite is about 239,000 miles. But as our planet's diameter is nearly 8,000 miles, the surface of the ocean, when it presents its bosom to the moon, must be 4,000 miles nearer to that orb than the earth's centre. The force of the lunar attraction is therefore greater at our globe's surface than at its centre. Were the entire earth solid, no appreciable effect would arise from this difference in the moon's attractive powers. But as the earth's oceans are liquid, and therefore mobile, they succumb to the lunar attraction, and are drawn towards the moon. Thus are generated the tides on those areas of the earth's surface which face the moon.

We may now turn to the tide which rises simultaneously on that part of our globe's surface which is turned away from the moon. If the surface of our planet which is facing the moon is 4,000 miles nearer to it than the centre, then the opposite side of the earth is 4,000 miles further from the moon than our globe's centre. Consequently, the lunar attraction must be less. Thus the body of the earth is more powerfully attracted by the moon than is the water on the opposite side of the earth. Therefore, the earth tends to recede from the waters at that point, and another tidal protuberance arises. It is to be noted that while the water of the ocean possesses a certain amount of freedom in its responses to these attractive differences, the solid globe itself can only respond as a whole, and, mathematically considered, the land areas act as if their combined mass were concentrated at the earth's centre. The axial rotation of the earth being much more rapid than the motion of the moon, the tides are never directly beneath the moon, or exactly opposite to it, but run in vast waves round our globe. The tides developed by the gravitational influences of the sun are about two-fifths as high as those evolved by the moon. As Serviss states: "They are sometimes superposed upon the lunar tides—at New and Full Moon—and sometimes they are situated at right angles to the lunar tides—at First and Last Quarters."

The earth's attendant becomes partially eclipsed when it passes partially within our planet's shadow, and totally eclipsed when it enters fully within the shadow cast by the opaque earth. The face of the moon at moments of obscuration is hidden as if by a veil. The orb of night is usually seen as a coppery circle when completely eclipsed. Only on very special occasions does our satellite become entirely invisible, and this invisibility is attributable to dense masses of cloud suspended in the terrestrial atmosphere. Now, if our planet were not encircled by a shell of air, the moon would always vanish from view when eclipsed. Our earth's atmosphere, however, so refracts or bends the sun's rays around the earth's edges that some of these rays are thrown into the centre of the shadow to the distance of the moon. These refracted rays are responsible for the coppery hue which our satellite usually assumes when eclipsed. But when, as happens on rare occasions, those parts of the earth's atmosphere which embrace the earth along the edge visible from our satellite are filled with clouds, the air is prevented from transmitting the bent light rays, with the result that a "dark eclipse" occurs.

A lunar eclipse is a very minor affair to the astronomer when compared with an eclipse of the sun. Still, it possesses numerous points of interest, and may be utilized as a test of the accuracy of astronomical calculations concerning the motions of other celestial orbs.

Were the moon an inhabited world, then, to the Lunarians endowed with visual organs such as ours, the earth would appear several times larger than the sun. To them, did these beings exist, the solar orb would undergo eclipse when the moon is eclipsed to us. To the moon-dweller the earth would occupy the same position which the lunar orb occupies to the earth just prior to its appearance in the western sky in the evening at the time of new moon. At the moment of total eclipse the sun to the Lunarian would be completely blotted from view. And our imaginary man on the moon would, owing to the absence of a lunar atmosphere, see the starry host shining in a jet black sky, even in the full blaze of day. The normal splendour of the stars would scarcely be intensified by an eclipse, although it is very probable that the solar corona would glow more brightly when viewed by the lunar watcher of the skies when it appeared projecting into space from the sides of the apparently giant earth.

The moon's monthly revolution round our globe is conveniently determined by the time that elapses between the lunar orb's successive conjugations with the same star. During this interval the moon has accomplished its journey right round the earth and returned to its point of departure. This constitutes the moon's sidereal revolution, and it occupies an average period of twenty-seven days, seven hours and a half. Another method of measuring the moon's orbital journey relates to its changes from new to full moon, and from full moon through the orb's gradual waning to the period of its reappearance as a faint sickle in the evening sky. The complete cycle of changes from one full moon to the next, or from one new moon to another, embraces an average period of about twenty-nine and a half days. This is termed the lunar synodic revolution, and forms the ordinary lunar month. It is subject to variation, however, to the extent of thirteen hours. The synodic revolution is more than a couple of days longer than the sidereal revolution. This disparity is due to the circumstance that the constant advance of the earth as it travels round the sun makes our luminary appear to travel eastward among the stars, and before the moon's monthly phases which "depend upon her position with regard to the sun, can recommence, she must overtake the sun."

The moon's increase and decline from the moment of new moon when its thin crescent with its convex curve faces the departing sun at eve; through its complete cycle of waxing and waning, its changes are due to the fact that the lunar hemisphere illuminated by the sun's beams is sometimes turned from us, directed slightly towards us, or presented to full view. The full moon rises in the oriental heavens as the sun sinks in the west, and, consequently, we see her full face lit up by the light of the lord of day. At last quarter the moon has waned to half a circle. Like the new moon, the waning moon is crescent shaped, but the convexity of its bow now faces the rising sun, and the silvery crescent swims in the morning sky and adds to the glory of the dawn.

The solar orb illuminates that surface only of the moon which is directed towards it. At new moon our satellite is situated between the earth and the sun, and its bright side is turned from us, but as the moon moves in her orbit then more and more of her illuminated hemisphere becomes visible. This steadily increases from a sickle to a half circle, and progressively to full moon. Her maximum thus reached the queen of night moves gradually back to new moon, and more and more of her bright surface is turned from us. The lunar orb rises later every night, until just prior to its rebirth, the moon is reduced to a delicate crescent which is then so faint that it is visible only at early dawn.

The Poet of Mortality.

II.

(Concluded from p. 156.)

But banter was rare with Marston, and his questionings were invariably serious. The doctrine of Christianity oppressed him. That is the complaint of his "Estranged":—

> .....Take me, dear,
> Outside of these sad faces; let me stand
> Once more within life's shallows, and there hear
> Light laughter of the surf upon the beach,
> For here the very sea is without speech,
> So still it is, and far away from land:
> I want life's little joys; this atmosphere
> Oppresses me: I cannot breathe in it.

Yet "life's shallows," no more than Christianity, could not assuage his wounded soul. Escapement from the misery which dogs the footsteps of every human being, he found only in philosophy, such as we hear in the sad, soft music of "Foredoomed":—

> No star upon thy course sheds any ray;
> Though thy bark bear for years the wind and foam,
> To no sweet haven shall it ever come.
> The night shall see thee drifting, and the day
> Behold thee as the night: thou shalt not pray,
> Nor utter any cry, but, cold and dumb,
> Watch the waves pass, and glad ships sailing home
> Shall hail thee upon thy tractless way.
> The salt wave shall taste bitter to thy lip:
> Weary, yea, unto death, thy soul shall be
> Of winds, and the interminable sea,
> That does not bring thee nearer any goal,
> But sweeps through changeless gloom the fated ship
> To its remote, inevitable shoal.

"Thou shalt not pray!" says Marston. Like Omar Khayyam, he knew the folly of petitioning that "inverted bowl we call the sky."

> I, even I,.....
> Who give thee bitter songs, as men give prayer
> To high and unknown gods, whom no prayers move.
> —Love's Selfishness.

That is a recurring theme with Marston:—

> I spurned it with my foot as God spurns prayer.
> —A Christmas Vigil.

> Then, as a man who, being near to die,
> Knowing men cannot save him, turns his face,
> And calls on God, in his extremity,
> To lengthen yet a little while his days,
> And, calling, feels withal he calls in vain. —A Dream.

> .....prayers are useless, and all tears are vain.
> —Lifeless Life.

> Praying, perchance, ofttimes for strength from Heaven!
> But no strength came..... —Estranged.

The idea of a life after death was also repudiated by Marston. In poem after poem he questions what comes after the day when man goes down to,—

> .....that realm unknowable and vast,
> Which hides the whole world's dead in its recesses,
> Where iron night on every sleeper presses.
> —Man's Days.

In that exquisite sonnet, "Dead," he says:—

> Dead, my beloved,.....
> .. ...let me bring
> My soul to comprehend it. Gone away!
> Asleep, to wake no more on any day?
> Nay, not asleep, awake, and wandering
> Through lands of bloom in a continuous Spring!
> I seek for light, yet find no certain ray;
> But this I know, again we shall not meet.

Yet he realized that those "lands of bloom" were but "vain dreams":—

> .....Oh, vain my soul!
> Put by these dreams, take up thy lead and go;
> Each lot, however bitter, hath its goal.
> Thy goal is death, not life, and when life ends
> The night that hides thy love, on thee descends.
> —Vain Dreams.

And why did he put by these "dreams":—

> Because no man who lives can surely tell
> What thing comes after death.....
> —Divine Possibility.

But more convincing still is his pleading in a fine poem entitled "In Grief," where the whole gamut of the pros and cons for the argument of immortality is stated at length:—

> And shall we meet with lips that yearn to kiss,
> Meet soul to soul as face to face on earth?
> And shall there be an end to death and dearth,
> Yea, shall there be a harvest time of bliss,
> And shall we stand together side by side,
> Never again to sorrow or divide?
> And shall at length our hearts be satisfied
> Full of wonder at the second birth?
> Shall this life past be as a dream outdreamed,
> The ghastly fancy of a fevered brain?
> Shall we at all remember the old pain,
> So great it past all human bearing seemed?
> If angels tell us of that mournful time,
> Will it then sound but as an empty rhyme
> Made by a boy in some forgotten clime?
> Ah, shall we say we have not lived in vain?
> Shall we stand up before the face of God,
> Stand up and sing a loud, glad song of praise,
> And bless him for the sorrow of our days,
> And kiss with pure cold lips the burning rod
> Wherewith he hath so stricken us that we > Might come at length within his home to be,
> Laid in the light of his divinity,
> First blinded by the glory of his face?

Oh, strange and unseen land whereto we come,
Are thy shores shores of day or shores of night?
As near we draw shall we indeed see light,
And shall we hear, through lessening wind and foam,
The voice of her we love come from the land,
And, looking shorewards, shall we see her stand
Girt round with glory on a peaceful strand,
Smiling to see our dark skiff heave in sight?

I cannot know; there is no man who knows;
We are and we are not, and that is all
The knowledge which to any may befall:
We know not life's beginning nor life's close,
'Twixt dawn and twilight shine the sunny hours
Wherein some hands plucked thorns and some hands flowers,
'Twixt light and shade are shed the sudden showers;
Yet night shall cover earth as with a pall.

Alas, poor song, all singing is in vain,
What thing more sad is left for thee to say?
Oh, weary time of life and weary way,
Can dead souls rise or gone joys come again?
Now by the hand of sorrow we are led,
Though sweet things come, they come as joys born dead;
Let us arise, go hence, for all is said,
And we must abide the breaking of the day.

Marston seems to have been absolutely dominated by this theme of mortality, and of the untenability of the idea of the persistence of consciousness after death:—

And so it comforts me, yea, not in vain,
To think of thy eternity of sleep.
—Not Thou But I.

.....when I am gone, gone far away
To that dim Land where shines no light of day.
—Worth Remembrance.

We part at Fate's inexorable command,
We part to meet no day. —At Parting.

But by her very grave,
Whereon the earth we heap.
Knowing no thing can save—
That this is death, not sleep—
We stand, but do not rave,
Too numb at heart to weep.
—At Hope's Grave.

But long, long years to weep in,
And comprehend the whole,
Great grief that desolates the soul,
And eternity to sleep in. —After.

When Marston says, we know not life's beginning nor life's close, it reminds me very much of Carlyle's words, "What went before and what will follow me, I regard as two impenetrable curtains." Death, Marston conceived in the most materialistic vein:—

.....when I am dead,
When all whereby men knew me turns to dust;
When deaf, and dumb, and sightless, I am thrust
Into dank darkness, where the worms are fed
By Death's gaunt hand, that breeds in my cold bed.
—Wedded Memories.

Go down, my songs, now to the land unknown,
The starless kingdom that hath Death for king.
About the silent porches close and cling.
Through breezeless air, where bird hath never flown,
Or waste, gray fields, wherein no flower hath blown,
Hills from whose barren bosom wells no spring,
Let your tones rise, and die in echoing. —Preludes.

Indeed, it was to that "fell sergeant Death," as the Master said, that this "poet of mortality" looked for deliverance. Even his philosophy failed in the long run to satisfy him. Nothing, save complete annihilation, would bring him to the haven of rest. The poignant yearning for Nirvana haunts us on every page:—

.....I, through tortuous paths no light makes plain,
Having less even than the blind man's faith,
With outspread hands, grope my dark way to Death.
—The Dark Way.

No "life everlasting" did Marston desire after death. The very memory of "the old pain" would kill the joy of that. He simply wanted, "before the end of all," to—

Lie down with thankfulness to know, ere long,
All things that ever were I shall forget. —A Wish.

But remembrance,—

Nay, God—if any God there be—
Grant me in Death, release from Memory.
—My Land.

Yet with all his foreboding gloom, Marston was a Secularist in his final view of things:—

Cease not! nor strive to solve Death's mystery,
For she may hear you, though no voice replies.
—Preludes.

Dead feet have rest, but living feet must climb
The steep, round which the eternal darkness is.
—Not Death, But Life.

Readers of this journal, who are possibly among the greatest admirers of James Thomson ("B.V.") will recall that it was at the house of Marston the author of the City of Dreadful Night called two days before his death, after the terrible three or four weeks which his biographers have told us of. "Alone with the dying poet, and unable from his blindness to assist him, poor Marston passed through a period of terrible distress." It was not until the arrival of William Sharp that it was known that Thomson was dying, and he was removed to University Hospital. The circumstances of poor Thomson's death affected Marston deeply, and it would appear that the lines in his sonnet, Haunted Rooms, have a direct connection with the great poet of pessimism:—

Must this not be that one then dwelling here,
Where one man and his sorrows dwelt so long,
Shall feel the pressure of a ghostly throng,
And shall upon some desolate midnight hear
A sound more sad than is the pine-tree's song,
And thrill with great, inexplicable fear?

Both Marston and Thomson had been cursed by Fate with an affliction, the one blindness and the other melancholia. It was no wonder, therefore, that they should arraign the so-called divine scheme of things, and kick at the fetters which "all paid, paying preachers" say are sent to "try us." It is an infamous lie, and Marston was bold enough to say so. Yet the puritans of art and literature have waxed indignant at this "didacticism"! No one desires, of course, that art or poetry should become, as Ingersoll says, a colporteur; but at the same time, art and poetry should portray the "night side of nature," as Thomson would say, as well as the "day side." All in this world is not beautiful, and all in life is not good; and to choose the beautiful and good, and hold them up before us as "a mirror of life," is to lie by implication. Let us not forget, therefore, that one of the few poets who have told us the truth is Philip Bourke Marston.[1]

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Charlatans.

VERY few men are so in love with the truth that they are willing to part from all their false ideals for it. The child clings to the pretty fable of Santa Claus; he does not wish to be undeceived. If a man gives utterance to some new truth loud enough for many to hear, they ostracize him and leave him to starve, if they do not even imprison or crucify him. But if a man preaches some antiquated falsehood they listen to him eagerly, and if he is very clever in playing on their ignorance they crown him, give him plenty of money, and follow him as if he were a god. Thus, the Freethinker has been for many years setting forth the plain truth about religious superstition, yet has gained comparatively few adherents, and it is absolutely certain that no man has ever made a fortune by reform work.

But Billy Sunday, the American religious buffoon, draws the largest audiences in the United States, and has made over one million dollars by methods and language that would disgrace an East-end costermonger. Hence it is that the world to-day is ruled by Charlatans. Webster defines a Charlatan as one who makes unwarrantable pretensions; so that the Kaiser is, perhaps, the finest specimen of the numerous breed now extant, his war lords ably assisting him in his game of gulling the German workers. In order to play this game, euphemistically described as empire-building, armaments of all kinds are necessary, and these are very expensive. The Kaiser and his war lords cannot pay for them because they produce no wealth, so the workers must pay. But how can they be induced to do anything so much against their own interest; how can they be made to deprive themselves, their wives, and children, of clothing, food, education, and shelter, merely to enable their rulers to play this expensive game? Certainly not by force, for the rulers are a mere handful, among millions of workers. By deception, then, "We will have these workers give us all we want," say these rulers, "and give it willingly, with swelling emotion, with loud cheers. We will invent a fiction called 'Fatherland.'" We will say:—

> It is not we who want your money—it is our common Fatherland. The honour of Fatherland calls for sacrifices. What are wives, children, limbs or life itself compared with Fatherland? It is your duty, our duty, to lay everything on the altar of Fatherland. Ask your clergy, those worthy men, servants of God, the God of Battles. They will truly tell you so. You believe in the living God, of course you do, you are not vile Atheists! Perish the thought! Very well, God commands you to love and obey your Kaiser and to fight, suffer and die for your Fatherland."

And by this fiction the workers are deceived, notwithstanding the plain fact that not one in ten thousand of them owns enough of his Fatherland to make a decent grave, and the further fact that he can enjoy more liberty and earn quite as good wages under the British or American flag as under his own. They pour their hard-earned wages into the coffers of the Kaiser and his war lords, and lay down their lives to assist them in their schemes of empire-building which cannot possibly be of any benefit to the workers. Their rulers have power, wealth and honour, while they have poverty, ignominy, a fiction, and a flag. What was the origin of royalty in every land? A thousand peasants bent their backs; on these were fifty priests in league with ten nobles; on these was the king. How was this preposterous pyramid reared? The king dazzled the peasants by his shining armour and flashing sword, for they loved to be thus dazzled. He made a bargain with the priests: "If you will teach the people that God wants me to rule over them I will tax them to support you."

He also bargained with the nobles and money-lenders: "If you will fight for me, and provide me with soldiers, and give me plenty of money, I will give you the exclusive ownership of all the land and banking facilities, whereby you will become the owners of slaves without the trouble and expense of looking after them."

He made no bargain with the peasants and shopkeepers; he merely dazzled them. On Coronation Day he appeared in all the panoply of war; the bishop poured some oil on him, and the priests bowed down to him as the Lord's anointed; the nobles surrounded him with their banners and spears and swords, and shouted, "Long live the King!"

What could the poor peasants and shopkeepers do but add their voices to the triumphal chorus, and get ready to surrender their money and their lives whenever the King called on them? And, indeed, at this day, if you were to suggest to a German populace that their Kaiser is nothing but a clever charlatan, they would promptly arrest you as a spy and shoot you.

There is an old gentleman in Rome who says that he is the Vicar of God, and, in order to prove it, he wears a crown three times as high as an ordinary king, and robes more splendid than any revue actress, and lives in a palace large enough to shelter a thousand evicted workers and their families. If he were really God's Vicar, he would prove it by saying and doing something extraordinarily useful. Does any sensible man believe that God would have to dress up his Vicar like Punchinello in order to make people believe in him? Certainly not. But if some charlatan wished to play on the superstitious weakness of the people, he would do just what the Pope does—put on a crown, dress up like an actress, live in a huge palace, and graciously allow the children of God to kiss his largest toe. If he preached and practised the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount, he would not have power enough to save from jail a poor woman who stole a loaf of bread. But because he is a charlatan, he stands in with emperors and other charlatans, and millions of people would die in his defence.

And what the Pope does on a large scale, the lesser representatives of God do on a small scale. Consider the real meaning of the peculiar costumes of the clergy and choristers, the images and lights, the incense and solemn music, the stained glass windows and pointed spires of the churches: are not all these things appeals to the superstitious feelings of the people?

Why do the higher clergy wear aprons and gaiters, and little strings on their top hats, and the common or garden curate appear always in a vest that buttons at the back, with a look on his face which we poor sinners never seem to have? Every man should be free to wear any kind of clothes he likes; but why should the clergy assume their peculiar garb if not to produce a certain aspect of sanctity?

Thus we see that in politics, religion, and, indeed, in many another profession, the men who are at the top are charlatans because the great majority of people have an aversion for the plain truth. Most people will always believe what they want to believe, and I never knew anybody to believe in the existence of ghosts who did not long for a life after death, and was anxious to find any kind of evidence in support of it.

And it does not necessarily follow that charlatans are any worse than other people; for if there is any blame in the matter, it should rather be laid on the people who are silly enough to be easily taken in. For my part, I blame nobody, for the simple reason that things are as they are because with our present development they cannot possibly be otherwise, and many very distinguished charlatans believe in themselves quite as firmly as the rest of the public. Such men rule the world to-day because the world likes to be ruled, and they may well argue that if they do not rule it, somebody else will; and is not that argument as good as many another?

Anyway, we are not justified in condemning charlatans unless we are quite sure that we ourselves always act and speak the plain truth. Few of us, unfortunately, are now in a position to do so, because we are caught in the widespread net of industrial slavery. And we are thus caught because we are too ignorant to long for, and too cowardly to achieve, freedom. A. F. Reeman.

Society News.

Although the same difficulties in procuring halls obtain in Newcastle as in London, we have a cheery letter from Mr. J. G. Bartram, the local secretary, who reports that the judicious distribution of literature has resulted in several new members. Dormant Branches please note. Southampton Branch reports an increase of membership, and a buckling on of armour for Mr. Cohen's visit to-day (March 17). The sale of the Freethinker is increasing rapidly, which is the best of all signs. The new Branch at Goldthorpe, in spite of the local autocrats, is rapidly widening its circle of friends, and is also looking forward to the President's visit on April 21, when a further accession of members may be expected.—E. M. Vance, Gen. Sec.

North London Branch, N.S.S.—Dr. Arthur Lynch, M.P., President of the New Republican League, had been booked for nearly three months, but without giving any reason, failed to keep his engagement last Sunday. Mr. Eagar generously threw himself into the breach, and the interest of the discussion was greatly enhanced by the points raised by Miss Nina Boyle. This Sunday the disputants are Mr. W. O. Baker and Mr. A. Eagar, the subject being "Is There a God?"—H. V. Lane, Hon. Sec.

Nuneaton Branch, N.S.S.—A successful meeting addressed by Mr. Willis of Birmingham is reported, and the future prospects of the Branch are very cheering. Please note the literature Secretary is a lady, Miss Lily Vernon, who is doing her little bit in the war against superstition.

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on March 7.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Brandes, Braddock, Eagar, Gorniot, Leat, Palmer, Samuels, Spence, Thurlow, Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of the previous meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Birmingham, Goldthorpe, Newcastle, Nuneaton, South London, Southampton, South Shields, Swansea, and the Parent Society; nineteen in all.

The Secretary reported the conclusion of a successful course of lectures at the West Central Hall, which, unfortunately, would not be obtainable again.

Arrangements for outdoor meetings were discussed, and, in view of the absence of so many speakers commandeered by the Government, the matter was left in the hands of the Secretary for the present.

On the motion of the South London Branch, it was resolved to contribute a sum of five guineas to the fund now being raised for the presentation of a portrait of Charles Bradlaugh, founder of the National Secular Society, painted by the Hon. J. Collier, to the National Portrait Gallery.

Owing to the prevailing conditions, the meeting was adjourned till Easter Tuesday, April 2.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Obituary.

On Wednesday, March 6, Freethought lost a staunch and estimable friend by the death of Mr. Charles Jortan, of Blackbourton, Clanfield, Oxon. Our friend, who was sixty years of age, though heavily handicapped from birth by a physical infirmity, and a great sufferer, devoted his life to the study and dissemination of Freethought principles, and was a constant reader of the Freethinker. The immediate cause of his death was sudden heart failure, brought about by grief at the return of his son to the Front. The unavoidably short notice, bad train service, and other untoward circumstances made it impossible to arrange for the Secular Burial Service Mr. Jortan had desired, and an earnest and devoted comrade was laid to rest, silently, on Saturday, March 9, in the presence of his sorrowing and devoted wife and family, to whom his fellow-members send their heartfelt sympathy.—E. M. Vance, Gen. Sec.

Buddhism and War.

In that most delightful of books, The Soul of a People, Mr. Fielding Hall describes the astonishment of English officers when the British forces invaded Burma. The country was seething with strife, soldiers were everywhere, and yet the Buddhist monks were going about their business as usual, "preaching of peace, not war, of kindness, not hatred, of pity, not revenge." English officers looked and scoffed. If Buddhism had preached hatred to the invaders, had organized and fought, then Christian soldiers would have understood its value. As it did neither of these things they looked on it as not worth noticing. The reason for all this, as Mr. Hall explains, is that Buddhism is not an accommodating creed. It says "Thou shalt not kill," and it means it. If the Burman fought, he did so because the call of his country came to him, and he felt it his duty to obey. But he was under no delusion. His priests told him that the unchangeable law—not of their making, but of nature—was that killing brought its inevitable consequence, and the law was the same for all. The priests said, "There is not one law for you and another for the foreigner; there is not one law for to-day and another for to-morrow." "Buddhism is the unalterable law of righteousness, and cannot ally itself with evil." And the result of this inflexible ethic is, says Mr. Hall, that Buddhism "has never bent to popular opinion, never made itself a tool in the hands of worldly passion..... No ravished country has ever borne witness to the prowess of the followers of the Buddha; no murdered men have poured out their blood on their hearthstones, killed in his name; no ruined women have cursed his name to high heaven. He and his faith are clean of the stain of blood." Buddhists, says Mr. Hall, have fought, "but they have never fought in the name of their faith. They have never been able to prostitute its teachings to their own wants."

Mr. Lloyd George and the Churches.

That is a magnificent testimony to the ethical quality of Buddhism, and by one who knows Buddhists intimately. And my mind recurred to the picture on reading Mr. Lloyd George's speech before the Free Church Council on March 13. Mr. George's avowed purpose was to gain the sympathy and help of the Churches—he even asked "reverently" for their prayers. The request may have been motived by policy or piety, and if the latter it would be only the latest of this quick-change artist's plans for winning the War. Still, one is fain to hope that the British case is not so desperate as to stand in dire need of prayer, which is always a bad indication. For men never pray for what they may secure by their own exertion. "God help me" is as sure an indication of helplessness as "God only knows" is of ignorance. But having come to the Churches for their prayers, the Prime Minister had to talk the language of piety. The War was to be kept a "Holy War," which we may remind Mr. Lloyd George is the German name for their war, and we were to keep it so until "God wills that it shall come to an end." So the duration of the War is dependent upon God's will. Its length is dependent upon him; and the responsibility for all the misery and slaughter is his. God is working out his plan, and the Free Church Council, and Mr. Lloyd George, and Lord Northcliffe, and Mr. Bottomley and the Kaiser are all instruments in his hands.

The Churches and the War.

Mr. Lloyd George told his hearers that the Free Churches had "nobly discharged" their obligations, and added that the Churches are "one and indivisible in this War." This is not quite the fact, as some clergymen have been turned out of their pulpits, not, be it noted, because they opposed the War, but because they held that the pulpit was not the place from which to preach war—but it is as near the truth as one may expect a politician to get. On that line the Churches have everywhere—even in Germany—"nobly discharged their obligations." For they have been as united in Germany as here, and, not only in this War, but in all wars. Can anyone recall a war in any part of Christendom in which the Churches of the nations engaged have not been substantially united? It is, indeed, part of the case against the Churches that whenever the nations have been on the verge of war, or engaged in war, the Churches have—to reverse Mr. Hall's statement of the Buddhists—preached not peace but war, not kindness but hatred, not pity but revenge. All their talk of love and brotherhood has been, to use Mr. George's own metaphor, "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals." They have been powerful to arouse passion, and absolutely powerless or careless to allay that fear and passion upon which the War lives.

How the Churches Make for Peace!

Mr. Lloyd George said the Churches must see to it that "war shall henceforth be treated as a crime punishable by the law of nations." Every sensible and every humane person will agree with that. War, as war, should be pilloried in the civilized world as the greatest of crimes, the greater because it is so largely impersonal in origin and conduct. But contrast that with all we have heard from the Churches about war since 1914. Has the talk of men, such as the Bishop of London and Mr. R. J. Campbell, concerning the "spiritual uplift" of war, the "moral cleansing" it has given the nations, etc., done anything to make the people realize that war is a crime? The people are realizing it, soldiers are realizing it, but we have no reason to thank the clergy of any denomination for this result. If war is ever to be treated as a crime, it must be realized as a crime—a crime on the part of those who initiate it, a source of demoralization with even those who are forced into it. War and militarism cannot have one effect in Germany and another here. To those who read human nature aright, Germany is to Europe as the drunken helot was to the Spartan—a picture of what other people may become if subjected to the same discipline, and to the play of the same ideals. And when to the Church's praise of war, we add their shameful silence concerning the exploitation of the public as disclosed in the recent reports, to say nothing of exploitation in other directions, the case against the Churches is pretty well complete. The Prime Minister said: "There is less hunger in this land than there was when the first cannon-shot was fired. There is no privation." We believe that to be substantially correct. But what are we to make of a society which can only provide enough food for its members when engaged in war, and leaves hundreds of thousands on the verge of starvation while at peace? Does anyone need a more complete demonstration of the inefficiency or evil of Christian influence than that? * * *

Digitized by Google

The Crime of Christianity.

We do not blame the Churches for having failed to prevent this War. The indictment of the Churches, properly drawn, goes deeper and is much wider than that. The real crime of the Churches is that, having exerted so great an influence, the European War should be looked upon as a matter of course, and even hailed as a seed-plot of human virtue. Suppose the Christian Church in all ages had said, as the Buddhist teachers said, "War is evil, war is a crime. You may be forced into war in self-defence; you may be so placed between the claims of country and the teachings of morality that to hearken to one means to ignore the other, or it may be that the claims of country is so imperative that one must needs make war and take the consequences. Still, the consequences are there. Brutality and demoralization follow war as inevitably as night follows day, and nothing can break the principle of causation in the moral any more than in the physical world." Suppose the Christian Church had kept to this teaching generation after generation; suppose the Christian clergy had said further, "We do not say you must not defend your country, or that armies must not be raised; we only insist that the raising of armies and the blessing of war is not our work as priests. It is our task to uphold the claims of a common morality and a common humanity even in the midst of war." Had these things been done generation after generation, and century after century, does anyone doubt but that the general feeling about war would be very different to what it is? Christians might still have waged war, and our judgments on the justification of particular wars would still have displayed wide variations; but in that case we could have said, as Mr. Hall does of the Buddhists, Christians have fought, but they have never fought in the name of their faith; they have ever been able to prostitute the teachings of Christianity to their own wants. The standing indictment against Christianity, is that it has during the whole of its history done nothing to discourage war and much to encourage it. To reverse Mr. Hall's statement of Buddhism, ravished countries have borne witness to the prowess of Christ; murdered men have poured out their blood on their hearthstones in the name of Christ; ruined women have cursed his name to High Heaven; tortures and outrages innumerable have been inflicted under the shadow of the cross, spoliation and wrong have flourished under its rule. The Christian convert is washed in the blood of Jesus; and that, truly, is a fitting symbol for a religion that has so often bathed in blood the countries of the world.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Flogging a Dead Horse?

SOME years ago, when the present writer had just delivered a lecture against the truth of orthodox Christianity, he was solemnly assured by a prominent representative of what is sometimes called progressive theology that the doctrines attacked had been abandoned by the Christian Church, and that Freethinkers generally were guilty of the absurdity of flogging a dead horse. As a matter of fact, the old orthodoxy still holds the field throughout Christendom. All departures from it endure only for a night and pass away, while the standard Creeds stay on throughout the ages. Comparatively liberal-minded clergymen often declare that Calvinism is dead; but those who go about with open eyes and ears know that, though slightly modified, it is alive to-day in many parts of the Western world. There are thousands of churches in our own land from whose pulpits it is being sedulously preached every Sunday. In a Welsh parish with which the writer is intimately familiar all the people, with one exception, attend church or chapel, and fully one half of them are Calvinists. They profess to be and are known as such. It is true that many of them do not know what Calvinism really stands for, their ignorance even of theology being profound; but multitudes superstitiously glory in it as the most logical system under the sun. To these Calvinism is absolutely true, and unbelievers in it are eternally damned. As to its logicality, there is not the shadow of a doubt. It is founded upon the invincible sovereignty of God. Paul calls God the Potter, and ourselves the clay upon which he works; and naturally the Potter has a perfect right to do whatever he likes with his own clay. Such is the logical defence of the doctrines of election and reprobation, of calling many and choosing a few. In the district already mentioned there is not one unbeliever, as even the gentleman who never darkens church or chapel door prides himself upon not being an Agnostic. All are believers; but what do they believe? A service recently attended will provide an adequate answer, so far as the Calvinists are concerned. The clergyman has been well trained in theology, and it was evident that his knowledge of his subject, from the theoretical point of view, was everything that could be desired. Indeed, it was as a technical theologian that he conducted the whole service; and although there was in himself a show of emotion, yet, judging by appearance, he signally failed to beget a corresponding feeling in the congregation. In point of fact, the service was an experience to endure, not to enjoy; the only item in the programme that was thoroughly alive being the singing, which from every point of view was a complete success.

To be entirely frank it must be admitted that the most conspicuous characteristic of the performance was its perfunctoriness. The prayer, which was long, was itself a discourse formerly addressed to the Deity, but clearly intended for those who heard it. Had there been a God listening to it, he would have been highly amused by the strange portrait of himself which it contained, though he might have had some difficulty in recognizing himself in it. Repeatedly was he told, "Thou art this," "Thou art like that," "Thou canst do this miracle," or "Thou art prepared to show thyself thus." He was further informed that, apart from his beloved Son, even he could accomplish nothing. Mankind could be saved only by being washed in the blood of the Lamb. The text of the sermon was John xiv., 27, and its subject, "Christ's Gift of Peace to the World." For half an hour the preacher expounded the chapter in which the text occurred. Exegetically no fault could have been found with this piece of work, but it showed the utter aloofness from life of the perfunctory preacher. To him there was no incongruity in the statements that God is known only in Christ, that salvation is impossible except through faith in the crucified, and that eternal perdition awaits all unbelievers in the next world. "I am the way," said Jesus. "Yes," added the preacher; "and there is no other way; not even God can do anything for a lost sinner unless he approaches him by that one road." Prayer is always answered if it is offered up within the circle of Christ's name. In that name there is irresistible magic, and God readily grants everything asked for in accordance therewith. Here the preacher wholly ignored the facts of every day life.

After rambling about in that fashion, he at last stumbled against his text which, for twenty minutes, he reiterated dozens of times in slightly different words, without giving utterance to a single illuminating idea. Orthodox to the very core he was throughout, but not once did he exhibit the least sign that he understood or could solve one of life's puzzling problems. "This is a time of stress and storm," he said many times; "and nothing can restore harmonious calm but Christ's peace in the soul." To him the War meant nothing but the nations' sin come to an awful head; but, at any moment, God could sit upon this devastating flood and exclaim, "Peace, be still," and instantly there would be an end to the horrors of the battlefield; but it never occurred to him to inquire why, in that case, the brutal bloodshed is allowed to continue year after year. According to him, the Devil is responsible for the War, to whom the Kaiser, like Judas Iscariot, has sold himself. This is the Devil's own day, which makes him the happiest of all God's creatures; but the curious thing is that the Kaiser never mentions his real master, but is perpetually giving thanks to God for so constantly acting as the avowed ally of the German nation. One wonders whether the preacher verily believes that God can stop the War whenever he wishes, and whether, if he does, he is not sorely perplexed by the fact that the conflict is permitted to go on unchecked.

Sometimes the clergy declare, in the most dogmatic style, that there are no Atheists in the world, or that, at heart, all are believers in God; but the more we come in contact with Church and Chapel life, or the more carefully we study public worship as it is generally conducted, the more we wonder whether there are any genuine, whole-hearted believers in the land. Is it not a fact that the generality of people simply take it for granted that they believe? Browning's type of Christian experiences the greatest conceivable difficulty in believing, to whom, in fact, it is the hardest thing to be a follower of Christ; but Browning, in most of his dramatic pieces, deals with exceptional cases. To him, as an Agnostic, it was incredible that any thoughtful person should find it easy to believe in the Christian religion. But to those who possess any close acquaintance with ordinary human beings, there is nothing more patent than the fact that religion means but little to them, or, rather, means everything in a vague, nebulous, and ineffectual sense. There are times when they are emotionally moved, when their apathy melts away, and religious ecstasy mounts the throne and reigns supreme for an hour or so. For the time being they are in the seventh heaven of delight, actually beside themselves with songfulness of heart. Such a state of elation or mental intoxication is generally induced in response to the impassioned appeals of gifted and well-trained pulpit orators, of whom the preacher we heard is not one; but it never lasts for more than a couple of hours, when they relapse into the normal state of indifference and lukewarmness. All the beliefs are always present in their minds, but, as a rule, in a quiescent, dormant, condition, although capable, any moment, of being quickened into a leaping, all-consuming flame of emotional life under the spell of an accomplished master of assemblies, of whom there seems to be a superabundance in the Principality of Wales. The Welsh are pre-eminently a poetical, emotional, people, and the majority of their preachers are skilful players upon the vibrant keys of their hearts. This explains the multiplicity of preaching meetings throughout the Principality, preaching being fully as popular there as racing is in England. The people are constitutionally in need of occasional sprees of some sort, and this is the species which most of them like best. This also explains why so many intellectual young Welshmen lose their faith under the influence of education at the various university colleges. At present what Wales needs above all else is, not a religious revival, of which she has had far too many for her good, but an intellectual awakening. Already, especially in South Wales, the new day of intellectual emancipation is at dawn, with the result that a few here and there, even in the North, are slowly rising out of the sleep of centuries into newness of mental life; and it is these brave, sturdy men and women who are destined to become the Saviours of the fair land of song. No wonder that so many clergymen are up in arms against what they describe as the anti-religious influence over thoughtful young people exerted by the university colleges. As yet Welsh Freethinkers are few in numbers, but they are sowing the seed, and there shall be a plentiful harvest in due time They are casting the leaven into the meal, and, 'ere long, the whole lump will have undergone a complete transmutation.

Yes, the horse we are flogging is still alive, but its death-knell has been sounded, and its decease is at this moment an absolute certainty. For many long ages Scotland was the slave of superstition, but to-day Caledonia has its face towards freedom. Wales is still in bondage, but the bracing wind of liberty is beginning to blow upon her mountains, and even now the day of her release is to be seen laboriously climbing over the horizon.

An Atheist Singer.

Poems and Ballads. 2 vols.; "Atalanta in Calydon"; "Songs before Sunrise"; "Tristram of Lyonesse." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Heinemann, 3s. 6d., net).

The publication of these handsomely bound and well-printed volumes arouses mixed feelings. Had they been issued years ago at the same modest prices they would have helped to widen the reputation of a very great poet during his lifetime. As it is they will but increase the wreaths upon his tomb. For, by virtue of his splendid lyrical gifts, Algernon Charles Swinburne's best work remains amongst the brightest gems of English literature so rich in glorious genius and transcendent talent. Tennyson has told us that, when Byron died, it was as though the firmament had lost a mighty star, in whose vanishing the world was left to chaos and night. Swinburne was more to us than Byron, for he had been a living glory of our state for half a century, and the star of his genius had wheeled so long and with such majesty that we had grown inured to his presence, and looked upon him as essential to the aspect of our heaven. So continuous was his influence that the intellectual life of our time runs in a channel largely of his making, and to ends that but for him had been shaped far other than they are.

A striking instance of the provincialism of the average English reader was the comparative unpopularity of Swinburne. Popularity, of course, may mean nothing or everything. It may be that of The Rosary, or of The Messiah, of East Lynne, or of Don Quixote. It may be absolutely damning, or the one incontestable proof of supreme merit. The tests are universality and endurance, for only noble work shall win and keep a lasting position. The best appeals in the long run to all, like Hamlet, though not in equal degree. Against clerical cliques, against furious opposition, by dint of sheer merit, Swinburne won his lasting place in art.

The greatest bar to Swinburne's popularity was that he sang Atheism, and made a clean sweep of supernaturalism. Shelley himself never sang with greater passion than Swinburne when he was arraigning Priestcraft at the Bar of Humanity. Just listen :—

Who gives a star and takes a sun away :
  Who shapes the soul, and makes her a barren wife
To the earthly body and grievous growth of clay ;
  Who turns the large limbs to a little flame,
And binds the great sea with a little sand ;
  Who makes desire, and slays desire with shame ;
Who shakes the heaven as ashes in his hand ;
  Who, seeing the light and shadow for the same,
Bids day waste night as fire devours a brand,
Smites without sword, and scourges without rod,——
The supreme evil, God.

In another poem he sings :—

I that saw where ye trod
  The dim paths of the night
Set the shadow called God
  In your skies to give light ;
  But the morning of manhood is risen, and the shadowless soul is in sight.

The "Hymn to Proserpine" represents a Pagan poet singing after the proclamation in Rome of Christianity, and Swinburne uses, ironically, the phrase ascribed, falsely, to the dying Julian the Apostate: "Thou hast conquered, Galilean" :—

Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean ; the world has grown gray with thy breath.
We have drunken of things Lethean, and fed on the fulness of death.

. . . . .

O lips that the live blood faints in, the leavings of racks and rods!
O ghastly glories of saints, dead limbs of gibbeted gods!
Though all men abase them before you in spirit, and all knees bend,
I kneel not neither adore you, but standing, look to the end.

He is equally outspoken in his "Lines Before a Crucifix" :—

No soul that lived, loved, wrought, and died,
Is this their carrion crucified.

Note the relentless questioning in the following lines addressed to Christ :—

The nineteenth wave of the ages rolls
  Now deathward since thy death and birth ;
Hast thou fed full men's starved-out souls ?
  Hast thou brought Freedom upon earth ?
Or are there less oppressions done
In this wild world under the sun ?

Swinburne dips his pen in flame in his "Song in Time of Order" :—

We have done with the kisses that sting,
  The thief's mouth red from the feast,
The blood on the hands of the king,
  And the lie at the lips of the priest.

What fearful derision is expressed in the "Hymn of Man" :—

O Thou the Lord God of our tyrants, they call thee, their God, by thy name.
By thy name that in hell-fire was written, and burned at the point of thy sword,
Thou art smitten, thou God, thou art smitten ; thy death is upon thee, O Lord.
And the love-song of earth as thou diest resounds through the wind of her wings—
Glory to Man in the Highest ! for man is the master of things.

Swinburne regarded prayer as folly, and he vents his scorn in music :—

Behold, there is no grief like this
  The barren blossom of thy prayer.
Thou shalt find out how sweet it is.
  O fools and blind, what seek ye there,
  High up in the air ?

Ye must have gods, the friends of men,
  Merciful gods, compassionate,
And these shall answer you again,
  Will ye beat always at the gate,
  Ye fools of fate ?

For fifty years Swinburne expressed Freethought ideas in his poetry, and his consistency is proved from the publication of "Atalanta in Calydon," the work of his young manhood, to the august utterances of his later years. No one can doubt for an instant his passionate sincerity. Hear the lyrical cry which burst from him in his "Mater Triumphalis," one of the noblest and most profound poems in the English language :—

I am the trumpet at thy lips, thy clarion
  Full of thy life, sonorous with thy breath ;
The grave of souls born worms and creeds grown carrion
  Thy blast of judgment fills with fires of death.

Thou art the player whose organ keys are thunders,
  And I beneath thy foot the pedal prest ;
Thou art the ray whereat the rent night sunders,
  And I the cloudlet borne upon thy breast.

I shall burn up before thee, pass and perish,
  As haze in sunrise on the red sea-line ;
But thou from dawn to sunsetting shalt cherish
  The thoughts that led and souls that lighted mine.

Shelley has told us that great poets are tried by a jury of their peers. Hear what George Meredith says of Swinburne : "Song was his natural voice. He was the greatest of our lyrical poets—of the world's, I should say, considering what a language he had to wield." What a tribute ! And we gratefully remember that the greatest poet of our time was an avowed Freethinker, and that his genius was enkindled at the altar of Humanity, which was standing before any other was built, and will endure when every other has crumbled into dust.

MIMNERMUS.

Ecce Domine!

Oh thou who did'st in Israel's mind instil
  "Thou shalt not kill,"
Oh thou who did'st devise for Abel slain
  The brand of Cain,

Behold thine own son's dying agony
  At thy decree ;
Behold foredoomed Iscariot's shameful death
  Willed by thy breath !

The Queen of Night.

III.

The tides on a tide-disturbed planet tend to modify the motions of the planet in such a manner that the tides cease to ebb and flow. As a result of this, constant high tide would be experienced in some places, and permanent low tide would be established elsewhere. When a globe revolves too slowly, the tidal influences urge the body round, and thus effect this end. If, however, a globe rotates with excessive rapidity, then the tide operates as a brake, and reduces the speed of rotation until the requisite adjustment is reached. Our planet is at present revolving too quickly to permit the high tides to remain at permanent stations, with the consequence that the tides exert themselves in slowing down the rotation. But the earth is a body so large, and the tides raised by a small orb like the moon so insignificant, that their influences in retarding the rapidity of the earth's rotation are barely appreciable. Yet, if these powers are small, they indubitably exist, and there is no escape from the conclusion that their accumulating influences are slowly but surely decreasing the velocity of the earth's rotation.

From this it follows that the length of the terrestrial day is increasing. But so slow is this extension that in 1,000 years the difference amounts to a mere fraction of a second. Yet slight differences such as this accumulate in the course of ages, for the changes invariably proceed in one direction. In this respect they differ from the periodic departures which characterize various other phenomena. With these, an advance is succeeded by a retreat, until the original conditions are restored. But the expansion of the earth's day is constant. All that is essential to enable our day to double, or even treble, its present length, is the passage of sufficient time.

At least a hundred million years are demanded by biologists for the evolution of life on our earth; while the geologists require as many, or even more, for the deposition of the sedimentary strata. Throughout this prolonged period the tides have been labouring in their task of diminishing our planet's speed. If, therefore, in coming ages the day is destined to attain a far greater length than it now enjoys, so, in the grey past, the rapidity of our globe's rotation must have been materially greater than at present.

In the lapse of ages, fractions of seconds mount up to seconds; these expand to minutes, and minutes roll into hours. Æons ago, our planet spun round in twenty hours; at a period even more remote, we can imagine a time when its axial rotation was accomplished in the reduced space of ten hours. Peering still further back into the recesses of the past, we may picture a period long predating the dawn of life, or even the formation of the most ancient rocks, when the earth was revolving in a day of five hours, or less. Thus we learn that an uninterrupted tidal drag, persisting throughout geological, or even pre-geological epochs, has enormously lessened our planet's rotational speed, while distending the day from one of four or five hours' duration to that of its present length of twenty-four hours.

The orb of night has served to raise the earth's tides and to diminish its rotational rate. But in its turn the terrene sphere has reacted on the moon. The earth's surface is extensively covered with water, and the presence of this fluid mass permits the moon to steadily recede from the earth. Were the earth solid throughout, its influence on the moon would be greater than it is. Calculations based on the experiences of a few centuries would reveal no material change in the distance of the moon. Precise relations between the path pursued by the moon and tidal influences are difficult to determine. Perturbations in the lunar orbit are very complicated, and these alone render any definite determinations extremely onerous.

But when we approach the problem from an astrophysical standpoint, certain conclusions become imperative. There can be no question that the earth's powers of reaction have, in the course of the ages which have elapsed since the genesis of the moon, constrained our satellite to travel in its contemporary orbit. And as we journey back in time, the nearer and nearer the moon is seen to approach her earth-mother. Much as we see the day decline as we travel backwards, so does the moon's distance from the earth diminish, until we reach a period when the two bodies were in contact. Far different must our planet and its satellite then have been to what they now are. The combined mass of the earth-moon system was then in a state of incandescence, while at a still earlier stage it must have been in a gaseous condition. Even after their separation into two distinct bodies, the nascent earth and moon were spinning round each other, the period of the evolving moon's rotation being determined by the time occupied by the revolution of the larger object, which subsequently became the earth. After the two bodies had established a complete separation, they continued to be attracted one by the other as if they were united by the firmest bonds. The very rapid rotation which characterized these bodies would account for this. Just as a grindstone, when driven with immense velocity, will fly into fragments, so did the earth and moon part company when centrifugal overcame centripetal force.

No further disruption seems likely in the case of the earth. Its present rotational speed is well within the limits of safety. The equatorial bulging of our globe, however, is the result of the adjustment of the form of our sphere to the requirements necessitated by its revolution. It is thought that the earth could revolve on its axis in twelve instead of twenty-four hours before reaching the critical stage at which disruption would occur. But were the earth's day reduced to a few hours only then the tension evolved by the excessively rapid rotation would speedily rupture our planet.

In the dim and distant past this state of tension arose, and the moon was duly delivered by her earth-mother. In this parting of parent and offspring the tidal power of the sun participated. The glowing mass of our planet cast away a large fragment, and the particles of this fragment as they cooled and contracted, arranged themselves into globular form, and thus arose the moon.

As previously stated, our satellite is slowly receding from us, and important as its tide-raising powers still are, they are insignificant in comparison with those exerted when the moon was a nearer neighbour to the earth. As the moon's tidal influences have dwindled during past ages, so they will continue to diminish through the approaching years. With the constant decrease of lunar tidal authority, our globe will turn more and more tardily on its axis. In the course of unspeakably remote stretches of future time our day will increase, not merely from twenty-four to thirty hours, but even to a period of two of our present days. Nor is this all. The earth's rotation will, in the passage of periods, still further remote, gradually so greatly lessen that the terrestrial day will ultimately equal, if not exceed, the period embraced by sixty of our present ephemeral days of a paltry twenty-four hours.

When the day has reached the length of 1,400 hours the moon's orbit will have widened, and its distance considerably increased. The lunar rotational period, as well as its period of orbital revolution, will have become so greatly augmented that the day and the month will be of equal length, each comprising a period of 1,400 hours. In this transformed state of lunar and sub-lunar affairs, our earth will ceaselessly present the same face to the moon, much as that orb constantly turns the same surface towards the earth.

Without the least violation of well-established physical principles, the foregoing conclusions have been necessitated, chiefly through the researches of the late Sir George Darwin. Although relatively a body so small, the tides raised by the moon have ever tended to slacken the speed of the earth, so that eventually the two bodies must turn one surface only to each other. When this condition of affairs has been arrived at, lunar tides will rise and fall no longer. High planetary tides will prevail in some terrestrial localities and low tides in others, but the position of these tides will become stationary. High tides will always occur in one region and low tides at another. The moon will sail throughout the year in the same part of the sky. It will be visible to the inhabitants of one surface of the earth only, for the opposite face of our planet will never be presented to our satellite. If, in these far-off ages, earth-dwellers insane enough to engage in sanguinary strife still survive, the light of the moon will refuse its assistance to the nocturnal aerial invader on that hemisphere which is permanently turned from our satellite's beams. When the moon's tidal influences have ended, solar power will still continue to operate in generating tidal movements, and these will serve to further retard the axial rotation of the earth. Thus, the time will arrive when the earth's day will be longer than the month, which is now determined by the period occupied by the moon in its revolution round our globe.

A striking analogy of this is afforded by the motions of the Martian moons. Mars possesses two small satellites, and the one nearest to the ruddy planet presents similar features to those ultimately destined to prevail in the earth-moon system. Mars revolves in about twenty-four and a half hours, while its inner moon runs round its primary so rapidly that it accomplishes three journeys as the planet itself turns over once. Mars and his moons form a far smaller system than ours, but they display in miniature within the solar system itself, a contemporary picture of the relations which will reign in the terrestrial and lunar partnership in the unspeakable abysses of future time.

(To be concluded.)

Militarism, the Church, and the Education Bill.

Without being in the least pro-German, the Freethinker has consistently exposed the falsity of the clerical claim, so often made in the past, that Germany's misdeeds were due to her alleged Atheism. The historical connection between the teaching of religion in Germany and the building up of the militarist system on the basis of frightfulness has been again and again pointed out. But the Christian lie has served its purpose, and the time has now arrived, it would appear, for a complete volte face on the part of those who so industriously propagated it.

For the "knock-out blow" shows no signs yet of being delivered; and, with the emergence of the possibility of concluding a peace of compromise, rightly or wrongly it has been decided that the militarist system shall be firmly established in this country. In the absence of a great part of the electorate on various forms of national service, and a part which will to a large extent be the fathers of the immediate future, a determined effort is being made to rush into law a new Education Bill. A novel method of furthering this object is the publication of anonymous advertisements[1] in the press, couched largely in terms of vague rhetoric, and urging the overworked portion of the community still left in the country, "For your own sake, your children's sake, your country's sake, do all you can to push through the Education Bill."

There is something suspicious about this sudden rhetorical fervour which challenges inquiry; and the disingenuous candour of style, so typical of similar advertisements of Whatyoumaycallit's backache pills, does not tend to allay the suspicion. In this, for instance: "Let us be honest and ask ourselves, while there is time, whether the democracy of this country is the best educated and the most morally disciplined democracy among the nations of the world?" The question answers itself by implication, just as the other advertisement will ask: "Are you quite sure that your symptoms, such as dizziness, headaches, quivering of the eyelids, etc., are not a sign of something more radically wrong?" Without giving a direct answer, both advertisements finish up by proclaiming the urgent and unfailing remedy.

The purpose of this article is to point out the dangers of so-called "moral discipline." Having provided for compulsory attendance at continuation school up to the age of eighteen, the Bill goes on to provide that the local authority may compel young persons to attend for an additional two hours per day at a prescribed place for physical and social training, camps, centres, and equipments for which shall be provided. Some idea of what form this training is likely to take may be gathered from the organized movement now proceeding for establishing cadet corps in the schools throughout the country. These corps have been "recognized" by the War Office for some time, but the latest development is the extension of "recognition" to the Boys' Brigade as part of the cadet organization.

Moreover, no less a person than the Secretary for Scotland, speaking at a Boys' Brigade function on March 1: "hoped his presence might be taken as betokening the interest and approval with which His Majesty's Government regarded the great Boys' Brigade movement." (Has that any connection, by the way, with the movement which is also going on for raising these brigades in every chapel and church throughout the country?) He spoke of its religious, physical, and military training, and declared: "It was to the youth of the country that the Government looked for the success of the great task of reconstruction, and he knew of no training and equipment better fitted to enable them to carry out that task than that obtained in the Boys' Brigade." This should make fairly obvious what kind of moral discipline is referred to in the advertisement above quoted. The Glasgow Herald of March 1, in announcing the War Office recognition of the Boys' Brigade, said: "As recognized cadets, it is felt that the Brigade would then be in a stronger position to insist that the moral and social training of boys is as essential to the welfare of the nation as their physical development."

The officially-stated object of the Boys' Brigade is: "The advancement of Christ's Kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of Obedience, Reverence, Discipline, Self-respect, and all that tends towards a true Christian Manliness." And there we have it. This is the "great movement" upon which His Majesty's Government looks with interest and approval. Self-respect, be it noted, comes last in the list, based, as it must be, on the other (admirable?) qualities referred to.

The whole thing is nothing less than a design for the enslavement of the minds of the boys of the nation by the twin despots of Militarism and State-subsidized superstition. That it is being readily entered into by those facile and self-interested sycophants—the clergy—is just what one would expect. But whether the people of this country are going to allow themselves to be rushed into such an authentic replica of "Prussian Militarism" is yet to be seen.

Freethinkers, at any rate, should not deceive themselves as to what is afoot.

Acid Drops.

So many minor writers have turned religious for the period of the War, but they do not appear to improve the parlous condition of Christianity. Speaking at the City Temple, Mr. John Oxenham, the popular novelist, said "all this suffering is intended to turn us back to God." The idea is not new; but what sort of a Heavenly Father is Mr. Oxenham thinking of, when one remembers that the flower of the manhood of the world is arrayed for slaughter, and civilization itself threatened with disaster? Mr. Oxenham had better stick to his romantic love-stories.

In the course of the same address Mr. Oxenham said:—

> If we had won the War two years ago it would have been the worst thing that could have happened to us as a nation.

Interviewed later, Mr. Oxenham said he declined to withdraw a single word. We must get back to God, and presumably God is prolonging the War so that we may get there. This is quite "Providential," and illustrates the goodness and wisdom of the Christian deity. He permits thousands upon thousands to be killed all over Europe so that we may get back to God. And, presumably, he will keep the War on until we do. And, in that case, the War looks like lasting for ever, for the longer the War lasts the farther away from God people are getting.

The War is, in Mr. Oxenham's view, God's experiment in conversion. And a pretty job it is when one looks at it. For one must observe that all the killed are certainly not being brought back to God. They die as they have lived. At most the people who are benefited are those who are left alive. And if the War is being prolonged for our benefit, we do not see why Germany should be blamed. It is part of the divine plan. The worst thing that could have happened would have been the stopping of the War two years ago—and thus have prevented the sinking of hospital ships, and bombing of children, and women, and old men, and all the multiplied barbarities of the War. So thinks Mr. Oxenham. For we are getting back to God—via poison gas, and flame-throwers, and air-raids. Good God!

The new postmaster of Jerusalem is named Smith, and the Lord Chief Justice of England is named Isaacs. Curious, isn't it?

A hat belonging to Lord Jellicoe has been sold by auction for £125. Ecclesiastics will smile, for they know how to raise money on relics of people who never existed.

"At least a thousand babies per week could be saved from death if a Ministry of Health were established," said Dr. Saleeby at Whitfield's Tabernacle. This is not a compliment to "Our Heavenly Father," but the congregation allowed the remark to pass without protest.

Prebendary Bolton, vicar of St. Mary's, Lichfield, died whilst in Sunday-school. There is no moral.

The Vicar of St. George's, Wallsall, in resigning his living, says that "the congregation have been unworthy of the efforts put forth, manifesting a lack of earnest co-operation, loyalty, and response time and again. I have scarcely had the spirit to conduct the service." We fancy this gentleman's experience is not singular. And, quite seriously, nothing can be more serious to a simple-minded, honest clergyman, than to see his congregation dwindling through no fault of his own, and in spite of all his efforts. The less honest ones face the situation in a different spirit. And the Freethinker knows that the wails of the honest, and the trickery of the dishonest, are equally unavailing against a tendency that represents the impact of civilized thought on primitive superstition.

Soul-saving appears to be a profitable business. The evangelist, Gipsy Smith, has been received by the King at Buckingham Palace.

Invited to preach in the City Temple, London, the Rev. Conrad Noel has been forbidden by the Bishop of London. Apparently the Christian charity of Churchmen does not yet extend to Nonconformists.

The Roman Catholic Church exploited the death of John Redmond for all it was worth. Not only was a special service held at Westminster Cathedral, London, but at Wexford kneeling nuns lined the railway as the funeral train passed. Over 500 priests preceded the hearse on leaving the station. Poor, priest-ridden Ireland!

It is the hardest of all things to kill a superstition. No mental effort is needed for its reception, and once acquired it sticks. And, of course, if a man is a bit of a liar, the matter is all the easier. So we are not surprised to learn, from the Montreal Daily Star, that the "Angels of Mons" has turned up in Canada. The Rev. G. A. Kubrong, of St. John's Anglican Church, says he was in France and saw them. So did the Germans. There was St. George, and crowds of aerial cavalry charging the Germans. And as a final proof, when a party of soldiers was afterwards sent out to investigate, they could find no trace of the spiritual army. That settles it! But what a hard job it is for an ordinary liar to hold his own in these times of war! A pre-war liar is hopelessly outdistanced from the start. These late comers ought to be handicapped in some way.

Providence was too busy watching the fall of the sparrows to prevent the death of a Plumstead baby who was fatally burned through pulling the guard from the front of the fire.

Selina Smith, a Reading gipsy, was fined £5 for fortune-telling. There are 50,000 parsons in this country who tell people where they will "spend eternity," but these gentlemen are never fined.

Speaking at the Holborn "tank," the Bishop of London declared: "All my income is gone." The income of this elderly bachelor is £200 weekly, sufficient to keep fifty families in comfort. He should now be able to appreciate the blessings of poverty.

The Daily Chronicle declares that Dean Inge is "no longer a gloomy dean." Has he given up his belief in the "eternal fry of almost everybody born to die," as Byron describes it?

The late Mr. John Redmond's oratory was masterly, but he astonished the House of Commons once by a little lapse. During a debate he said: "I fancy I heard an honourable member smile." This is not so good as the outburst of a Christian Evidence lecturer: "All creation shows the footprints of an Almighty hand."

The Annandale Presbytery is "up agin'" the Government. Owing to the refusal of the Government to allow petrol to be used for taking people to church, the "shame" and "hardship" existed of people not being able to get to church. The Rev. Mr. Atkinson wanted to know why, if petrol could be used for business purposes, it could not be used for church? Hear, hear! It is all a matter of business. All the same, we fancy the unfeeling Government will tell people they must walk to church, or stay away. Now the Presbytery had better pass a resolution pointing out that the reason why we don't win the War is due to the Government treatment of the Annandale Godites.

The matter has since been carried into Parliament. Mr. Gulland asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he would amend the motor spirit order so that a car might be used for conveying people to Church. The reply was—to use the stupid Parliamentary expression—in the negative. But the impudence of pietists knows no limit.

The following was overheard in a Barrow tram car by a correspondent: Child, watching train loads of 9·2 howitzers passing: "What are they, daddy?" Father: "Christian evidences."

The Lord Mayor of Cardiff called a prayer-meeting a few days ago to "intercede" for the success of the British arms n the coming great offensive. We understood that God was already on our side, and we hope the Lord Mayor is not under the impression that this one of our Allies is going back on us, or needs his memory jogging. But while these people were interceding, why on earth didn't they ask God to finish the whole job—and give him a time limit?

The Mayor of Swansea (Alderman Ben Jones), as reported in the Cambria Daily Leader for March 13, is of opinion that "if the people of the land had been more God-fearing the terrible calamity of war would not have happened." Had the Mayor forgotten that God is "a man of war," "the Lord mighty in battle," "the God of hosts," and that in olden times he led the armies of Israel in person? Is he not also aware that the pious Bishop of London calls the present War "a glorious day of God"?

Mr. Lloyd George grew quite flippant in one part of his address before the Free Church Council. There has he said "been only one successful Food Controller in the history of the world—the one who made five loaves and two fishes feed a multitude." We quite agree that this kind of a food controller would be of great service, and as Mr. Lloyd George believes that the Allies are carrying out God's will, it is about time the latter lent a hand in an unmistakable manner. But God does nothing when the doing is much needed.

Sir Hedworth Meux, M.P., knows more about ships and beer than theology. In the House of Commons he is reported to have said that Christ was the friend of publicans and sinners, using the word "publican" in the modern sense; whereas the New Testament word meant a tax-gatherer—then, as now, a much-hated person.

The Bishop of Exeter says "we must feel the deepest regret that, at a time when God's hand is heavy upon us, wicked men should presume to destroy Christian marriage." If his lordship reflects a little longer upon the matter, he will find that more harm has been done to "Christian marriage" by monks, priests, and nuns, than by all "wicked" people put together.

Oh, those "gentlemen of the press"! The Evening Standard (London) says: "The German is as the poles asunder from the other people of the earth. He has become a Materialist egoist. His god is large and powerful and ruthless." When will pressmen learn that Materialists have no gods, large or small? They leave such playthings for the innocents of Fleet Street.

Cleopatra's Needle, on the Embankment, and the lions in Trafalgar Square, have been used for advertising purposes; but an American lady has surpassed this method of publicity. She glued a slip of paper on the bronze statue of Saint Peter in a church in Rome. The paper bore the inscription in English and Italian: "From the Teutonic plague, O Lord, deliver us." If this method of advertising becomes popular, General Elections in the future should be quite exhilirating affairs.

Mr. Joseph Hocking is writing some War articles for the Daily Chronicle. He has been at the Front, and is describing—what he would have described as well had he stayed at home. His article has too much of a standardized ring to be impressive. But in the course of his article he says that "A grey, grizzled, old major" said to him: "you can't go through the battle of Ypres without believing in Almighty." We think we could present that "grey, grizzled, old major with the names of some who went through the battle without believing in God, and who came out of it more convinced Atheists than they went in.

Said Dean Inge, as reported in the Star of March 13:—

> As to the horrors of war through which we were now passing, it was necessary that the world should be convinced of sin. The experience was a terrible one, but other methods of raising humanity had been tried in vain.

We advise Dean Inge to open his eyes to the facts around him, not only in this country, but also in others, and then tell us what amount of elevation has resulted from the War thus far?

The Herald for last week published a report of a visit to the Front by one of the men invited to go out by the Government, Mr. R. Palmer, of the National Union of General Workers. Mr. Palmer says that in all his travels he only came across one man who was full of the martial desire to march to Berlin, and he was a chaplain in one of the hospitals.

Archdeacon K. F. Gibbs stated at Stevenage (Herts) that over 500 soldiers, who had been fighting at the Front, have applied to be trained for clergymen after the War. We can quite understand the longing for an easy job with nothing to think about, after all these men have gone through.

There is no doubt that Christianity does encourage feelings of love and brotherhood. The Daily Express of March 12 reports the Rev. C. A. Eaton, of Madras Avenue Church, N.Y., as saying: "When I stand before the judgment seat of the Almighty I want to be able to look my God in the face and tell him that I hit the Germans at least one good wallop before I shuffle off.....I say to 'Hell with the Germans!'" And in case a "German propagandist" is encountered Mr. Eaton advises "Hammer his face off. You have ropes here and steel girders. Use them." We hope, when Mr. Eaton does meet God Almighty, he will remind him of what a terrible blunder he made in creating the Germans.

Mr. James Munyon, the famous pill man, spent somewhere about half a million annually in advertising his wares. A great deal of this money was spent on religious newspapers, and this led an American journalist to say that "religious newspapers must take pills or die," others will see a fitness between quack medicines and quack theology.

Rev. David James, a Baptist minister of Swansea, was, on March 15, sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for sheep stealing, and his son to nine months. The skins of some of the missing sheep were found in the James' possession on their farm. Jesus said: "Feed my sheep," Rev. James, evidently, believed in collecting them.

Concerning the "Freethinker."

Next week, and until further notice, the Freethinker will consist of twelve pages instead of the usual sixteen.

For three and a half years of war we have held it unchanged in size and price, and had hoped to remain unchanged to the end. But the struggle gets keener each month, and the burden heavier. Paper is now about forty per cent. dearer than it was last year, and is increasingly difficult to get; while the almost certain prospect of the immediate future is a greater scarcity and a still higher price. If hard work or greater personal sacrifice would have obviated the alteration in the paper, we should have kept on in silence; but the end of the War is not in sight, and the change must be made.

Our aim has been to keep the loss on the paper at the figure it was last year, and although we shall be using henceforth twenty-five per cent. less paper, the actual cost per week will still be greater than it was during the past twelve months. Still, we are hopeful that when we make our annual statement, it will not be worse than the last one. It may even be better.

Most of our readers will be surprised that the change was not made earlier; we have held on to the very last moment. And we are quite sure that while no one will welcome the alteration, their devotion to and interest in the paper will in no degree be diminished.

Now for the brighter side. While there will be four pages, or two leaves, less in the paper, the reading matter will not be greatly diminished. The advertising space will be cut down. There will be more small and less large type used. Articles will be briefer, without any loss in value (contributors will please take the hint), and in this way the loss to the reader will be trifling. It will be more a saving of paper than a saving of matter.

Finally, everyone will be pleased to learn that the circulation of the paper is still moving upward. Last week we printed our largest number—and ran out of print. We could have sold more. Everywhere the paper is making new friends, and getting a firmer grip on old ones. No paper, I think, ever had a more devoted body of readers, and if adversity tries one's metal, it also discloses one's friends. These have worked well for the paper, and I know they will keep on working. New readers are still to be obtained, and we want all we can get. It is our ambition to make the power of the Freethinker commensurate with its value.

So, while we are diminishing our size, we have no anticipation of any decrease in usefulness. The Freethinker will remain the Freethinker, carrying its message of sanity and humanity wherever it penetrates. Through three and a half years of war our friends have helped us with ungrudging devotion to make the paper what it is. We feel certain that we can rely upon their support to the end. We value that support more than we can say. It has cast a silvery radiance on the darkest clouds, and has enabled us to face with a light heart the most difficult of situations.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 24, Leicester; April 28, Nuneaton.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.—W. Owen, 2s. 6d.; T. B. Hutton, 2s. 6d; Harry Shaw, 10s.

W. Owen.—Have acknowledged the subscription, but no P.O. was enclosed in your letter.

G. T. Whitehead.—Have sent your note on to the party concerned.

A. Radley.—The letter contains the usual kind of statement, but, from our own experience, we do not think you are likely to get much "forrader." Whether you pursue the subject or not, is for you to decide. The writer of the letter seems quite honest, but, unfortunately, there is no necessary connection between honesty and accuracy.

C. T. Shaw.—Pleased to learn that you hold the record in your town for Freethinker. Hope you will soon lose it, and that someone else will beat you, or at least try to do so. We feel sure you will welcome the attempt. Sorry we could not secure a copy of the pamphlet you required.

G. A.—Three new readers in a fortnight is good work. Keep it up. There are thousands of them waiting, ready to be enlisted.

H. Truckell.—We had a paragraph written on the matter, but thanks for cutting. There is no fear of the paper shortage leading to the disappearance of the Freethinker, but it makes its continuance increasingly difficult—far more so than we ever anticipated.

F. Driscoll.—There is nothing in the argument from causation. Causation is a statement of the relations between phenomena, it can have no meaning when applied to an assumed relation between phenomena as a whole and an assumed something beyond. For the argument from design we suggest your reading our Deity and Design.

Mr. H. Landsberg writes: "I have been a constant reader for some years now, and I take this opportunity of expressing the pleasure I have in the Freethinker. Though often I wish that its pages were open to subjects of an economic nature—since, after all, a half-starved stomach produces a half-starved mind, and you will understand this analogy—yet I have often thought that the liberation of humans from the yoke of religion and religious atmosphere will, by broadening the mind, help towards the advance in other directions. I have always endeavoured to spread the ideas of Freethought whenever and wherever possible, and have always tried to show that the exploitation of the mind by parsons is as criminal an act as the exploitation of the body by the capitalist."

Ignotus.—Your letter reached us too late—Tuesday midday—for insertion this week. Shall appear in next issue.

Will Freethinkers in Hull who are willing to engage in organizing Freethought work please communicate with Mr. D. A. Macheson, 82 De La Pole Avenue, Hull? Years ago Freethought used to be active in Hull, and there is no reason why it should not be active once more.

C. F. Budgen.—Thanks for suggestion re paper shortage. We rather fancy your informant confused payment to Chaplains with the Army and those near a camp to whose churches soldiers were ordered.

A member of the N.S.S. Executive is at present home from the Front in a Lincoln hospital. He would be pleased to meet any Freethinker who would care to visit him. Will any who are so disposed please write Miss Vance, who will supply them with all particulars.

A. J. Marriott.—We hardly care to express an opinion in these columns of the policy of the papers or societies you name.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Sugar Plums.

Next Sunday (March 24) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures at Manchester. This will close the Branch's winter campaign, which, we believe, has been very successful. We have every expectation of a good rally of friends and supporters, which will bring the season to a triumphant close. Mr. Cohen is taking for his evening subject "The Questions of Ignotus." This work, which was noted in these columns some weeks ago, has created considerable local interest, and a large meeting is anticipated, with also a lively discussion.

The Bere Ferrers Parish Magazine notes the death of Mr. Hugh Courtney Luttrell, late M.P. for Tavistock, and pays a high compliment to his character and influence. It points out that, "Religiously," Mr. Luttrell "was a professed Freethinker; religious forms, ceremonies, and beliefs did not appeal to him, as his last wishes indicated.....As a neighbour and employer he was consistently kind, gentlemanly, and genial.....He leaves a widow and six children. Mrs. Luttrell, who shared his views and ideas, is well known in the parish, where she has always visited the sick and the poor, and been a good friend to many in their need and sickness." Such a notice in a parish magazine speaks very highly for all concerned. We offer our sincere condolences to Mrs. Luttrell and family.

Mr. Lloyd had two good meetings, large and enthusiastic, at Abertillery, on Sunday last. He also addressed a meeting at Blaina, where Freethought propaganda is quite new. Here, again, the meeting was a great success. All of which verifies our opinion that the whole of South Wales is ripe for the harvest. To-day (March 24) Mr. Lloyd lectures at the Secular Hall, Leicester. There will, we are sure, be a good gathering of "saints" there.

The Western Daily Mail of March 11 reports an address by the Rev. C. W. Martin, in which the speaker fully endorsed all we have said concerning the unpopularity in the Army of Church Parade. He said: "By the majority of soldiers, both officers and men, padres were not wanted, and enforced Church parades were responsible for a good deal of feeling." The men, he says, don't want them, nor do the padres. If that last statement be accurate, the remedy should be easy of application. Our own information is that a compulsory Church parade is very often the result of a direct application from the chaplain.

In another column we publish a letter from an Atheist commanding officer on this subject that is of more than usual interest. The writer is in a position to speak with authority, and all he says bears out our information from other quarters. Meanwhile, we might suggest that if Freethinking soldiers would ask for exemption from Church parade, on the ground of being Freethinkers, it would often be granted. We feel sure that officers generally have no desire to force upon their men a duty which is repugnant to them, and the non-fulment of which in no way detracts from their value as soldiers.

Mr. T. F. Palmer delivers the closing lecture of the season at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, to-day (March 24), at 7 o'clock. His subject is "The Warfare Between Science and Religion." This is Mr. Palmer's first visit to Birmingham, and we hope all local friends will see that the theatre is well filled.

An attempt is being made to start a Branch of the N.S.S. in Portsmouth. Will all those who are interested in the matter be good enough to communicate with Mr. Norman Crosby, 118 Commercial Road, Portsmouth?

Tales of Our Times.

III.

LITTLE Dick and Willie, aged respectively ten and eight, having said their prayers and bidden nurse good-night, were reviewing the events of the day before falling asleep.

"What do you think Tommy Smith asked our teacher in Sunday-school to-day?" said Dick. "He asked her if God knew that Adam and Eve would disobey him when he told them not to eat any of those apples."

"And what did teacher say?" inquired Willie.

"She said that of course God knew it, because he knows everything that is going to happen. And then Tommy Smith said, if God knew they would eat the apples, how could they help eating them, because God can never make a mistake about what he knows."

"Of course he can't," said Willie, beginning to yawn a little.

"Then teacher said that Adam and Eve were not bound to eat the apples, because they had free will, and could do as they liked."

"That seems right too," said Willie, in a very sleepy voice.

"But Tommy didn't seem to think so—you know what an obstinate little beggar Tommy is. He answered back that what God knows will happen must happen, and so Adam and Eve had to eat those apples whether they had free will or not; so what was the use of ordering them not to? But teacher didn't explain anything more to him, but told him that little boys mustn't argue about things they don't understand.

Willie was too sleepy to make any reply to this, and so, unlike Milton's fallen angels "in wandering mazes lost" through discussing the same subject, the two little brains were soon lost in the healthy slumber of childhood.

Next day, on their way home from school, Dick and Willie had to pass old Farmer Jones' apple orchard. Over the wall could be seen the boughs laden with the golden fruit which had been the little boys' daily temptation for a week past. To-day the temptation was stronger than ever. That crusty old bachelor, Farmer Jones, was reputed to have "more money than he knew what to do with," so how could he miss a few apples? and how lovely those apples did look this morning, to be sure. No one was about, and it would be so easy to climb over the low wall and help themselves to just a few. One shake of that heavily laden bough would bring down more than sufficient to fill their pockets. And so, alas, Dick and Willie "fell" as easily as they expected the apples to do.

But, unfortunately, Farmer Jones and his head man on the farm happened to be not far off. They concealed themselves behind two trees as the boys climbed over the orchard wall, and emerged just as the marauders were about to pick up the treasure from the ground. So Dick soon found himself in the relentless grasp of Farmer Jones, while his man John held the collar of Willie's jacket in a grip of iron. And Farmer Jones had a cane too.

"Now, you young rascals," shouted Farmer Jones, angrily, "what have you got to say for yourselves?"

Dick was very white, but looked Farmer Jones squarely in the eye without any sign of cringing. Suddenly a flash of inspiration came to him—perhaps suggested by the apples. It seemed a forlorn hope, but was worth trying.

"Very sorry, sir," he said, "but we really couldn't help it. You see, God knew we were going to steal your apples, so we had to do it."

Digitized by Google

"God knew? What the Devil do you mean?" roared Farmer Jones.

"Well, sir, yesterday in Sunday-school our teacher told us that God knows everything that is going to happen. So, as our trying to steal your apples has happened, God knew it would happen, therefore it must have happened. So, of course, we couldn't help trying to steal your apples."

Now Farmer Jones, though undoubtedly a crusty old bachelor, was not altogether without a grim sort of humour, and before such a direct appeal to it his temper completely vanished, so he said encouragingly: "Quite right, my boy. I am glad to find that you have such a wise teacher in your Sunday-school. Of course God knew that you would come into my orchard after apples this morning, but it seems he knew more than that. He also knew that John and I would be here to catch you, and that I would give you a certain number of strokes with this cane of mine, which no doubt grew somewhere under his loving care in order to carry out this predestined purpose. Now, John," he added, glancing quizzically at his old factotum, "how many strokes with this cane do you think God knows I am going to give these youngsters?"

John, who was a kind-hearted old fellow, and had a little boy or two of his own, replied with a grin: "Well, sir, since you asks me, I be pretty sartain as God knows you ain't going to give 'em any strokes at all. These 'ere boys be fine gentlemanly little chaps, only they've bin led astray by that there Sunday-school teaching, Mr. Jones. God knows that they've never bin in this orchard afore (leastways I knows it for sure myself), and so God knows that you're just a-going to let 'em off with a warning this time, Mr. Jones, and to put 'em on their honour never to do this sort o' thing again."

"Well, John," observed Farmer Jones, gravely, relaxing his hold on Dick's arm, "I had no idea you were so completely in the confidence of the Almighty; but I suppose I must take your word for it. Look here, you youngsters, if I let you off this time will you promise me on your honour never to serve me such a low trick again?"

Dick and Willie, now quite free, and standing erect and manly side by side, took off their caps to Farmer Jones.

"Thank you very much, sir," said Dick. "We are very sorry, and will never do it again, Mr. Jones, honour bright. Willie, say that too."

"Very sorry, and never again, honour bright," shouted Willie, with shrill and convincing emphasis.

"That's right," said Farmer Jones, now actually laughing. "Shake hands, and here's an apple for each of you to ratify the bargain. John, let them out by the gate, please—not over the wall."

So Dick and Willie went off with a greatly improved opinion of Farmer Jones, but with grave doubts as to the practical utility of theological doctrines in the affairs of daily life.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

XI.—The Stone Rolled Away.

Very early on Sunday morning, while twilight yet hung over Jerusalem, and Calvary, and the garden of Joseph, a group of women carried pots of ointment and funeral spices, and approached the rock-tomb.

The stone block which had been propped up against the mouth of the sepulchre was rolled away. Bending down, and stepping gently into the shadowy cave, the women were astonished not to find the body of the martyr.

What was to be done? To whom could they go for advice? Who could have taken the body away?

A light shone. Two shining ones appeared in the cave.

"Why do you seek the living man in this place of the dead?" asked the shining men. "He is not here. Remember that, when he was in Galilee, he told you he would be dead only three days."

The women hurried into the city, where people were just beginning to stir in the streets. They went to the house where the Eleven Delegates and other disciples met together each day, and they told the story of the shining men.

"Nonsense," said the eleven Aposties.

Peter,—he that heard the cock crow at the Friday dawn,—tore out, as fast as he could go, and rushed to Joseph's garden, crept into the sepulchre, and, stooping, found linen clothes wrapped in a bundle. That was all. He wondered, and went away, wondering.

On Sunday evening, two of the Galilee men walked along the country road from Jerusalem to a village, some seven miles away. They talked of the rock-tomb, the women, the shining men, and Peter.

"You seem very interested in something, my friends," said a strange voice. "Has anything unusual happened?"

A wayfarer had caught them up.

"Why, sir," said one, "have you not heard of the scenes in the Holy City?"

"What scenes?"

"The killing of the King of the Jews,—King Jesus. The Priests, and Lecturers, and Scribes arrested this noble pioneer of Nazareth, and the people demanded of Pilate that he should be crucified; and the terrible deed was done at Calvary last Friday. It was our belief that Jesus was the man chosen by Heaven to be the Saviour and King of Israel. And this very morning, some of our women comrades went to the rock-tomb where his body had been laid, and found the door-stone rolled away, and two angels appeared, and declared that the King was alive. He was indeed a Wonder-worker, Master of Demons, and a grand Preacher. And we wonder what it all means, and whether".....

"Dullards and slow-wits," said the stranger. "You forget that the Hebrew prophets long ago told that a Chosen Man should suffer a tragical death, and rise out of the gloom of the grave into glory and paradise."

As they walked, the stranger repeated many a verse from old songs, and hymns, and legends, which spoke of a Sufferer who should bear awful pains, and afterwards ride in triumph as a Leader, arrayed in glorious robes, comforting the people, and bringing joy to Jerusalem. Thus chatting, the three travellers reached the village. The stranger bade them good evening, and turned away.

"Sir," cried the two disciples, "abide with us; for the day is far spent, and dusk falls."

"Thank you," he said; and they all entered a cottage, and presently sat at a table, whereon a simple supper was prepared.

The stranger picked up the bread, said a blessing over it, broke it, and gave pieces to his two companions. In a moment, it flashed on them,—the memory of the Supper Table in the Holy City, the Supper of the Bread and Wine. They had scarcely said "Lord!" when he had vanished.

They jumped up, walked rapidly back to Jerusalem along the dark road, and hastened into the meeting-house of the Galileans.

"Comrades," shouted voices as the two men rushed in, "the Master's alive! Peter has seen him."

"So have we," exclaimed the two. "We met him on the road, invited him to supper, and".....

"Greetings to you all!" said a man, suddenly entering the room.

"A ghost!" shrieked the whole company, as they retreated before the newcomer, who looked like the Man of the Cross.

"Friends," he said, "don't be afraid. These hands," (and here he showed his hands) "which are holed by the Roman nails, are real hands; and my feet are real feet. Come and touch me. Give me food. Watch me eat."

Somebody gave him broiled fish, and a bowl of honey. They all stared as he ate. Then he spoke of the future.

"Stay here in the City," he said. "Never mind about Galilee. Stay here till the wonderful gift comes from high heaven,—the gift of the holy Pneuma,—it will come before many days have passed."

"And will the kingdom come?"

"Ah, it is not for you to know. Your business will be to go and tell the Christ-story to the citizens here, and the folk of Judea, and the Samaritans,"——

"The Samaritans!"

"Yes, my friends, the Kingdom is for them too, and it is for all the world."

He was talking in this same way when, not long afterwards, he led the band out of the city, across the mount where the olive groves grew, and to a very quiet spot, where he meant to say good-bye.

All of a sudden he rose in the air, and a cloud hid him from sight.

Two shining men stood on the hill-side.

"Galilee men," said the white figures, "the man that you have seen ascend will come back."

The Master of jinn had gone from the land into which he came as a babe some thirty years before.

The Eleven Apostles and the rest of the rustic company—simple folk all, none being learned, none able to lecture, none having any gift of words for making long prayers—returned to Jerusalem; and, day after day, they held their meetings of the Society of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Before long the marvellous Pneuma would arrive. The Pneuma—the gift—whatever could it be?

* * * *

In telling the legend of the holy sepulchre, I have passed from the God-spell, or God-Story of Luke, to the book called the Acts of the Apostles, written by the same person.

In the days of old, many nations had their stories of the Risen God.

The god Dionysus, who was the spirit of fruit-trees, the vine, etc., was supposed to die in the winter, and rise again in glory and bloom in the spring. His worshippers (ploughmen, harvesters, fruit-pickers) at one time tore a live goat, or bull, to pieces to show forth his death; but they also believed that the torn and dead Master could regain his life, and give fruit and corn to the hungry world.

Another Greek myth was that of the corn-seed, Persephone, who was taken down into the under-world by the dark King Hades, and there abode for months. In the spring-time she was allowed to rise from the earthen tomb and sprout into the green blades of growing corn, and so once again to see her dear Mother the Earth. We speak of this rising as the "Return of Persephone."

In Western Asia the god Tammuz, or 'Adonis, rose from the dead. One tale said he was born from the myrrh-tree, the bark of which burst, and forth came a lovely babe. He grows as corn grows, or as fruit grows, and is then ground to death in mill or press. In ancient festivals women carried an image of the dead god to the sea, weeping as they went, and yet all the while believing he would rise in power and beauty; as, of course, he did.

Another such god was Attis, who bled to death under a pine-tree. People in Asia and in Rome kept his death in memory at spring-time (March), and rejoiced when priests opened a tomb and said that Attis was risen.

Egypt had its god Osiris, of whom folk told that he was god of the corn and vine, that his bad and gloomy brother slew him and cut the body in pieces, that the pieces were found and buried by the lady Isis, and she and her sister mourned for him. The gods put the broken body together again, Isis flapped her wings and fanned air into it, and Osiris lived again and became King of the World Below.[1]

People who believed in the resurrection of the dead would easily believe in the rising of men to heaven.

The Greeks ended the story of the heroic Hercules with the legend of his ascension. Having been poisoned by some evil person, Hercules made his own pyre, or burning pile, laid himself upon it, and bade his armour-bearer set it alight. Smoke curled round the funeral pile, and the hero's body was consumed to ashes. Then his spirit, all glorious, leaped from the ashes, mounted a chariot which was drawn by four horses, and, amid peals of thunder, he ascended into high heaven. He had left to his armour-bearer, as a gift or keepsake, his marvellous bow. It was with arrows shot from this bow that many of the great captains of Troy City were slain, and thus the Greek army was aided in its war against the Trojans. Hercules was, of course, worshipped in temples as a Son of God.

And if you would know of Indians who ascended, you should read the tale of the prince and his dog—a very beautiful story too long to be repeated here.[2]

The Sabbath-Breakers.

A Sabbath well spent
Brings a week of content
And health for the toils of the morrow;
But a Sabbath profaned,
Whatsoever is gained,
Is a sure forerunner of sorrow.

So runs an infantile and quite admirable admonitory recollection. But we would not now confine it to the Sunday. Its application widens and deepens with the years. So the semi-superstitions of a crude and shallow theology may be turned to purer gold in the slow but certain crucible of a growing Humanism and Naturalism. The Church, with all its borrowed secular attractions, fails more and more to satisfy the growing mind of man. Nor is the mental process always slow. Paine, in the Rights of Man, makes the suggestion, and one peculiarly applicable to the present time, that—

> The progress of time and circumstances which men assign to the accomplishment of great changes is too mechanical to measure the force of the mind and the rapidity of reflection by which revolutions are generated:

Or, in the words of Keats' admired Chapman:—

> There is a deep nick in Time's restless wheel
> .....when which nick comes, it strikes.

Of which more anon. The Church failing me, and the Church having the monopoly of Sunday amusements in my semi-urban locality, there is nothing for it but to "break Sunday" in the open. Pleasure, like fame, oft comes unlooked for, if it come at all. My little Pagans and me—my own tribe and a neighbour's son (the latter looks up to me as to a god, and with how little reason for his worship, puir wee sowl!)—took to the winding road; thence, by the brook, to a corner of the wood, where we built a fire and boiled tea. The firing and the feeding over, I, god-like, went apart and listened to the staccato shouts echoing in the trees. It was the anticipation of spring; it was summer. Already, in fancy, the genial dappled sunshine filled the glade; the primrose and the violet were come. The flowers of Freethought seemed not far away. Here, and especially with these children, is a shrine and a sanctuary, an enlargement and an inspiration, a hope and a fulfilment. One may feel morbid, moody, or morose; but there's something here to charm those ills away. And, as N. P. Willis wrote:—

There's something in a noble boy,
A brave, freehearted, careless one,
With his unchecked, unbidden joy,
His dread of books, and love of fun;
With his sincere and ready smile,
Unshaded by a thought of guile,
And unrepressed by sadness,
That brings me to my childhood back,
As if I trod its very track
And felt its very gladness.....

And so half of the Sunday was well broken. I met with a comrade in the afternoon, and together we called at the house of a "hardened Atheist," and found this wicked person reading a handsome volume, entitled Bygones Worth Remembering, and which, with his spectacles, he laid aside as he rose to welcome us and take us "ben the room." A Christian could have done no more. A mute and modest-looking, but what proved to be a marvellous, gramophone stood in a corner. Our comrade, who is musical and knows it, was soon making free with his friend's "records," and nodding his head gently, and humming sagely and intimately, as the beautiful creations of Wagner, Beethoven, and Mascagni, preceded by the haunting "Barcarolle," filled the air with melody. There was sweetness and soothing in the Boat Song, passion in the Intermezzo, energy and daring in the multitudinous thunders of Wagner and Beethoven. The whole was as though one had been quaffing champagne. And then a woman's glorious voice awoke on the revolving disc, and memory and affection wakened with it, and wandered backward in the sweet old Scottish song:—

Hae ye min' o' lang lang syne
When the simmer days were fine
When the sun it shone far brighter
Than its ever done sin' syne .....
. . . . .
Where are those bright hearts now,
That were once so leal an' true?
Some hae left this troubled scene,
Some still are struggling thro';
But, tho' lang the night may seem,
They will sleep without a dream
Till they wauken-on-yon-bright-Sabbath-morning!

A pious wish, but a pardonable, and the sentiment is entirely human, and finds an echo in every breast—or gains in poignancy from the sub-conscious certainty that the "Sabbath" really means the Nevermore. When Miss Lizzie Hunter, of Glasgow, sung this song to a city audience just as the mechanical echoes reproduced it for us, that audience arose as one man, and cheered, and cheered, and cheered, and held the singer to the stage till her eyes overflowed with emotions happy tears. It was her masterpiece, or, at least, it was her listeners' master spell. In such a moment the mind leaps forward, despising every obstacle. Our comrade had been showing me the spot in this old-world village where, in the good old days, certain offenders were exposed to public shame and insult. I thought of all the barbarities of the past, and of the lingering barbarisms of to-day, then hearing this love-song, and that boat song, and glimpsing the world of music and art in the great composers, it was not strange but inevitable that one should lean forward and say: Why, we are merely savages. Eighty per cent. of us do not know how to live. Our meagre lives explain our miserable religion, and our miserable religion explains our meagre lives. Christianity was the religion—the consolation if you like, of the miserable. Those who tell us of mansions in the skies would be better employed helping us to mansions, even decent cottages, here below, instead of fitting us to be angels in heaven, of equipping us to be decent citizens of earth. Instead of which we have: Blessed be ye poor, Blessed are those who mourn for they shall be comforted—by-and-by! Anything, anywhere, but here and now; and mine host agreed.

It was the first Sunday in March, and, according to most unreliable rustic information, the crows on that day "lay the first twig" of their nests. The crow is a wise and reverend bird, but I don't suppose he is as partial to Sunday as his human brethren in black. It is more likely that "rustic labour," being more at leisure, merely observed Maitre Corbeau building on that day, and straightway gave his natural history notes to the world. In such wise even great religions have been built up. A great truth emerges from this trifling: all days are alike to every animal but man. He only has sought out inventions; and having found an imaginary God he must allot him an imaginary day.

Mister Crow is not such a damned fool.

ARMY CHURCH PARADES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—You are quite right when you say that "compulsory attendance at church is felt as a real injustice in the Army." Officers hate it every bit as much as the men. We also know (those of us who have been through the "blood bath" in France) that religion does not help the soldier—quite the reverse, in fact! In the fighting in France during the whole of the War, I have only met with one actual case of cowardice (i.e., real fear of death and terror of the task that faced us at the moment), and the man I have in mind groaned out his terror while he grovelled in prayer, to the intense disgust of his comrades, who were at this particular moment undergoing most frightful punishment at the hands (or guns and mortars) of the enemy. I knew the man well. The poor fellow was killed that day. He had religion—thoroughly! But he was the least useful man of my unit when the particular hour of tragedy and test came our way. I pointed the moral to my brother officers at the time. I hope to see religion completely divorced from the Army. It will mean a cleaner and happier soldier. I have served in the ranks of the old Army, and I know the amount of blasphemy the Church Parade always provoked. It is just the same to-day. But the Chaplain must justify his existence, and so this hated institution goes on.

Freethinkers and Atheists make fine soldiers. This is not a sophism; it is bed-rock truth. I find the right type of mind among them—the type of mind that is centred upon a high sense of duty and a complete devotion to the principle of fair-play. The true Freethinker makes a splendid officer or N.C.O. I've tested the value of this belief of mine, and I've not been let down yet. It would be interesting to know (though the bishops would find the knowledge very disquieting) the number of Freethinkers among the officers of the Army of to-day. As a matter of fact, more than fifty per cent. are sceptics—but more or less passively so. But at least eighty per cent. are convinced of the utter uselessness of religion in the Army. Church Parade is always referred to as "divine punishment," and officers scheme more actively than the men to dodge it.

Please accept my congratulations on your wonderful show with the Freethinker. I hope that an early peace will help to remove the difficulties that now face you. But the time for peace is not yet. The present crowing attitude of Prussia, with Wilhelm as the chief chanticleer, does not help on the peace idea. Personally, I am devoted to the War with every fibre of my being and every breath of my body until the Prussian is stamped flat.

I must take up no more of your time. Cheerio and good luck.

There is much boast these days of the influence of the scientific spirit in modern man. We are in the habit of assuming that superstition—at least of the cruder and more troglodite kind—no longer influences the brains of the people. We have hoped, and our hope has lent colour to the reformer within us, that humanity has made a fraction of headway in the forward line which we conceive to be Progress. But in this we are, as usual, mistaken! Superstition flourishes in the vast majority of minds to-day just as it did ten thousand years ago. The entirely rational and scientific mind does not yet exist.....Even a distinguished scientist like the late Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace believed in Spiritualism! Sir Oliver Lodge, another living scientist, is doing his very best in the interests of superstition.

Is the human race never to grow out of these things? Is the Rationalist a freak of Nature, and the superstitionist on the winning side? It may sound like rank blasphemy to suggest such a thing, but are not the facts obstinate? To-day we are in the midst of a universal and scientific war; yet humanity, in consequence, is behaving in a more barbaric fashion than when wars were less scientific! The primitive man with a sling was infinitely less scientific than the machine gunner of to-day, yet he was less barbaric. He was more humane. Poison gas, one of the most ghastly inventions of this War, is highly scientific, and at the same time inconceivably hellish in its barbarity. The ancient with his bow and arrow was clean and decent compared to the inventors of poison gas, yet he was more superstitious!

Nine people out of ten will avoid walking under a ladder, or spilling salt at table. Mascots manufactured by the million are still sold daily in Regent Street to the superstitious. The success of the famous "Swastika" charm was phenomenal. They may still be purchased in an attractive variety of forms!

Society News.

The Manchester Branch held its second Social at the Downing Street Hall, on the 16th, and was a gratifying success. A flying whist drive was followed by a succession of songs, recitations, and dances, and no effort was spared to make the evening an enjoyable one. The talent willingly placed at its disposal augurs well for the success of the social side of the Branch in future. Thanks are due to Mr. and Mrs. Batt, Mrs. Pulman, and Mrs. Bayfield for the whist prizes which they so kindly provided. Will members please note that the Annual Meeting for election of officers etc., for ensuing year, will take place at Bakers' Hall on Sunday, April 7, at 6.30, when a good attendance is specially requested.

North London Branch N. S. S.—The debate last Sunday on the question, "Is There a God?" was well sustained, the Secularists being neither vanquished nor disgraced. In view of the forthcoming legislation on this subject, we expect a large audience to-night to hear Mrs. Tiedeman, the Secretary of the Divorce Law Reform Union. A cordial invitation is given to those in opposition to break a lance with Mrs. Seaton Tiedeman.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Views and Opinions.

Truth and the Press.

A great many hard things have been said lately concerning the present quality of the English newspaper press, and he would be a rash man who dared say they were undeserved. During a time of War one excuses much, and when, in addition, we have a Government-controlled press—openly controlled so far as the issue and suppression of news on an all-engrossing topic is concerned, and, probably controlled to a very much greater extent, non-dependence on the information supplied becomes general. A controlled press—no matter by whom controlled—must become an untrustworthy press. It may be telling the truth, or it may be telling a lie. No one can be sure. In such circumstances a newspaper surrenders its primary function of conveying news, and becomes an agency for the coercion, the suppression, or the artificial creation of opinion. It becomes as unreliable as a politician, and as unveracious as a professional evangelist. Freedom is the essential condition of much, it is certainly a prime condition of speaking the truth.

An Evil Environment.

Having said so much, it remains, however, true that the faults of the English press did not commence with the War, they have only been accentuated by it. Nor are these altogether the faults of the press; they are largely the faults of an unhealthy state of public opinion. This was expressed, in a way, by Mr. Birrell in the course of a recent address, in which he remarked of our newspapers: "If they had been allowed to tell more truth, it is only creditable to suppose they would not have told so many lies." That, we think, puts the matter on a fair basis; and it applies almost as much to individuals as to newspapers. Taking men and women on the average, we do not think they will go out of their way to tell a lie; but neither will they subject themselves to a serious inconvenience in order to tell the truth. Few people may be capable under ordinary conditions of strict accuracy, since that comes of training and education allied with native disposition; but if people were allowed to tell the truth there would certainly be considerably less lying. In most cases people lie for a purpose—to escape inconvenience or to reap a profit, and all that we can do is to see that the incentives to truth are the more powerful. As things are the inducements seem mainly in the other direction. Daily experience shows that in this religion-soaked society of ours, mental honesty and truth-speaking are the most expensive of luxuries. Lying is lamentably common, and the suppression of truth commoner still. And the man who will have the truth at all costs promises to die with no better epitaph than "Here lies a Crank."

Press and Public.

Now, newspapers may be able to create what is called an opinion in favour of this or that. But the general tone and character of the public mind is not formed by newspapers, it is that which they exist to serve which determines the character of the papers. Generally speaking, the object of the proprietors of newspapers is to sell their wares. It is only a paper, such as the Freethinker, which makes sales a secondary consideration. And, taking people as they are, what Mr. Birrell said of the press, with the Government censor in his mind, may be said with regard to the relations between the press and the general public. If the papers were allowed to tell the truth they would not print so many lies. But that supposes the existence of a public that has a genuine interest in and attachment for truth, for freedom, for liberty. And that public is represented by but a small minority. Nothing has struck us more than this during the past three-and-a-half years. We have had to surrender much during that period—one hopes for "the duration" only. We have given up the freedom of the press, of speech, of the platform, even those two old boasts, Habæus Corpus and "An Englishman's home is his castle." It is not surprising that people should have surrendered these things in view of what they conceived a larger purpose. The surprising thing is the very few people one meets who seem in the least conscious that they have lost anything worth troubling about. As they did not value freedom when it was theirs, it is not surprising that they attach little importance to its absence.

The Press and Religion.

Newspaper writers are not really different from other men. The unsigned article or the editorial "we" usually covers a quite ordinary—often a quite commonplace—personality. But like most others, whether they are intellectually honest depends merely upon whether they are allowed to be so. So long as the general public make the path of the liar pleasant and that of the truth-speaker painful, things will remain as they are. In his satirical defence of Lord Northcliffe as Minister of Propaganda, Mr. S. L. Hughes told the House of Commons that if what was wanted in war was a man who did not stick at the truth, no better man could be found for the job. That was more than a covered charge against Lord Northcliffe; it was a charge against the British public. Again, we have been lately advertising this journal in several provincial papers. But in two or three cases the advertisements were refused. Why? Not, we know, because the proprietors personally objected to the advertisement; nor that they did not want advertisements. It was simply that the public—some of their public—might take offence. As Mr. Birrell says, they go on publishing lies because they are not allowed to publish the truth. And a newspaper must publish something.

A Christian Product.

Now, it is not possible to dissociate this condition of the public mind from the influence of Christianity. For it will be observed that it is precisely those faults of the press of which Mr. Birrell and others complain that are most characteristic of Christian methods of teaching. No religion has ever shown a more complete disregard for truth, a greater determination to suppress facts inconvenient to itself, or to disseminate information of a quite misleading character, than has Christianity. The Roman Church has its official Index; the Protestant Churches have no official Index, but they have an unofficial one of extraordinary efficiency. It is in virtue of this unofficial Index that reports of Freethought meetings are boycotted, newsagents who display Freethought papers often warned that they will lose trade unless they mend their ways, and editors of newspapers threatened with a loss of circulation unless they play the religious game. It may or may not be true that a people always has the government it deserves; it is certainly true it will always have the kind of newspaper press that suits it. For the press has to deal with a public that is mentally emasculated by centuries of Christian training and influence. The press is a reflection of the public mind. And if we would have a different press, we must see to it that we have a different public. In other words, we must do away with the occasion for so many lies by making it possible to tell more truths.

Christianity's Greatest Crime.

When the evils that Christianity has inflicted on the world are finally tabulated, we are convinced that its ill effects in the world of mental life will be accounted the greatest. It commenced with a theory that damned people for wrong belief, and so made the critical use of the intellect the most dangerous of occupations. So soon as it possessed the power, it added terrestrial punishment to celestial damnation. It burned, it tortured, it imprisoned, it boycotted; it suppressed truth and circulated lies. For generations, the most dangerous thing in Christendom was to think. The fool could always make sure of heaven; the thinker always ran a great chance of hell. The thousands who had died at the stake or suffered in Christian prisons for heresy deserve our sympathy, but the general public demand it still more. For the essential evil of Christian rule rested not so much with the people it killed as with those whom it left alive. It separated the sceptical goats from the believing sheep, it bred from the poorer stock, and so lowered the whole level of mental life. It created and perpetuated a social environment in which thinking was at a discount and credulity at a premium. It is from the effects of this heredity we are suffering to-day. We can have more truth and fewer lies in the press if we demand it. But to make that demand effective we must break the influence of a Church whose rule has been one of the greatest blights in the history of the modern world.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

We daily make great improvements—there is one I wish to see in moral philosophy—the discovery of a plan that would induce and oblige nations to settle their disputes without first cutting one another's throats. There never has been, nor ever will be, any such thing as a good war or a bad peace. When will mankind be convinced of this, and agree to settle their differences by arbitration?—Franklin.

Shaking Off the Beast.

THE Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., of Glasgow, is a deservedly distinguished member of the clerical profession. He has carefully studied and thoroughly mastered the great art of luminous expression. As a preacher he occupies the front rank, and as a writer of newspaper articles he enjoys considerable popularity. It is in the latter capacity alone that he is known, at first hand, to the present writer. In the Christian World for March 7, there is a notable contribution from his pen, entitled "He Shook Off the Beast," which is eminently characteristic of his style both as preacher and writer. He bases his remarks upon an alleged incident in the life of St. Paul, recorded in Acts xxv. 1-5. There had been a shipwreck, and the rescued people were on an island called Melita, where they were shown great kindness by the inhabitants, politely called in the narrative "barbarous people." Out of a bundle of sticks, gathered by the Apostle, when laid on the fire, there sprang a viper which fastened itself on his hand; but he "shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm." As it stands, it is clear that this simple story has no moral whatever, nor any other significance than the one which it naturally bears. But this is how Dr. Hutton looks at it:—

> I have the feeling again and again, especially when he (St. Luke) tells a story, that he is telling the story first of all, of course, as part of his narrative, but also for the sake of a deeper significance which the story has the moment you sit down and think of it. St. Luke was, as we know, a physician. He was a physician certainly with a most remarkable gift for writing. He is not the only physician who in the history of literature has revealed the same excellence.

Then he goes on to say how Thomas Browne, a physician of Norwich, wrote a marvellous classic, called Religio Medici, and how "in our own day, the moralizings of Dr. Paget have a simplicity and depth and charm which must be the despair of many a man to whom writing is a lucrative business." Next he indulges in a bit of moralizing of his own, to the effect that a good doctor possesses qualities which are calculated to make him a good writer. This is the pulpit style to perfection—the rhetorical trick of reading into the text what, as it stands, it does not even suggest. The truth is that the preacher must exploit his text-book in this fashion, for otherwise he would soon come to the end of his tether. Nor do we quarrel with Dr. Hutton for adopting this highly convenient method. What we maintain is that there is absolutely nothing to indicate that the author of the Acts, in relating that incident in the Apostle's life, "gave it a particular turn in order to embody in a few sharp outlines an abiding fact and principle." However, on the assumption that St. Luke did so, Dr. Hutton adds: "'He shook off the viper, and took no harm.' That, in a sense, is the claim of Christianity, that man may shake off the beast, and, far from taking harm, for the first time begin to be man." Rather than find fault with the reverend gentleman for pursuing this homiletic plan, we prefer to treat the assumption as if it were legitimate, and to examine this so-called claim of Christianity in order to ascertain whether or not there is any truth in it.

Dr. Hutton makes a bad beginning by laying the blame for the present War at the door of the philosophy which, he says, was dominant in Germany at its outbreak. According to him, the fundamental principle of that philosophy was "that man simply could not dispense with the beast, that if he 'shook off the beast' he would take harm"; and then he refers to one of the philosophers who spoke quite frankly of man as the "blonde beast, hungry for prey," giving a long quotation from Nietzsche. It is wholly immaterial, in this connection, whether the quotation is a correct representation of the Nietzschean attitude on the subject of war or not, the point to be emphasized at present being that German philosophers generally have always repudiated the teaching of the Basle Professor. Besides, he who announced without apology that "war is a biological necessity," is a Christian, who has the support of Luther when he oracularly declares that war is not anti-Christian. By war, Luther and Bernhardi mean the shedding of blood on brutal battlefields in the interests of some strong, ambitious State; but in the true Nietzschean sense war signifies struggle against weakness, ignorance, and error. With this Dr. Hutton is in substantial agreement, for he says:—

> A man is at his best when he is pulling against the stream. Deprived of the necessity for struggle, man loses his virility and endurance, begins to live too exclusively by his wits; later, begins to pamper himself, to become aware too pointedly of his body, to become an epicure in his food, more complicated and inventive and diabolical in his pleasures.....It is true and always will be true of man that he must have an active and aggressive principle of life. The day when he ceases to get beyond himself is a day when he begins to shrink.

In war as thus understood there is nothing lowering or bestial. It is in the purely military sense alone that war deserves to be condemned as a mark of the brute; in the sense of an appeal to physical force for the settlement of national or international disputes; or as an instrument in the service of the lust for power and dominion, as it has for the moment been successfully employed by Germany and Austria-Hungary against an exhausted and helpless Russia. In this sense war is the hideous beast in humanity which needs to be shaken off at all cost, or to be "cut out as with a surgeon's knife from the growing organism" of our race. But the crucial question is, "where are we to get the moral equivalent for war" in this signification of the word? "How are we to maintain within ourselves the fine ferment of aspiration and moral activity, the climbing, enduring, hardy attitude?" This is Dr. Hutton's own question, and the following is his answer to it:—

> I do not think it is a difficulty which will ever really arise in men and women who believe in God. To believe in God—that of itself when we ponder its implications—will set man an ever ascending task, and the best men in the world will die like that list of heroes in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, with the thing they have lived for all their lives still unachieved, still "star-like ever luring them on to its exclusive purpose." Men who believe in God as Christ has made him known to us will always have enough to do, enough to do within themselves, to bring harmony between the fine deepening demand of Jesus upon us all and our own poor and inadequate performance.

Such is the reverend gentleman's moral equivalent for war—the belief in God. Unfortunately, however, the belief in God, like prayer, has always lacked efficacy. Like the deities of ancient Greece those of Christendom have been constantly at war among themselves. It may be retorted that Christians profess to be Monotheists, and that their divines have written bulky tomes in defence of that profession. For argument's sake, granted; but is it not an incontestable fact that their versions of that one God in three have been and still are practically innumerable; and that the champions of those versions have often fought to the death for their respective idols? Why, only the other day, Dr. Campbell Morgan publicly declared that he, an orthodox Trinitarian, could never enter into any sort of religious co-operation with a Unitarian, however good and noble he might be. Were you to tell the Trinitarian that he believes in three Gods, he would instantly get into a fighting attitude and denounce you as a liar; and it is not so long ago that slight deviators from the dominant Trinitarian position were savagely attacked and burnt alive. The thirty years bloody war in Germany was waged on behalf of different versions of God and his Church. All the warriors were firm, passionate believers in a Supreme Being, but, instead of serving as a moral equivalent for war, their belief irresistibly drove them to furious battle after battle. Does Dr. Hutton deny the truth of this statement? Every believer paints his own picture of God, which only expresses his conception of what a Divine Being should be. The militarists of the present day are no less ardent believers in God than the Pacifists; while, as a matter of fact, there are many Pacifists who are avowed Atheists. No one can be a more passionately zealous believer in a Supreme Being than the German Emperor is, and the God he worships is the one Christ is supposed to have made known to the world. The Kaiser is not only a believer in God, but also an evangelical Christian, as his numerous published sermons abundantly testify. It is his boast that his soldiers are Christians, and that no one is permitted to become a military officer in his dominions unless he is a Church member. And yet this orthodox believer in God, this preacher of the Gospel of salvation through faith in Christ alone, is also a War-Lord, who regards the sword as a Divine instrument for the establishment of what he characterizes as the kingdom of God on earth. Surely, neither Dr. Hutton nor any other British divine has any more right to call the Kaiser, who justifies all the horrors and atrocities of war on the German side, than he and his representatives have to call us a nation of hypocrites. Doubtless there are hypocrites in both countries, but the fact remains that in neither nation has the belief in God, with its varied and often conflicting implications, acted as a moral equivalent for war.

Dr. Hutton's teaching, when we ponder its implications, throws anything but a favourable light upon the character of the God in whom he urges us, with such strenuous insistence, to believe. Take the following illuminating passage:—

> There will be wild thrusts from our past life, belches upwards of an unholy steam from the central fire of our natural origins; there will be flashes of the ideal from the future, memories of loved ones who have gone from us, high words, delicate insights, an army of the living God and an army of the Prince of the Power of the Air—these will always be about us making our life a good fight of faith.

That extract embodies a considerable amount of truth, on the assumption that life is an evolutionary process, conducted under strictly natural laws; but our distinguished divine, while evidently accepting the theory of evolution, is of opinion that its course has been powerfully affected by the action of two outside armies, the one friendly and the other hostile. On the one hand there has been the army of God, on the other, the army of Satan, in violent conflict with each other, and eventually producing the mixed results described in that quotation. How did the Prince of the Powers of the Air come to be? Was he also an evolutionary product in some mystic supernatural sphere, or was he created out of nothing in order that God's life, too, might be full of bracing struggle? It seems that every now and then God steps aside from the conflict to watch what progress it makes without him. Does such a conception reflect credit upon the wisdom and goodness of the Lord who is said to sit as king for ever? As for us, we prefer to be in the hands of physical and chemical laws which operate, if unconsciously, with perfect impartiality, and under the operation of which has arisen, at last, that degree and quality of intelligence which, if allowed fair play, and not handicapped by alleged supernatural interferences, will socialize and moralize human life to such an extent that wars, even hostile competitions, shall cease for ever.

The Decline of Devotional Literature.

The creed of Christendom is gradually melting away, like a northern iceberg floating into southern seas.—G. W. Foote.

WE hear much of the output of books, of the glut of the literary market; but with all the activity of authors there is one department of literature which shows a falling-off. During the past half century a great and continuous decline has taken place in the production of religious books. To what is this decline due? There are several reasons; the first, and the most potent, being the indifference of the reading public to religion. The tide of religion is now at the ebb. In his day, Macaulay noted the singular periodic manner in which the British Public took up questions of religion and morality. John Bull no longer remembers that he has a soul to save—indeed, he is indifferent as to whether he has a soul or not. Meanwhile, he reads novels and newspapers, especially newspapers. Another reason is the lower mentality of the clergy. There are no longer any great ecclesiastics; and it certainly cannot be said that the Churches show intellect in the production of religious books. Not for present-day clerics are the rolling harmonies of Jeremy Taylor, the subtle cadences of Milton, the chastened utterances of Newman. They cannot even echo Baxter or Bunyan. There is not an original idea in their books. Everything is second-hand and threadbare, and the paucity of the prose emphasizes the emptiness of their heads. Yet another cause of the decline of religious literature is the growth of Freethought. The ordinary man is no longer content to be blindly led by the parson. The force of Puritanism has spent itself; it no longer inspires, but merely irritates.

The decline began a half century ago. About that time there was a real and unmistakable interest in devotional literature. The Rev. J. R. Macduff rivalled the foremost novelists in popularity. The sale of his works was to be reckoned in hundreds of thousands. He was, in fact, the Dickens of Orthodoxy. For years Dean Goulburn's Thoughts on Personal Religion had an annual sale of many thousands, and Bishop Oxenden's works were equally popular. Newman Hall's publications ran into a sale of millions. Spurgeon's sermons sold like hot rolls, and Dr. Joseph Parker had hosts of admirers who bought his books eagerly. In looking through the old publishers' catalogues, one is surprised at the number of works of a devotional nature. Familiar as household words a generation or so ago, how many of these are known even by name to the present generation? The greater part of the Victorian era was, indeed, a golden age for religious books.

Not only was there a constant demand for the works of individual authors but for such libraries as The Biblical Cabinet, Sacred Classics, The Christian Family Library, and many other series. The taste for such books has [illegible] over. Nor is it to be supposed that fresh life [illegible] given to works like Gladstone's Impregnable [illegible] Holy Scripture, which served a temporary purpose, and, having served it, have passed from men's minds. In the many volumes on Victorian literature which have appeared no mention is made of numberless religious or devotional books which were once thought indispensable in tens of thousands of homes. The circumstance is highly significant, and illustrates with startling clearness the changed attitude of the reading-public towards religious literature.

The real meaning of this change is that the Christian superstition is crumbling. Everything eventually crumbles which is not true. Never was there so little religion, never so much Secularism, as at the present time. Never have men attended churches and chapels so little; never have they attended hospital and charity meetings so assiduously. Christianity is in the melting-pot, and Secularism is permeating everywhere. The Christian religion no longer satisfies. No faith can satisfy which is found out. Men, nowadays, no longer accept upon mere trust the religious misbeliefs of their remote and ignorant ancestors. Over the pulpits of the fast-emptying Churches is inscribed: "To the glory of God." That is the voice of the past. Secularism sounds the vibrant and triumphant note of the future: "To the service of man." Based on fables, supported by brute force, trading on ignorance, the Christian religion at length finds the conscience of the race rising above it. The voice of reason has been a still small voice, sometimes almost inaudible, though never quite stilled; but now it is swelling into a volume of sound which will overwhelm the din of sects and threats of priests.

MIMNERMUS.

Who Killed Christ?

A JOLLY jack-tar came on shore and went to church for the first time in his life. The sermon was on the Crucifixion. The preacher waxed eloquent on the sufferings of Jesus and the frightful sin of his "murderers." Indignation glowed in the bosom of the honest salt, who felt his fingers itching to thrash the wretches. The next day he was looking in a shop window at a figure of Jesus on the cross. "Poor young fellow," he muttered, "poor young fellow! What a damned shame! Just then a Jew came up and looked into the window. "Do you know him?" asked the sailor, pointing to the crucifix.

"Oh, yes," answered the Jew, "dat's Jesus."

"Oh, you know him do you," said Jack, "then take that," giving the Jew a blow which knocked him down.

Picking himself up, and chafing his sore limbs, Mr. Isaacs asked, "Vat's dat for?"

"Ain't you a Jew," said Jack, "and didn't you crucify Jesus?"

"Oh," exclaimed Mr. Isaacs, "dat vas 'undreds of years ago."

"Was it?" said Jack. "Well, never mind, it's all the same; I only heard of it yesterday."

That unsophisticated salt acted like the vast body of Christians, who persecuted the Jews century after century for the alleged crime of killing Christ, and hardened their hearts against the evidences of his divinity. It is no exaggeration to say that the sufferings inflicted on the Jews by the disciples of the religion of love form the most appalling chapter in history. No ignominy, no outrage was neglected. They were degraded, disabled, robbed, tortured, and butchered wholesale. Yet they always remained obstinate; their miseries never converted them; and who can help thinking, with Diderot, that the grand miracle of history is not the Resurrection, but the incredulity of the Jews?

We deny altogether that the Jews did kill Christ. We say that he was actually executed by the Roman governor, and virtually killed by himself. His death was a species of suicide. His fate might have been averted by the slightest exercise of common sense.

Had Jesus been killed by the Jews, he would have been stoned. That was their method of execution, as may be seen in many passages of the Old Testament. Indeed, in the early part of his ministry, his countrymen did try to stone him, but he escaped from them; and Stephen, the protomartyr, whose death is recorded in Acts, was killed in that way. Being crucified, Jesus was, of course, executed by the Roman law, as is further attested by the report of his trial. He was not even executed for a religious offence. It is perfectly true that he was charged before the High Priest with blasphemy, but the accusation had to be changed when he was brought before Pilate. The Roman governor looked upon "blasphemy!" and such cries as mere squabbles between Jewish sects. Like Gallio, he cared for none of these things, and he would have discharged Jesus had there been no other indictment. But he was bound to try Jesus on the charge of sedition, although he certainly did his best to get the poor fellow acquitted. "Art thou the King of the Jews?" asked Pilate, with mingled pity and derision. Jesus answered, "Thou sayest," which was simply pleading guilty. Setting himself up as King in a Roman province was sedition. He may have been unaware of the fact, but Pilate could not help that, and the rash enthusiast paid the natural penalty of his ignorance or his presumption. Indeed, the very inscription on the cross clearly showed the nature of the offence for which he perished. Surely, then, it is idle to make the Jews responsible for his want of gumption. That he had enemies, and powerful enemies, we have no doubt; and his conduct in Jerusalem before his arrest was calculated to exasperate instead of conciliating them; but they could not have compassed his death, except by assassination, if he had not played into their hands in a manner which can only be understood on the theory that he was half insane, or that his faculties were paralysed by danger.

Suppose, however, for the sake of argument, that the Jews did kill Jesus. Suppose he was put out of the way, not only by a powerful party at Jerusalem, but by the unanimous vote of his countrymen. We still insist that they were not to blame, if Jesus and they both believed (and we have his assent) that the law and the prophets declared the will of God. He had set himself up to be God, saying that he and the Father were one. Such language was shocking to an orthodox Jew, and on consulting his Scriptures he found the clearest instructions from Jehovah how to deal with the utterer of this blasphemy. God's order is contained in the thirteenth chapter of Deuteronomy. The words are perfectly plain. A child could understand them:—

> If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

Now we should like to know the ground on which Christians deny the propriety of the Jews carrying out this sanguinary order. The Old Testament, as well as the New, is a part of the Christian Bible, and it is the same God throughout, from the curse on Adam and Eve to the brimstone lake of Revelation. Freethinkers may object to the whole business, but how can a Christian do so without the grossest hypocrisy? The supposition that Jesus was God only makes the case worse, for then he was literally dished in his own sauce. He told the Jews how to serve those who sought to divide their attachment to Jehovah; he prescribed the stoning to death; and he was the chief victim of his own brutality. His own curses came home to roost. It was a splendid case of poetical justice. Were Jesus very God of very God, the Crucifixion was a play of "Tit for Tat, or the Biter Bit."

Teetotalism brings its trials to the ritualistic Christians. One of the American States—Oklahoma—has prohibited the use of alcoholic liquor of any kind or for any purpose. But, as the Church Times says: "Bread and wine are the matter of the sacrament, and by wine is meant the fermented juice of the grape, and not any substitute or makebelief." So the Oklahoma Christians are in a quandary, and some priests have been "driven to the necessity of conveying wine surreptitiously into the State." With this smuggling the Church Times sympathises, because, as it remarks, the forbidding of all wine involves "dishonour to our Lord." We wonder what the other Christians who have argued that the Bible forbids the use of strong drink think of this? Perhaps they will feel towards "our Lord" as the old Scotch lady did when she was told that Jesus walked about on the Sabbath. "Mebbe he did," she replied; "but I think none the better of him for it."

At the National Free Church Council, a Baptist Army Chaplain, the Rev. D. J. Riley, said the soldiers were out of touch with the Churches. They did not like the narrow views of the Churches, nor their attitude to amusements. This does not promise well for the delayed revival of religion.

Christians have quaint ideas of getting labour cheap, but the following advertisement in an Essex newspaper is quite noteworthy in its way: "Leigh-on-Sea Baptist Chapel. Wanted organist, Christian, no salary, honorarium given. Write Secretary.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley is getting quite an adept at tickling the ears of the groundlings. Writing in the Sunday Pictorial, he declares "you can't conduct a big war on the cold and hopeless principles of a blank religious negation. Fighting and Faith must go together." Mr. Bottomley might have learned that Napoleon and Frederick the Great were both Freethinkers, and they conducted big wars successfully. Fighting and Faith do go together, unhappily, for the simple reason that religious folk are always quarrelling.

The Rev. Pedr Williams, after some years' sojourn at Durban, Natal, has now, in response to a Divine call, settled down at Swansea, where the rest of the clergy, with his valuable help, will "endeavour to uplift the banner of morality." Poor old Swansea! Although it has been crowded with churches and chapels for countless generations, it is only now, with the advent of a new minister, that it is going to "endeavour to uplift the banner of morality." We suppose that this is tantamount to a notice to quit to the wicked Freethinkers.

In spite of all appearances to the contrary, British Christians still profess to believe in the justice as well as goodness of the Governor of the Universe. After a very long silence on the subject, the Prime Minister expressed that belief before the Free Church Council the other day. And yet, though we claim to be fighting for God and his righteousness, the Germans unblushingly declare that, thanks to his direct aid, they have won a glorious victory in the East, and are on the eve of the final one in the West.

There is every likelihood of a bad attack of caterpillars on fruit trees this year says the Board of Agriculture. Maybe the Archbishop of Canterbury will draw up a dainty form of prayer to meet the situation.

A daily paper referred recently to the former pastor of Newington Tabernacle as Charles Adam Spurgeon, whereas the name should have been Haddon. Had the old Boanerges been alive he would have consigned that editor to the place so often mentioned in his sermons.

Bold advertisements asking for support for the new Education Bill have been published in the newspapers, and stress is laid on the inefficiency of the present system. Nothing is said, however, of the wasting of the time of the scholars by teaching such nonsense as the stories of Noah's Ark, Jonah and the Whale, and other Biblical legends.

An elderly woman stated at Clerkenwell County Court that she caught a cold through holy water being sprinkled upon her at the time of an air-raid.

Dean Inge has told us why women wear hats in church. Speaking at Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Street, he referred to the Bible passage in which Saint Paul exhorted women to cover their heads in churches. That could only have been on account of the angels, the Dean said, for Paul thought that the passions of those spirits might otherwise have been excited. Oh, those naughty bogeys!

Parsons are very hard driven in order to attract congregations nowadays, and a North Country vicar announces special services for allotment holders, and even invites workers to come in their working clothes. Perhaps the vicar selects suitable subjects for his addresses, such as "The Garden of Eden," and "Eve and the Apple," and "Ezekiel's Cookery."

Sometimes the men of God give their game away with delightful simplicity. The other evening, a Wesleyan minister was suddenly called upon to lead a crowded audience in prayer. He was fluent, eloquent, and very much to the point. He bewailed the miseries, sins, and sufferings of life, and expatiated, in moving tones, upon the horrors and abominations of the War. Then he paused, and significantly added: "And yet, O Lord, thou art doing thy very best for this world of thine." What a compliment to the God of holiness and love!

The Rev. Dinsdale Young, one of the most popular of Wesleyan ministers, is an invincible optimist. In a lecture he assures his hearers that, in every department of life, "the best is yet to be." We agree, but repudiate Mr. Young's limitation—"for Christians only." For Christians the best has already been. The Golden Age of Christianity is a thing of the past. The reverend gentleman admits that this is true, if we judge only by appearances; but he pins his faith in the prophetic word and omnipotent love of Christ, both of which history has completely falsified. We believe "the best is yet to be," because Supernaturalism is passing, whilst Nature and Humanism are coming to their own.

The Daily Express declares that Mormons are active in Liverpool, and that 384 women missionaries have lately been appointed to Great Britain. There should be a boom in Joe Smith's religion shortly.

The dear clergy will not fight, but they are up in arms concerning the maisons tolerees in France and elsewhere. Perhaps they find it difficult to reconcile the idea with "a holy war."

To meet the increased cost of living, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have decided to raise the stipends of all incumbents of parishes with a population of 300 or more, and £35,000 will be so spent. The incomes of curates has also been dealt with. The Commissioners are keen business men, and know that reliance on prayer alone is mere folly.

Among the 30,000 men at Camp Lewis, near Tacoma, Wash., 113 different creeds are represented. Nearly one-fourth are Roman Catholics, and rather more than one-seventh Methodists. Baptists come next, then Presbyterians, Campbellites, and Congregationalists. There are not far from 200 Freethinkers, 153 of whom report themselves to be Atheists. Eight take the name of Freethinkers, 6 of Agnostics, 36 of Infidels. There is one Materialist, also one Spiritualist. One man is a Fatalist, one is Equal Rights. The Mormons have a contingent of 1,114, and a peculiar people called New Sectarians (possibly an error for non sectarians) supply 2,616. New Thought gets mention with 6, the same as the Holy Rollers. An Occultist, a Yoge, a Swedenborgian, a New Idealist and a "Rosechucionse" (Rosicrucian?) are counted. The two Confucians, it is presumed, are Chinese, and the nine Buddhists, East Indians. The Theosophists supply a troop of 17. The way the denomination of soldiers is arrived at in some instances is peculiar. One man at Camp Sherman in Ohio relates that when an officer asked him what his religion was he replied that he had none. "What is the church in your neighbourhood?" was the next question, and "Methodist" was the reply. "Then," said the officer, "you are a Methodist," and he stands so recorded.—Truthseeker (New York).

The Church of England is determined that the Fancy Religionists are not to have things all their own way, and the rivalry between the Church Army and the Y.M.C.A. is very pronounced. At the new and luxurious Church Army Club, at Marble Arch, titled ladies act as waitresses, and are daintily dressed in pink. Will the Nonconformists respond with pink dominoes?

The following is given in the Daily Mail of March 21 as an actual experience of a Church Parade and its sequel:—

> "Church of England, stand fast! Wesleyans, fall out on the left!"
> It was Sunday at the training depot, and the sergeant in command was forming parties to march to church or chapel. I hesitated.
> "What are you?"
>
> "Congregational."
> "You go with the Wesleyans. You—next man—a Baptist? You do the same. What are you lot?"
>
> "Presbyterians," replied one of a file of Scotsmen who were fading rearward.
> As there was no church handy approximating to this denomination, this move was checkmate.
>
> "All right. You five dismiss."
> The following Sunday the Scottish sect had trebled its adherents. So they were put on fatigues for the afternoon, which had the effect of shrinking next Sunday's Presbyterians to five.

So much for the religious spirit of the Army!

The Rev. Llewellyn Jones, of Newport, Mon., thinks that "we may be on the edge of a great Religious Revival"; but we may not. We think, on the contrary, that we are not only on the edge, but in the midst, of a great Religious Decline, a decline that has been more or less steadily going on for a hundred years, and which is destined to continue until this baneful superstition has entirely vanished.

We wonder who the tame scientist is the Government keeps on band for consultation! The other day we saw an announcement from the Ministry of Food that "scientific opinion is unanimous that extra rations are not needed for brain workers, because a man does not need more food because he works with his brain than he would need if he were not working." Wonderful! Brain-working does not use up energy; it makes no demand upon nerve tissue. Something is being created out of nothing at last! The age of miracles is not past. But we should like the name of that Government scientist. The only explanation we can see is that the statement was issued after a careful examination some of the Government offices.

Rev. H. P. Denison, Prebendary of Wells, appears to have got very near to the truth in a recent book, entitled The Making of Gods. He remarks that "Movements towards political liberty have always coincided with the failure to recognize just dues as belonging to God," and also that "The democratic movement is always marked by the revolt against the authority of God." We should not have put it quite that way, but should have said that as people put aside the ideas of the authority of God and dues to God, democracy and liberty develops. Still, it is very near the truth—and from a parson, too!

Rev. Douglas Roper, of Norwich, was charged with having broken into Heningham Church and stealing from the offertory-box. The accused said "it was wise he should make no observation," and was remanded. We presume that is what is meant by maintaining a "dignified silence."

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—April 28, Nuneaton.

H. A. FELL.—Too lengthy for our columns. Thanks, all the same.

R. M.—The use of human excrement in early religious ceremonies is well known. One writer—J. G. Bourke—has written a large volume on the subject. The title of the work is Scatologic Rites.

F. L. POLAND (Ohio).—Paper is being sent. We have many readers in the United States, and after the War we hope to properly organize our sales on your side the Atlantic. There is no reason why the Freethinker should not have ten times the subscribers it has in America.

R. E. MASON.—We have handed on the information you give.

H. C. HEBLES.—We cannot place the reference at the moment. Can you give us the date of the article. We may then be able to find what you want?

A. MILLAR.—Hope to see you when we travel North.

A. C. APTED.—We may deal with Mr. Kidd's book later. We wish you success in your new departure. Have you anything in view?

G. RULE.—Thanks for suggestion, but there would be nothing saved in altering the size of the Freethinker, unless the pages were exactly halved.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (March 31) at Pontycymmer, South Wales. The meetings will be in the afternoon and evening, and a good rally of Freethinkers from the surrounding districts is anticipated. Mr. Cohen will be glad to meet as many of these as possible, with a view to future propaganda. Time and place of lectures will be found in the Guide Notices.

We have received a number of encouraging letters concerning the enforced reduction in the size of the Freethinker, for which we tender our thanks. But some of our correspondents appear to be under the impression that we are "downhearted." We beg to assure them that is not the case, even though the burden and the worry increases weekly. We do not, of course, like the change; but we held on longer than nearly everyone else, and the change we have made is less than that made by any other paper—particularly those of a propagandist character. We are facing the future quite cheerfully, but we recognize that the great thing is to keep the Freethinker going. We think we may say, without undue glorification, that the Freethinker has kept militant Freethought alive during the War, and that its continued existence is vital to the future of the Movement. In this we are certain our readers will agree with us.

While on the subject of paper it is significant that while the Government long ago fixed a maximum price for the sale of waste paper to the paper makers, they left the price at which the makers might sell paper to the public quite open. That is, on the one hand it guaranteed the makers against paying an excessive price for materials, and then said to the manufaoturers "You may charge the public as much as you like." And they have done it. Fortunes have been made in the paper trade, and some makers have asked prices that represented sheer exploitation. And, as was to be expected, it is the poor, struggling papers that have been hardest hit.

A very able and sympathetic address was given before the North London Branch by Mrs. Seaton Tiedeman, on "Divorce Law Reform," on Sunday last. Mrs. Seaton Tiedeman is Secretary of the Divorce Law Reform Union. N. S. S. Branches would do well to invite her to address them on what is certainly one of the most important questions of to-day.

The new Manchester Branch brought its winter's work to a very successful close on Sunday last with two lectures by Mr. Cohen. Nearly a hundred members have been enrolled, and all are in the best of spirits over the work done, in anticipation of what will be done when the work recommences in the autumn. The sale of literature has been excellent at all the meetings, and this means a very real enforcement of the message delivered from the platform.

All the committee and members of the Branch are loud in their praise of the industry and ability of the Branch Secretary, Mr. H. Black, and at the evening meeting Mr. Cohen was asked to present the Secretary, who was also the chairman of the meeting, with a fountain pen as a mark of the esteem in which all hold his services. The presentation came as a complete surprise to Mr. Black, but was welcomed for the spirit in which the present was made. We congratulate the Branch on having so efficient a Secretary, and can heartily add our own appreciation of his work, and also of the spirit in which the Branch is working. While that continues success is assured.

Mr. Percy Wilde gave a much appreciated lecture before the South London Branch on the "Descent of Man" with lantern illustrations. We understand that Mr. Wilde is willing to lecture on the same subject with the same illustrations before other Societies. Those who require particulars should write Miss Vance for particulars.

Is not the time come when the powerful countries of Europe should reduce those military armaments which they have so sedulously raised? Is not the time come when they should be prepared to declare that there is no use in such overgrown establishments? What is the advantage of one power greatly increasing its army and navy? Does it not see that, if it possesses such increase for self-protection and defence, the other powers will follow its example? The consequence of this state must be, that no increase of relative strength will accrue to any one power, but there must be a universal consumption of the resources of every country in military preparations. They are, in fact, depriving peace of half its advantages, and anticipating the energies of war whenever they may be required. I do not mean to advocate any romantic notion of each nation trusting with security the professions of its neighbours; but if each country were to commune with itself and ask—What is at present the danger of foreign invasion compared to the danger of producing dissatisfaction and discontent, and curtailing the comforts of the people by undue taxation? The answer must be this—That the danger of aggression is infinitely less than the danger of those sufferings to which the present exorbitant expenditure must give rise.—Sir Robert Peel.

The Queen of Night.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 182.)

SUSPENDED in space at a distance of a quarter of a million miles from our planet's surface, the orb of night tends constantly to fall towards the earth. But at a distance so great, in falling in the direction of the earth, the moon travels round it.

With a powerful telescope, the thousands of miles which separate us from our satellite are reduced to hundreds. This implies that, in the observatory, the lunar landscape is seen as if it were distant about 240 miles, and the objects on the moon's surface appear much as objects would be seen if viewed at the same distance with the unaided eye. Huge masses such as mountains, or broad expanses such as plains or dead oceans, may be rendered conspicuous, while a giant structure such as a cathedral would be visible; but smaller features elude observation. So far as direct observation informs us, the moon might teem with life without our knowledge. But there are other ways of determining the presence of organic bodies on the moon. Air and water are alike indispensable to the existence of floral and faunal entities on our globe. Therefore, in the absence of water and air on the lunar orb, the existence of life, at least as we know it, is completely precluded. Cogent reasons there are for thinking that, even if water be present on the moon's surface, it remains constantly congealed. Traces of water may possibly survive in the moon's interior; for, as the lunar world cooled down, its liquids penetrated the moon's mineral masses. But it is practically certain that the lunar surface is, and has been for ages, quite destitute of water.

The existence of a thin lunar atmosphere is still undecided; but if any atmosphere there be, it is so highly attenuated that no earthly organism could breathe in it. Gases environ Venus, Jupiter, Saturn, Mars, and the other planets, while the solar orb itself is encompassed by an enormous atmosphere, although its constituents are widely different to the oxygen and nitrogen which so largely enter into the composition of our planet's envelope of air. In this respect, the moon seems distinctly different to all the other members of the solar system available for purposes of study. Aside from the circumstance that some astronomers have detected faint indications of the existence of gaseous substances in depressions on the lunar surface, there appears not the slightest evidence of any lunar atmosphere whatever. Certainly it could be urged that it is impossible to view a translucent envelope. But, in the presence of any atmospheric covering, various phenomena might justly be expected; yet, as these are all absent, the hypothesis of a lunar atmosphere meets with small acceptance.

As the moon wanders round our earth, it occasionally passes between our planet and a star. The star is thus occulted or eclipsed by the moon. When an occultation is predicted, the observer notes our satellite's approach to the star, and immediately the moon moves in front of it, the star is extinguished. But the star's disappearance is so sudden that the moment of extinction may be precisely determined. Now, it is obvious that were the moon encircled by an atmosphere, then a star could not be occulted with such startling suddenness. For, if a lunar atmosphere remotely resembling the earth's atmosphere in density existed, a star would steadily fade and become invisible before it reached the moon's edge. The faintest atmosphere would not only suffice to displace the star, but its appearance would be materially affected by refraction. Such phenomena as these, did they occur, could scarcely escape notice. Similarly, at times of solar eclipse, the lunar disc always appears clearly cut against that of the sun. And there are no traces of twilight on the lunar landscape, nor is there any softening at the shadows' edges, and both these effects would be observed if an atmosphere existed.

A world without water and destitute of any appreciable atmosphere is something entirely alien to us. The earth's mantle of air shields us from the scorching heat of the sun, and keeps the earth temperate during the night by hindering the rapid radiation into space of the warmth accumulated through the sunlit hours. But during the lunar day the solar rays make the moon's surface insufferably hot, although the heat is radiated away with great rapidity. The lunar night is pitilessly cold. The temperature of the moon in daytime probably attains our boiling point of water (212 deg. F.), while the frigidity of the night is probably twice as great as that of our polar regions.

Many superstitions are associated with the moon. In our Midland counties and elsewhere it is thought unlucky to kill pigs in the waning of the moon. Throughout Western Europe the belief is almost universal that the varying aspects of the moon affects the weather. But, as Dolmage reminds us, the moon is constantly changing during the whole of her monthly revolution. "Besides," he remarks,— > the moon is visible over a great part of the earth at the same moment, and certainly all the places from which it can be seen, do not get the same weather. Further, careful observations, and records extending over the past 100 years and more, fail to show any reliable connection between the phases of the moon and the condition of the weather.

It may be interesting to anticipate the emotions of the aviator of the future were he to successfully accomplish a voyage to the moon. Our airless and desolate satellite is a world of endless calm. No sound breaks the silence, no rivers run, no changes of any kind occur. The solar rays strike down upon a wilderness of barren rocks, and black shadows shroud the valleys. The stern contrasts of this barren globe are utterly unrelieved. The craters of the moon would present a melancholy picture of former glory, and the prophet Jeremiah mourning amid the ruins of Jerusalem may, perhaps, serve as an earthly parallel of the feelings likely to overpower an imaginative and sympathetic terrestrial visitor as he surveyed the silent memorials of a once active orb.

The moon's weight is only about one-eightieth part of that of our planet, and therefore the weights of lunar objects would be merely one-sixth part of the weight they possess on our globe. If our adventurous airman were a man of twelve stone, his weight would be reduced to about two stone. He would be able to jump a twelve foot wall as readily as he vaulted a two-foot wall on earth. Buildings could securely rest on the moon were they six times the height of terrestrial structures without exercising any heavier strain on their foundations. We may, therefore, without wonder, regard the fact that lunar elevations attain an altitude exceeding our loftiest mountain peaks. Mount Everest is the mightiest of the earth's elevations, and reaches a height of 29,000 feet. Lunar mountains of this height are numerous, while in one range known as the Leibnitz mountains there are several peaks which soar aloft to nearly 30,000 feet. One majestic peak of this lunar range ascends to an elevation of 36,000 feet.

Still more remarkable are the extinct volcanoes of the moon. Their craters are sometimes many miles in diameter. Indeed, the enormous craters of the giant volcanoes form chasms 100 miles across. The earth's leading elevations are huge mountain masses such as the Andes and Himalayas. On the moon, however, the crater type is predominant, and in past times our satellite must have been the theatre of stupendous eruptions. Lunar craters to the number of 3,000 have been mapped already, and Professor Pickering assures us that there are more than 200,000 craters visible on that hemisphere which the moon displays to our planet. Unlike terrestrial volcanoes, those of the lunar orb lie in superficial depressions on its surface. But so immense is their diameter that a dozen of our largest volcanoes could be placed in one of the lunar rings or craters without filling it.

The height of the moon's mountains is determined by means of the shadows they cast. The length of a shadow is ascertained from the position of the sun. Shadows are at their shortest at noon, but the shadows lengthen as the sun descends to his rest. The altitudes of the lunar elevations are measured by first ascertaining the solar elevation above the horizon of the position occupied by the mountain. The shadow's length is then determined, and, consequently, the height of the object capable of casting a shadow of a given length in miles when the sun is situated at a certain position in the sky is easily established.

It has been scientifically known for several centuries that the moon is always present in the heavens in the form of a globe. Yet there are multitudes of people, even in our own enlightened Isles, who appear to imagine that the moon really increases and diminishes in size. It is true that Coleridge made his "Ancient Mariner" see a star lying within the horns of the crescent moon, and the idea that a star may be visible through what is in reality the dark body of the lunar orb, is still quite general even among "educated" citizens. Pictorial advertisements are sometimes displayed on the hoardings in which stars appear in that part of the sky where the opaque body of the moon is always present in a state of Nature. As the moon is sufficiently dense to eclipse the sun, it should be capable of blotting out the stars. It is a serious reproach to our modern educational methods that even the ancient Babylonians surmised that the moon's phases were caused by its illumined hemisphere emerging more and more into view as our satellite travelled through the heavens. This was also known in classic Greece, and Aristotle asserted that the moon was a dark object of spherical form lit up by the effulgence of the sun.

Tales of Our Times.

IV.

THE Cannibal King was at lunch when the German missionary was announced, but the latter, being no stranger, was graciously accorded an interview. He found the monarch squatting on a lion's skin with a huge dish of raw meat in front of him, and vigorously gnawing at a bone.

"Good afternoon," said the King cordially. "Take a mat and make yourself at home. Have a chop?"

"No, thanks," said the Missionary, eyeing the dish with some suspicion. "What I called to see your Majesty about is a rumour I have heard that you are getting up a war expedition against the Pongowongo tribe. Is there any truth in it?

"There is," answered the King. "Most of my fighting men have already assembled, and we start for Pongowongoland early next week."

"What are you going to fight for?"

"Meat," replied the King.

"Meat!" exclaimed the Missionary, again glancing at his Majesty's lunch with evident disfavour. "I should have thought that meat was about the last thing you needed."

"War-meat," explained the King: "the flesh of brave and powerful warriors slain in battle. You, of course, understand that we don't look upon war-meat merely as food. We regard it as a means of gaining strength, courage, and proficiency in war. The fact is that we Nyamnyams have experienced such a long period of peace that we are getting thoroughly slack. War and war-meat are absolutely necessary to maintain the strength, bravery, and all the heroic and manly virtues of a nation. A people that doesn't frequently engage in war is bound to degenerate and become weak, effeminate, and cowardly."

"There is certainly much truth in what you say," observed the Missionary, "and many soldiers and writers in my country would quite agree with you—except, perhaps, as regards the war-meat."

"We believe thoroughly in it," said the King, "though I am sorry to say my fighting men haven't tasted it for so long that I am beginning to be seriously doubtful of their courage. I, myself, feel that I am degenerating, though I try to keep up my old ferocity on a sort of make-shift diet. Now, what do you suppose this is that I am eating?"

"Haven't the least idea."

"Rhinoceros," said the King. "Now that you white men have killed all the lions in our country, the rhinoceros is the fiercest beast we have, but his flesh is, after all, a poor substitute for the real thing. Anyhow, I try my best, but old Whangbango, the General of my army, is becoming a regular slacker. He is practically a vegetarian now, and pretends that meat gives him indigestion. Fancy the Generalissimo of the Nyamnyam complaining of indigestion!"

"Deplorable," assented the Missionary. "But now, your Majesty, I want to make a suggestion to you. Instead of marching against the Pongowongos, why not make an alliance with them, and in co-operation with the troops of my august master the All-Highest, invade the British territories to the east of us? The great Kaiser intends to bring the whole of Africa under his dominion, and your Majesty's sound views on the advantages of war and the evils of peace—which are practically identical with those of our own great Von Bernhardi—mark you out as his natural ally. The Nyamnyams and the Pongowongos, numbering together, I understand, about a hundred thousand warriors, would be of great assistance in our coming campaigns; and when the conquest of Africa is completed, as it certainly will be in time, I can promise that your Majesty would be established as chief potentate on this continent under the gracious suzerainty of the All-Highest."

"It is a tempting proposal," said the King reflectively as he picked his teeth with a splinter of rhinoceros bone. "It would no doubt be a supreme honour to be chief potentate under your great Kaiser, and the conquest of all Africa certainly affords a prospect of unlimited war-meat. But I am afraid I cannot give you a definite answer just yet. Fact is, I can't quite see my warriors fighting side by side with the Pongowongos at such short notice, after we have been consistently fighting and eating each other for centuries. Besides, the Pongowongos already know of our intention to attack them, and have been mustering their fighting men as busily as we have, so I am afraid it is too late now for fraternizing. But after this little picnic is over there may be a chance of an alliance. The Nyamnyams and the Pongowongos are never so disposed towards friendliness as immediately after one of these little scraps, so that would be the time to try and put your proposal into practice, and I promise to do my best in the matter."

After a few mutual compliments the interview came to an end, and next day the supposed Missionary—who was, by the way, no missionary at all, but a political agent in diguise—sent a despatch to the chief of the Secret Service Department in the Fatherland. In it he stated that the All-Highest's schemes for the conquest of Africa were progressing favourably, and that he had practically secured the alliance of a powerful and enlightened monarch who, despite a tendency to look at military questions from a rather gastronomic point of view, showed a quite intelligent grasp of the leading principles of German kultur.

Writers and Readers.

IN the first article of this series I mentioned that I would be glad to have any "relevant comments" on my remarks. The word "relevant" may have frightened those of my readers who stand in need of information which has no immediate relation to the subjects in hand. Let me say that I invite not only relevant comment, but also questions bearing upon literature, and the literary and historical aspects of Freethought. Where, in my opinion, the subjects suggested, or questions asked have a general interest, I shall take the opportunity of answering my correspondents through the paper, and where the interest is merely personal, I shall reply direct. The most pressing need of a paper whose attitude to life and thought is opposed to that of the majority of people, and depends so much upon moral courage, is the cultivation of a more intimate relation between writer and reader. The benefit, let me remark, is by no means on one side. The reader stands to profit by the wider experience of the writer, who will profit equally, if not more, by the suggestion of new points of view, and by the raising again of questions which, he thought, had been answered once for all.

* * * * *

A correspondent who writes me an interesting letter from "Somewhere in France" tells me that he shares my admiration for G. H. Lewes. He seems to have missed Lewes's little book on The Spanish Drama, and asks for information about it. It is a 12mo. volume of 253 pages, published by Charles Knight in 1846, and may not infrequently be picked up for sixpence on the bookstalls. Although written so long ago, it is still a good popular introduction to the subject. It deals in a bright and lively way with the origins and characteristics of the Spanish theatre, and then analyses at length the best plays of Lope de Vega (1562-1635) and Calderon (1600-1681). Lewes's same criticism is a rebound from the hyperbolical eloquence of the Schlegels who claimed to find Calderon more philosophical than Shakespeare, whose irreligious humanism had no solution for the problems of life. Calderon, a devout Catholic, and an Inquisitor, who would have cheerfully burnt heretics like our own Marlowe, is praised for solving the riddles of existence in terms of Catholic dogma. Surely the least expensive of solutions! In opposition to the German Romantic critics, for whose hazy metaphysics he had a robust contempt, Lewes stresses the contrast between the intellectual and moral ideals of the religious drama of Spain and the irreligious drama of Elizabethan England. In the one there is no attempt to portray character, human nature is looked at from the outside, the pivot of the drama being the play of external events, of mere intrigue. In the other it is pre-eminently the individual that counts; it is the complex mentality of Hamlet that converts a drama of murders and intrigue into a subtle presentment of human life. Another point Lewes insists upon is the ethical contrast. Homicide, adultery, perjury, and other unsocial actions, are mere venial offence for the Spanish dramatist; the one unpardonable crime is denial of the deity. In Calderon's Devotion to the Cross there is a typical religious scoundrel named Ennio. "He recounts," says Lewes, > a few exploits which have distinguished him, such as the murder of an old Hidalgo and the abduction of the daughter; stabbing another Hidalgo in his nuptial chamber and carrying off his wife. He sought refuge in a convent, and seduced one of the nuns. This apex of his villainy revealed to him the existence of his only virtue. He has a virtue, and one popular enough to cover a multitude of sins. His seduction of the nun stung him with remorse, and the first pangs of conscience he had ever felt. This glimpse of the true faith saved him. The terror of the offended Church and tribute to her awful power is the cause of his salvation.

* * * * *

Yet there is the lyrical side of Calderon's genius to balance his want of the higher objectivity. The gorgeous and luxurial imaginary, the irredescent colours, the subtle sound-patterns did not appeal to the somewhat pedestrian taste of Lewes. If any reader wants a sympathetic study of Calderon as a poet he will find it in Archbishop Trench's An Essay on the Life and Genius of Calderon (2nd edition, 1888). But, better still, because to read a book is always preferable to reading about it, he will turn to Shelley's translation of parts of The Wonder-working Magician, and to Edward Fitzgerald's Six Dramas of Calderon Freely Translated (1853). He will there find material which will help him to appreciate the truth of Lewes's indictment of the Roman faith as a hindrance to dramatic truth. He will also see what it is in Calderon that aroused the enthusiasm of Byron, Shelley, and Goethe.

* * * * *

One of the natural results of periods of great mental and emotional stress is a revival of the grosser forms of superstition. It cropped up everywhere in the Napoleonic period. A belief in "spooks," the communication of the dead with the living, is nowadays the unphilosophical side of a tendency to discredit reason in favour of instinct or intuition. An unconsciously amusing instance of this new necromancy is giving our ready journalists a chance of spreading themselves in non-committal praise or censure. An architect and archæologist, a Mr. F. B. Bond, has just published a book called The Gate of Remembrance (Oxford: Blackwell). It is the history of a psychological ("spookological" would be a better word) experiment which led to the discovery of the Edgar Chapel of Glastonbury. The chapel, I am assured by sceptical archæologists, might easily have been discovered without the assistance of monastic "spooks," for its position in relation to the main building is precisely what one would have expected from other early English structures. The chapel is mentioned in early documents, and there appears to be little doubt that Mr. Bond would have excavated where he did even if he had had no ghostly instructions. The "spooks," I am afraid, were worked in to sell the book, which, as a mere archæological monograph, would have attracted only the antiquarian specialist.

* * * * *

The method is interesting, and seems to have been something like this. The business is done by two persons who are either adepts in necromancy or practical jokers. On the whole, I am inclined to think that the book is a rather heavy joke; but mine, I may say, is not the general opinion. One of the persons is a specialist in archæology, with a knowledge of every fact about the Abbey; the other is an automatic writer, a spiritualistic medium. The operator, as it were, sends out a spiritual wireless, calling for help to discover the Edgar Chapel. The message is received by some monkish "spooks" who had been attached to the Abbey, and they are glad of an opportunity to talk on a subject they have at heart. Sometimes the ghostly monks are out in their reckoning, especially with regard to measurements, but correct themselves wken sharply taken up by the operator. The unfortunate thing is that they do not tell Mr. Bond anything he did not know before; but, of course, there is no reason why they shouldn't, and an intelligent "spook" with exclusive knowledge of the subject could relieve us of no small part of our ignorance. And another objection to ghostly communications is that you may get on to a jocular spirit, who will amuse himself by pulling your leg. Yet there are any number of people who read this "psychical" rubbish with bated breath, and who groan with horror if you suggest a hoax.

* * * * *

Still, the method is one that might be used with effect if one could only get on to the right sort of spook. If Mr. J. M. Robertson, with the help of a medium, could have a long conversation with Robert Greene, George Peele, or

Digitized by Google

Christopher Marlowe, he would be able to re-write his book on Titus Andranicus, and would settle the question of the Doubtful Plays once for all. The ingenuous reader will at once see that the method only needs to be applied to produce the most startling results.

Correspondence.

CONSCIOUS VILLAINY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I always look forward with such pleasurable anticipation to "Views and Opinions," which I invariably read more than once, and sometimes more than twice—and never fail to find stimulating—that I may, I hope, be pardoned a word of criticism on the first paragraph, in the issue of the Freethinker for March 17. The Editor says:—

> In judging the evils current in any state of society, there is always a tendency to consider the class that profits from their existence as deliberately and consciously perpetuating them. This view, however, involves a totally false estimate of the quality of the social forces and of human nature. Conscious villainy is not a powerful factor in human affairs. The number who can plainly say, "Evil, be thou my good," is never more than a very small minority. Paradoxical as it may sound, deliberate and conscious villainy implies a degree of moral courage possessed by few, etc.

As a holder of the view which, the Editor declares, involves a "totally false estimate of the quality of the social forces and of human nature," I respectfully beg that my dissent may be recorded. I could not love our paper less, loved I not Freethought more.

I may not, of course, be right; it may be that there is some perverse residual religious element in my bones; but if I am wrong, I should like to be convinced of it. Constitutionally, the Editor differs from many of us in one very material respect. He never was a Christian. This may enable him to exercise a judgment more detached, and more impersonal and philosophical, than is possible to ex-Christians; but I venture to think that the observation and experience of very many will endorse my opinion, which is that the Editor has "got the wrang soo by the lug," or, as they say in Aberdeen (varying the metaphor), "tittit the vrang towie," this time.

I can understand it may be argued that lack of intellectual perception takes away consciousness and deliberation from villainy; but I should require very clear evidence to satisfy me that the class that profits from the existence of the evils current in society are such intellectual moles as acceptance of the Editor's proposition would condemn them to be. Villains who feel the need of religion betray their consciousness of the villainy of their depredations by their varying attitudes under varying conditions:—

> When the devil was ill the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil was well the devil a monk was he.

A religious person cannot escape the admission that evil is "ordained" or "permitted" by his deity for some mysterious "purpose." It is no disproof of consciousness and deliberation in villainy that the villains, because of the opportunities furnished by wealth and comfort, engage in social activities of different kinds. Indeed, these activities are generally directed to the buttressing and perpetuation of conditions, institutions, and a system under which villainy in different forms is legalized and legally protected. Social pirates, plunderers, and profiteers are out to keep "evil" as far away from themselves as they possibly can. Divinely ordained evil is for the "other fellows." And society has sustained great loss by the enforced inactivity of many potentially useful individuals who are the victims of adverse conditions inflicted by the evils current in our state of society.

No doubt there is to conventional minds difficulty in separating and distinguishing activities which are purely religious and activities which are purely secular. But to the professional religionist all secular activities which are not sanctioned by, and do not subserve the interests of, religion are valueless. Nay, they are in his estimation, positively hurtful. And yet the professional religionist can find justification for any kind of villainy so long as it subserves religious interests (cf. the case of Rahab the harlot). How can we say there is no deliberate hypocrisy in the attitude of the religious man, who has had the benefits of a good, all-round secular education, and takes this course? We have even known of clergymen who banned with one hand what they blessed with the other. The most eloquent clerical advocate of prohibition of alcoholic liquor does not refuse to accept pay partly contributed by brewers, distillers, and publicans.

My point is that professional religionists consciously and deliberately dose the common people with their narcotics. They are thus as the henchmen of the governing and wealthy classes of society deliberately and consciously trying to blind the poor to the injustices from which they suffer. So long as the poor majority are content to believe that all is for the best in this best of possible worlds, what object has the rich minority in trying to do anything to bring about radical changes? That minority may engage in social activities, but it is all camouflage. These activities are consciously and deliberately directed not towards effecting fundamental changes, but towards maintaining the status quo.

Finally, I demur to the suggestion that deliberate and conscious villainy implies a degree of moral courage possessed by few. Why should such courage be required by any one whose villainies are not punishable by any legal penalties?

Religion and the National Crisis.

However grave the situation may be, at home or abroad, nothing seems strong enough to stop the tomfoolery of the Churches. At the beginning of the year we had the stupendous farce of another day of national prayer—under royal patronage. This was followed by an immediate series of disasters—a week's list of which we supplied at the time. A few days ago we had the opening of the new German offensive, which has certainly exposed this country to a graver danger than has threatened it for some time—if not graver than has ever before faced it. German and British have officially appealed to the same God for help, and, judging by results, he has favoured the former. If the German Armies have not done more, if their success has not been more pronounced, the credit must be placed to the obstinate courage, the determination, and the sacrifice of the men of the Allied Forces. They have done what "the God of Righteousness" has failed to do. And if we have to offer prayers of thankfulness to anyone, it should be to them.

Prayers for Victory.

For Easter week another orgy of prayer was advised —or ordered—by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Free Churches have endorsed the suggestion. We are to rely upon the Lord, we are to "pray to him for victory." Does anyone seriously believe that a week of prayer will have the least effect on the issue? Is the general confidence—a confidence which we share—that horrible as the slaughter now is, and however regrettable the forcing back of the Allied lines may be, victory for Germany is a practical impossibility, is that confidence based upon the help of God, or upon a calm survey of the quantity and quality of the opposing forces? Everyone knows the truth. We do not, in taking stock of the Allied resources, take their prayers or God's help into account. We count men, money, munitions, courage, resolution—everything but religion. The Archbishop of Canterbury says we are to pray "that the blood of our dearest and most honoured shall not have been spilt in vain." But the real question for the Archbishop to answer is, why this innocent blood shall have been spilt at all? God's justice is not vindicated by using innocent blood as a cement for building a better social structure. That is an impeachment of his care. A God who so manages a world that the innocent suffer—even though their descendants benefit—and in which the guilty flourish—even though their descendants are punished—is revolting to every sane notion of right and wrong.

Man Power and the Clergy.

Meanwhile, it is clear that the German offensive means a fresh demand upon the resources of the nation. Peace is farther off than ever while one side is pursuing what appears a victorious career. But we observe that there are two sources of help that still remain untapped. The first is the application of the Military Service Act to the clergy. It is little short of a scandal that while military service is demanded from all others, a whole class should be declared exempt. If we were really savages, and believed that the exhibitions of a priest in public, or the uttering of magical incantations by a medicine man had a direct effect on the fortunes of war, then we could appreciate the exemption of the clergy. But no one really believes this. The Trades Union Congress, which represents the organized labour of the country, actually called for the conscription of the clergy. Their exemption is no more than a piece of political jobbery. It was, probably, thought that this close corporation was too powerful for attack, and their exemption was a reminder to those who are apt to underestimate the organized power of the British priesthood. But now we see that Parliament is to reconsider the whole question of the nation's man-power. And we suggest that now is the time for this question to be reopened. Men are called upon to serve, so are women. Why not make the same call upon Sydney Smith's famous third sex? Those who preach war can have no rational objection to practising it.

Why are the Clergy Exempt?

About a year ago the Archbishop of Canterbury informed the House of Convocation that the clergy were exempt because "to them had been assigned a great responsibility in the nation's life at all times, and never more so than at such a time as this." What is this responsibility? The Archbishop was wise enough not to be precise. He was content to say that they have a great responsibility. Can anyone say what it is? If it is to keep the world at peace they are obviously unfitted for that task. It cannot be to improve the mental health of the nation; no more fatal influence than theirs can be cited. Every church admits this—of all other churches. It cannot be to keep people morally healthy, for the growth of morality is dependent upon the working of a number of factors not one of which can be properly described as religious. And the morality of a people is usually lowest when and where the rule of the clergy is strongest. It is a sheer insult to the national intelligence to say that an only son, or the head of a family, or the owner of a business that cannot exist without his control, all these can be spared, but that a mentally half-emasculated priesthood, many without even family responsibilities, cannot be taken without risk to the country's welfare.

Tax the Churches.

The other source of help is a financial one. The Government is urging upon everyone the need of the most rigorous economy. Money for the conduct of the War is urgently needed, and fresh taxation, in one form or another, is being imposed. But there is one untaxed source—always a gross anomaly, and now a positive injustice. Churches and chapels, with their annexes, are still free from taxation. Even a hospital cannot demand exemption. A church may. Why not place churches on the same level as all other property? As it stands, this exemption is a Government subsidy in disguise, since others have to make good the default of the Churches. Everybody else is called upon to pay the rates and taxes which the Churches should themselves pay. And as the Government is urging us to economize in every other direction, why should it not urge us to economize on religion—at least, during the War? Why should we still send out of the country millions annually on so gross an imposture as Foreign Missions? The Japanese, the Chinese, the Hindoos, the Jews—abroad and at home—will manage quite well without these missions, at least, until the end of the War. Let us save money, by all means. And let the Government urge this upon the religious members of the community.

Treat the Clergy as Citizens.

We agree with those who say that the country is passing through a prolonged and acute crisis. We also agree with those who say that this War will be quite unproductive of good, as against a mountain of admitted evil, unless we learn to take a fresh valuation of all our ideas and institutions. And surely religion is one of the things that call for a fresh valuation. From the dawn of history human society has had fastened upon it a priesthood, which represents one of the greatest parasitic classes known. It is non-productive in the fullest sense of the term. Its record is one of folly tending to crime, and of crime resulting from folly. In a time of peace it can do nothing to stop the emergence of war; in a time of war it can do nothing to hasten the return of peace. Surely it is time that the Government and the people of a civilized country took this class at its proper value. At a time when all are called upon for service, when the nation is called upon for fresh endeavours and renewed sacrifices, is there any valid reason why the clergy and their churches should continue exempt from obligations which fall upon all other citizens?

Chapman Cohen.

The Christ-Myth.

All Christians admit that never was a revival of religion more urgently needed than it is at the present moment; a few declare that it is already at the door; and one or two fanatics assure us that it has even commenced in some parts of the country, and is destined to win the people back to Christ and his Church. When an unbeliever visits churches and chapels up and down the land, his report of what he hears and sees differs considerably from what the representatives of the various schools of professing Christians imagine they both hear and see. Of a coming revival he certainly discerns no sign whatsoever. He listens intently, but can hear no wind of promise shaking the tops of the proverbial mulberry trees. Generally speaking, churches and chapels are being gradually deserted everywhere. Of course, there are exceptions. Oratory still draws overflowing crowds to any place of worship. Popular preachers never lack full congregations; but it is they who attract, not the Gospel which they preach. It is they who are appreciated by the multitudes, not the message of salvation through faith in the finished work of Christ. The same message from the lips of an ambassador whom Nature has not endowed with an eloquent tongue sends the handful who attend to sleep. Of the truth of this statement we were furnished with an apt illustration, the other Sunday morning, at a large Wesleyan Church in a well-known provincial town, with a population of over two hundred thousand. This commodious building, seated for at least eight hundred people, was attended by less than fifty, several of whom fell fast asleep under the sermon, not because the sermon was in any sense a poor one, but simply because the preacher displayed no oratorial gifts whatever. From a theological and homiletical point of view, the discourse was equal in matter and composition to any ever delivered by such a master of assemblies as Dr. Campbell Morgan. The text was, "Christ in you" (Col. i. 27), in the exposition of which the preacher showed a more than average measure of ingenuity and insight, but he never once got into grips with his forty odd hearers. There was not one note in his voice that vibrated with feeling; he never even touched a single heart present, much less played with quickening effect upon its keys. As an intellectual performance the service was of a high order, as services go; but as nobody ever dreams of visiting a place of worship for an intellectual treat, but always in the hope of being moved, stirred, tickled, or intoxicated emotionally, the service under consideration was a total failure.

Now, the fact of supreme importance, in this connection, is that the Christian Gospel does not, and never did, possess the omnipotent attractiveness attributed to it by its professional champions, and that it lacks winsomeness simply because it is not true. "Christ in you" is a theological hypothesis, a mystical conception, based upon a purely metaphysical assumption, which is founded upon no fact whatever. Christ is what the divines call a thranthropic person, neither wholly God nor yet wholly man, but an incredible mixture of both. Until about two thousand years ago no such being had ever existed, the real significance of the Incarnation being that a new species of personality appeared in the world. The great modern exponent of this doctrine was the late Professor Shedd, of Union Theological Seminary, New York; but it is substantially the view of Christ held by all orthodox theologians everywhere. They usually speak of him as the God-man, whose mission in the flesh was to make legally possible a reconciliation between the offended Deity and mankind. No doubt this view of Christ and his work is germinally present in the Pauline and Petrine Epistles and, to a certain extent, in the Four Gospels. His work was through suffering to become the Captain of Salvation, to become the propitiation for human sin, and so to abolish the enmity between God and man. In him there were two natures united in a new person: the Divine nature, so that he could represent God to man; and human nature, that he might represent man to God. In other words, he was a supernatural being in whom two natures, the one infinite and the other finite, met and kissed each other, and who, in consequence, became, by his death, a mediator between God and man, reconciling them to each other. In him God can justify the guilty and save the sinful, and in him man enters into loving fellowship with Heaven. The great motto of the Christian religion, therefore, is "In Christ." Without Christ mankind are doomed to perish for ever, but in Christ is salvation, full and free. To be in Christ by faith is the sole condition of acceptance with Heaven and of endless bliss therein. But the curious thing is, that in some inexplicable sense these three, God, Christ, and believing man, are in one another. Christ is represented as saying, "I am in the Father, and the Father is in me," and as praying for his disciples "that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." Now, the first and never ending duty of believers is to eat Christ, so that he may be in them the secret and principle of their life, as well as their hope of glory.

Such, in substance, was the Gospel preached at the above-mentioned Wesleyan Church on a recent Sunday morning, and such, no doubt, was the Gospel promulgated in most churches during the Easter holidays a week ago; but it is an essentially lying Gospel, because Christ is a wholly fictitious character, who never existed except in the imagination of those who profess him. As portrayed in the Four Gospels he is an utterly impossible being—quite as impossible as Osiris, Adonis, Attis, or Mithra, on whom he is largely modelled. These documents pretend to be biographical sketches; but the truth is, as pointed out by Professor Gilbert Murray, that the supposed history contained in them will not bear critical examination. Intensely interesting they are from a mythological point of view; but to treat them as historical is to show the blindest credulity. Take, for example, the story of the Incarnation as related in the first and third Gospels, and you will find yourselves in the region of sheer mythology. Besides, nothing can be clearer than that the Virgin Birth was never even dreamt of by the original writers of the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, in which Jesus is invariably treated as the son of Joseph and Mary. His genealogy as given in both respects the line of Joseph, which would be ridiculous on the supposition that Joseph was not his father. It was by his parents that the child Jesus was taken to the temple "to do for him after the custom of the law"; and after listening to Simeon's glowing predictions as to his future career, "Joseph and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him," not even his mother having indulged in any wild dreams concerning him. We read that "his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover"; and when, at twelve years of age he gave them the slip on the return journey, and they found him, after long and anxious search, "in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions," his mother rebuked him, saying: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." At that time Mary had no idea that she had given birth to a God-man, who would be known as the Saviour of the world. Then the silence of Mark and John indicates that the supernatural conception was an afterthought, while even the Apostle Paul declares that the Redeemer was "born under the law." One apologist explains all this away thus:—

> In speech which was not designed to be formally dogmatic it was the most natural thing in the world to place Joseph along with Mary under the parental category, since he fulfilled parental offices toward Jesus, and in the common view was undoubtedly taken as his father. Whatever may have been the conviction of Mary, it was in the nature of the case next to impossible that belief in the extraordinary distinction of her child should gain real lodgment in the minds of neighbours and acquaintances generally in advance of an extraordinary history of the child. Inevitably he would be referred to as the carpenter's son, and the evangelist in admitting a like form of words was only adopting an accommodation which it was much easier to admit than to exclude.

As a matter of fact, what we see in both the Gospels and the Epistles is Christ in the making, and not by any means the completed portrait. Paul's Christ had no history, and no body of teaching attributed to him, his death and resurrection being the only points of essential importance. In the Gospels, Paul's Christ is given an alleged history which led up to the atoning death and life-giving resurrection. By-and-bye it dawned upon the authors or editors of two of the Gospels that a life ending so magnificently and so fruitfully ought to be represented as beginning in a fashion correspondingly glorious and impressive, and the Virgin Birth, taken over from Gentile mythology was introduced. The construction of the Christ with whom we are familiar to-day was a task that occupied many centuries. The Gospels are semi-metaphysical novelettes, while the Epistles are, for the most part, replete with metaphysical dreams and fabulous riddles.

(To be concluded.) J. T. Lloyd.

Francis Thompson.

> That same gentle spirit from whose pen
> Large streams of honey and sweet nectar flow.
> —Spenser.

> It is the part of a wise man to have preferences, but no exclusions.—Voltaire.

Amid thousands of obscure and unloved graves at Kensal Green Cemetery is one with the touching inscription, "Look for me in the nurseries of heaven." This is the last resting-place of the unfortunate Francis Thompson, who was buried there a decade ago. He was then almost unknown, and during his lifetime he had suffered the hardships of lonely poverty to a degree not surpassed by any of the most unfortunate poets of the world. He had sounded the gamut of misery and privation. Many nights he slept upon the Thames Embankment, and under carts in Covent Garden Market. He hawked matches in the Strand, and was a bookseller's porter, staggering through London streets with a heavy sack upon his back. When he was carried to his grave, only a few intimate friends, who had looked after him for the last sad months of his life, were present to mourn. Now Thompson is placed by all good judges in the ranks of poets of genius, and the proud garland of laurel decorates his tomb which was denied to the living man.

It is possible to overrate and to underestimate Francis Thompson's merits; but no one would contend that he was other than a genuine and unmistakable poet. A very unequal writer, he sometimes soared to the pure ether of the great singers, and at other times fell to the lower slopes of Parnassus. He had, indeed, his faults; but against them must be placed his unbalanced, imaginative, reckless nature There can hardly be a sadder story than his in the whole history of literature, though Chatterton, Villon, Poe, James Thomson, and Paul Verlaine are among them. To be at once a genius and a drudge, to live in direst poverty and to die of a lingering disease, is as melancholy a lot as can be imagined. Nor would he deserve less pity if we denied his genius. His faults, whatever they may have been, injured himself alone; but genius he most certainly had.

Thompson is a poet's poet, like Blake, Rossetti, Keats, and Shelley. His kinship with these singers is far nearer than to Crashaw and the ecclesiastical mystics. Assuredly, he calls for a meed of praise equal to that accorded to Maeterlinck, D'Annunzio, Rostand, and other continental writers for whom so many British altars have flamed in worship. Thompson's genius was Oriental, exuberant in colour, waven with rich and strange textures. His poetry was mainly a splendid rhetoric, imaginative and passionate, as if the moods went by robed in imperial purple in a great procession.

His masterpiece, "The Hound of Heaven," is molten white with passion. Listen to these lines, in which the alchemy of the poet's genius transmutes the dross of theology into the fine gold of poetry:—

> I dimly guess what time in mists confounds;
> Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds
> From the hid battlements of eternity,
> Those shaken mists a space unsettle, then
> Round the half-glimpsed turrets slowly wash again;
> But not ere him who summoneth
> I first have seen, enwound
> With glooming robes purpureal, cypress crowned;
> His name I know, and what his trumpet saith.

Now hear the sonorous and stately valediction which concludes his "Anthem of Earth":—

> Now, mortal, son-like,
> I thou hast suckled, mother, I at last
> Shall sustenant be to thee. Here I untrammel,
> Here I pluck loose the body's cerementing,
> And break the tomb of life; here I shake off
> The bur of the world, man's congregation shun,
> And to the antique order of the dead
> I take the tongueless vow; my cell is set
> Here in thy bosom; my little trouble is ended
> In a little peace.

How fine, too, is his charming vision of the woman sleeping in the child, like a dainty dryad hiding among the lush leaves of early summer:—

> Thou whose young sex is yet but in thy soul,
> As, hoarded in the vine,
> Hang the gold skins of undelirious wine,
> As air sleeps, till it toss its limbs in breeze.

The closing stanza of Daisy is dangerously near perfection:—

> She went her unremembering way;
> She went, and left in me
> The pang of all the partings gone,
> And partings yet to be.

There used to be a tradition in common literary circles that poets cannot write good prose. It was a ridiculous theory. To look at the prose of Byron, Coleridge, Meredith, Shelley, and Wordsworth, is to perceive its absurdity. Shakespeare wrote wonderful prose, as in Hamlet. The critics who affect to look down upon Thompson's prose are scribblers who are hardly entitled to look down on anything. Francis Thompson was a Catholic, and Shelley was an Atheist. Hundreds of men have written on Shelley, but Thompson's essay is, far and away, the finest ever written. This is what Francis Thompson says of the Prometheus Unbound:—

> It is unquestionably the greatest and most prodigal exhibition of Shelley's powers, this amazing lyric world, where immortal clarities sigh past in the perfumes of the blossoms, populate the breathings of the breeze, throng and twinkle in the leaves that twirl upon the bough; where the very grass is all a-rustle with lovely spirit-things; and a weeping mist of music fills the air. The final scenes especially are such a Bacchic reel and rout and revelry of beauty as leaves one staggered and giddy; poetry is spilt like wine, music runs to drunken waste. The choruses sweep down the wind, tirelessly, flight after flight, till the breathless soul almost cries for respite from the unrolling splendors.

A noble and true passage on Shelley's wondrous imagination is the following:—

> For astounding figurative opulence he yields only to Shakespeare, and even to Shakespeare not in absolute fecundity but in range of images. The sources of his figurative wealth are specialised, while the sources of Shakespeare's are universal. It would have been as conscious an effort for him to speak without figure as it is for most men to speak with figure. Suspended in the dripping well of his imagination the commonest object becomes encrusted with imagery.

What a superb tribute from one poet to another! And, remember, the tribute came from a Catholic poet to the Atheist singer. Literature, like music, is wider than opinion, broader than dogma, as limitless as the humanity to which it appeals. At the height of the Bradlaugh struggle, where Gladstone passionately addressed his speech on the Oaths Bill to a hushed and expectant House of Commons, he quoted some perfect lines from the old Roman Freethinker, Lucretius, as daring an Iconoclast as Bradlaugh himself. The majesty of the quotation was its justification. Gladstone's brain and taste persisted in being independent of his heart, like the French soldier who fought in the present War, and who, when killed, was found to have in his pocket a well-thumbed copy of Heine's poems. Catholic though he was, Francis Thompson deserves a few words of praise in a Freethought paper. He never did weak or puling work in prose or verse. Although he waged an unequal war against fate, he was at least a happy soldier. When his turn came, he yielded up his broken, but not dishonoured, sword with a brave and humble heart.

Mimnermus.

Obiter Dicta.

It was nearing the end of the month of February. A few shy primroses were peeping out of the early green in the woods. The calendines had appeared also, like golden stars. Blackthorn trees were in flower, and the birds had begun to sing at six o'clock in the morning. If one counted the number in any flock of birds, it was invariably even. The cock chaffinch was arrayed in all his glory of conquest; goldfinches were to be seen busily picking away at the dried thistleheads of last year. The hedge-sparrow could be heard singing his lively but short song, and any thoughtful person could look at the ruddy gold of dawn over the sea, and wonder: Was there ever such a spring as this? Was there ever such a spring as this in the year 1918, the present dispensation, when humanity seemed to be suffering from the result of a second Tower of Babel? Whether we hear it or not, Spring will sing her eternal song. The enchanting indifference of Nature fascinates, and sometimes repels.

It is not often that any valuable reading matter reaches a camp hut. We forget what matter of importance it was on which we were engaged when we came across a copy of Longman's Magazine, dated December, 1891. Our eye at once lighted upon an article in it by Richard Jefferies. It was entitled "The Coming of Summer," written in his glorious style of light and colour and harmony, and we took ourselves to a hillside to sit in the sun and read it for a second time. For a little while we were carried away on the wings of fancy; far, far away from the chatter and bluster of a world where ideals are weighted and thrown in the bottomless pit of ignorance.

As one witnesses the progress of the press from peace-time inanity to war-time stupidity and asinine levity, it is natural to surmise that oblivion will be its reward. The press will drag down humanity with it if Fate does not intervene in the destiny of mankind. Nietzsche was right in his splendid pronouncement when he said, "We despise the culture from newspaper reading." If the influence of newspaper propaganda be real, then mankind is on the wrong path; if the influence is nugatory, then there is a chance of mankind being saved. Idealists are once again faced with a new superstition—the superstition of the printed word. There are fakirs and high priests in the new religion; there are only a few honest men—and Richard Jefferies was one of the latter. His writings are examples of good taste, and thus far they claim a place in eternity. Some witty Frenchman said that words are given us to conceal our thoughts. If that be cynically true, then we imagine that the thought at the back of newspaper words must be in a very bad way. If we move out of the greenhouse atmosphere of the Frenchman into the open air of Richard Jefferies, we find that he uses words to express his thoughts; and in this respect he writes as a man who brings his best to the service of mankind. The world is now groaning for the lies and half-truths of the past; with clean hands and a good conscience, Free-thinkers can say this charge does not lie at their door. Christianity and Capitalism, with their tremendous reserves of power, may now share their joint responsibility in the mess, which could not be worse if the power had been in the hands of navvies or dustmen. With our ears filled with the braying of asses (of noble birth and otherwise), let us retire and listen to the liquid, honey-sweet words of Richard Jefferies. He writes:—

> A June rose. Something caught my eye on the top of the high hawthorn edge beside the Brighton Road one evening as it was growing dusk, and on looking again there was a spray of briar in flower, two roses in flower and out of reach, and one spray of three growing buds. So it is ever with the June rose. It is found unexpectedly, and when you are not looking for it. It is a gift, not a discovery, or anything earned—a gift like love and happiness.

We will match that passage with anything seeing the light of print since August, 1914.

Harry, my friend and kindred spirit, was with me on the hillside. In the distance we could see some sheep and lambs in an enclosure. The plaintive bleat of the lambs followed by the answer of the mothers called to my pessimism. "If mankind was articulate, we should hear it make a similar sound." "May be," replied Harry, looking across the sea, "if we could listen to the earth we should hear it groaning." We both lapsed into silence. Then, like sunshine and shadow (for your pessimist does not always live in gloom) I ventured. Won't it be grand when people will pass by that spot and say: "there was once a camp here!" "Yes," he replied, "the place will be covered with rich green grass, and we may be asleep." Children may pluck flowers where only thorns exist now." We got up and moved away towards our place of brief habitation.

Many readers may remember a series of articles, entitled "At the Sign of the Ship," written by Andrew Lang. In this copy of Longman's Magazine there is an interesting dialogue held in Elysium. Gathered together are the poet Gray, Sterne, Miss Austen, Thackeray, Sir Walter Scott, and Mrs. Hannah More, and there is flippant discourse between Sterne and Gray about French novels, with the inevitable rejoinders from the two ladies who seemed gravely concerned about the Rabelaisian parson. Sterne remembers, after preaching a sermon on the Prodigal Son, how a charming widow, with an eye, with an ankle ——. At this point he is brought to order by Miss Austen. Mrs. Hannah More is made to say something on the nature of vinegar.

In the light of Mr. John Galsworthy's refusal of a title, it may be interesting to know what Andrew Lang wrote in 1891. He says: "As to being made knights and baronets, who on earth wants to be called 'Sir' of men? Mayors, and brewers, and that kind of people, are welcome to these distinctions.....Praise we all like.....but titles we don't want, titles are exploded.....rather would I be commended by the little boys of the bookstalls." Is there not the ring of honest common sense in that? The heavens are now speaking as they have never spoken before that it shall go hard with shams, flim-flam, artificiality, and hypocrisy. The curtain covering the make-believe of centuries is now rent in twain. Reality, like a fierce March wind, is roaring about convention, custom, and everything which has grown diseased by the aid of lies. Soon we shall have plain speaking, for facts are above words, and not, as our slapdash journalists would have us believe, below them. The order in sequence is: (a) facts (or realities), (b) words, and (c) understanding or perception. Our modern inkfishes make words come first, and they, and all they stand for will go down like rotten trees before the gale, without a single tear being shed on their departure. They dealt in the corruption of Christianity and Capitalism, and their dissolution shall prove the noble truth of Euripides: "No lie ever grows old."

Topsy-Turvy.

Well, said the Thinker, when he saw the mass
Of Black-coats batt'ning on the corpse of Christ,
"Of old, Christ rode in triumph on an ass,
And now, behold, the asses ride on Christ."

Acid Drops.

The Devonport Coroner, at an inquest of a child at Devonport, said ninety per cent. of the children born during the past three months were males. He regarded this as an interesting fact, showing how Providence was making up for losses in the War. That is very thoughtful of "Providence"; but, as usual, not thoughtful enough. To be of the greatest use, these children should have been born full grown. As it is, it will be twenty years before they are of much use to the community—either as parents or as soldiers. They will certainly be of no use during the present War. And if "Providence" can deliberately bring people into the world, why the deuce can't it prevent people being taken out? The mystery of "Providence" gets greater. So does the stupidity of some officials.

That hero of a hundred tea-fights, the Bishop of London, who loves to strut around in khaki, has a serious rival in Bishop Russell Wakefield, who has been bidding for popularity by attending a boxing exhibition, and extolling "the noble art of self-defence." According to the press, Brother Wakefield was formerly "very useful with the gloves." It is enough to make the Bishop of London "weep like anything."

The Rev. T. W. Pym, a Church of England Army Chaplain, says "no average professing once-a-year communicant of the Church of England could hold his own for five minutes against any average mildly intelligent and even intellectual Agnostic."

Mr. Herbert Skimpole describes Mr. Bernard Shaw's personal appearance as "half Mephistopheles, half Christ." Perhaps this explains why Mr. Shaw announced his Atheism at a Shelley Society meeting, and years later he preached, with acceptance, at the City Temple.

Unconscious humour lurks in unexpected places. The Rev. E. Milner-White, an Army Chaplain, says that soldiers are ignorant of pious habits, and "we had usually to give notice that each communicant must not drain the whole chalice." And "communion port" used to be one shilling and threepence a bottle.

Speaking at a Health Conference, Lord Rhondda said that nearly 200,000 children's lives had been lost during the past four years, and there were now a million weak and defective children in the schools. What a commentary on the popular hymn, "There's a friend of little children, up above the bright, blue sky"!

The late Rev. J. J. Griffin, of Cheltenham, left estate to the value of £40,560. If the Bible is true, he has forfeited his chance of walking the golden streets of heaven.

The Rev. Clarence Ladron, an American Baptist minister, has been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for opposing militarism, and refusing the use of his church for recruiting meetings. When he emerges from prison, he should understand that the divine command: "Thou shalt not kill," is only to be understood in the Pickwickian sense.

The pansy was chosen as a souvenir for raising funds for the Young Women's Christian Association's "Women's Day." Doubtless the female Christians were unaware that the pansy is an emblem of Freethought.

Canon Cooper, the vicar of Filey, proposes to take a vote of his congregation on the question of the frequency of collections. If the folk in the pews respond in the negative the Canon will have to bombard the Throne of Grace.

Lady Edward Churchill has been fined £5 at Windsor for using a motor-car to attend church. Perhaps the lady will use the same methods of travelling as were used by the Founder of Christianity when he entered Jerusalem.

In a City shop window a notice is displayed: "If you are down in the mouth, cheep up. Jonah came out all right." Quite a "fishy" remark.

Lord Hugh Cecil, M.P. for Oxford University, declares that God is the "Architect of Hell." Presumably the deity is also the employer of the stokers. What an ironic comment on the culture of the oldest English University!

A religious objection was one of the grounds on which a divorce was refused to a Portsmouth Roman Catholic. The petitioner had refrained from taking proceedings on account of his religious opinions, and the judge said that in consequence of his religious objections his wife had gone on, and had become the mother of three illegitimate children. He must now take the consequence of his religious objections.

The Bishop of London declares that "we do not know what privation means." Unhappily, we are not all bachelors with £200 weekly income.

Among the recent wills and bequests is that of Mr. Adam, who left £99,563. This is not the gentleman who cultivated vegetables in the Garden of Eden.

A daily paper says that the Bishop of London recommends a book of devotion to his diocese every Lent. Presumably, the book is to be sold, not lent.

Bishop Welldon has been writing on Marriage and Divorce in a Sunday paper, and he says: "The State must legislate upon marriage not only for Christians, but for citizens who are not Christians." Some of the Bishop's colleagues might make a note of this remark.

Although the clergy are exempted from military service, they like to boast of their acquaintance with war. Speaking at the Royal Society of Arts, the Archbishop of Canterbury said he had worn a gas helmet when he visited Ypres. Let us hope he will not wear that helmet in the pulpit.

Pious folk often contradict one another, and in a recent issue of a daily paper a fine example was printed. Dr. Alexander Irvine described London as a "city of God," and the Bishop of Chelmsford was reported in another column as referring to the great East End, with its hard-working population of a million, drawing shameful wages.

Perhaps the acme of stupidity—to say nothing of brutality—in the War was reached on Good Friday, when the long-range German gun fired on Paris, hitting a church, and killing and wounding 165 persons. The uselessness of such a gun from the point of view of military sanity is plain. One cannot aim at any particular thing, it can only be trained on a large and fixed target. On behalf of even aeroplane raids it might be argued that the bombs are aimed at a military objective. But this gun aims at nothing but sheer terrorism of the civilian population. That it fell on a church is a mere accident. In Hyde Park 10,000 Christians were holding an intercession service for God's help and protection. What that is worth the wrecking of the Paris church shows. God does nothing. The malignity of German militarism is matched by the stupidity of our animated praying-machines.

Perhaps Mr. Bottomley, who believed that the power of God upheld the Virgin of Albert, or the Bishop of London, who believes that God guarded from destruction the figure of Jesus in churches in Flanders, will explain why God could not guard his poor worshippers in church on Good Friday. And perhaps those who believed—particularly Mr. Harold Begbie—that clouds of angels guarded our soldiers at Mons, will explain what has become of the angelic army. Why could it not operate to stem this German offensive? Has it been disbanded? Or was it formed for three years only, and not "for the duration"?

Quite naturally, the shelling of the church aroused much indignation in Paris. Speaking in the Chamber, M. Jeanbon, leader of the Left, said:—

> We unbelievers join our indignant protests against the crimes of the false believers who mingle blood with their prayers.

The two opening words were quite French in their directness and honesty. We fancy our own Socialists would have been more inclined to talk of the spirit of "true Christianity," or similar cant. Not because they believe more than M. Jeanbon, but because they are less outspoken and less direct in their thinking.

The number of women parsons is increasing constantly. Mrs. A. W. Constable, of Ovendene, Halifax, has been appointed pastor to a Congregational Church at Sheffield, this being the first appointment of its kind in Yorkshire.

Defenders of the Design Argument will note with pleasure that a lamb has been born at Welton, Lincolnshire, with five legs. This means an extra leg of mutton in these hard times.

Mr. H. Fielding Hall says: "The base idea of every religion, Christian or other, is that nature and humanity are evil, and that life is not worth living." Apparently, the base of religion is a base idea.

The Roman Catholic Church is attempting a "great push" on its own account, and has published in a number of newspapers, at full advertisement rates, a public manifesto by Cardinal Bourne. The cost of this advertisement must have run into hundreds of pounds. Does this desire for extended publicity imply that the Church Catholic is feeling the effects of the World-War?

An advertisement of a mammoth cinema film states that there are "some Dantesque scenes of souls in purgatory." Curiously, the film is entitled "Civilization."

A new book bears the arresting title, The Church in the Furnace, and is written by seventeen Army Chaplains. The volume suggests the topsy-turvy condition of present-day Christianity; for, usually, the Church consigns outsiders to "the furnace."

Piety to order is a fearful and a wonderful thing. A cinema poster, during Holy Week, announced that the programme would include "Nearer, My God to Thee, in five acts, and many other sparkling comedies."

"Palestine To-Day" is the title of an article in a daily paper. Superstitious Christians are more interested in Palestine of two thousand years ago.

"Londoners seem more afrard of Sundays than of air-raids," says Father Bernard Vaughan. Perhaps the Cockneys dislike the poison-gas of the pulpits.

How exclusive the clergy are! The Bishop of Chelmsford says that in East Ham, with a population of over 80,000, there are only six clergy. There may be only six parsons of the Government religion, but what of the Free Church ministers and fancy religionists?

Speaking at the Kingsway Hall, London, Dr. Selbie declared that "war is not a Christian thing." Perhaps he can explain why Christian ministers consecrate regimental colours and "christen" battleships.

A newspaper paragraph states that old bones are valuable and must be saved. Priests know the value of old bones better than rag and bone dealers, especially when the relics are advertised as belonging to any saint in the calendar.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 14, Liverpool; April 21, Goldthorpe; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—April 7, Liverpool; April 28, Nuneaton.

"Bonnie Dundee."—Have sent on your card.

R. N.—Pleased to hear from you. Thanks, we are keeping well, and all things considered, we need to.

C. Rudge.—You are mistaken. We have never advocated "peace at any price," nor have we ever asserted that all war is unjustifiable. We believe that all offensive wars are, but there may easily be occasions where a people are compelled to resist force by force. What we have asserted is the inconclusiveness of force. Force against force can only prove that one is greater than the other, it cannot prove anything else. But the right of defence against oppression seems to us undeniable.

Mr. A. J. Marriott thinks we have undervalued the power of the press in forming public opinion, seeing that so many papers are under one control, and so manage to refuse all opposition the right of a reply. We do not see that this conflicts with what we said, which was that the general tone and character of the public mind could not be placed to the credit of the press—certainly not wholly.

W. Walden.—We are greatly obliged to you for getting this paper into the Institute you name. That nearly always means new readers and a wider influence. Your experience with the "Padre" is interesting.

H. Rigby writes to thank Mr. Underwood for having introduced to him G. H. Lewes' book on the Spanish Drama. He has since received a copy of the work.

W. J.—That Swinburne's "form" is marred by his "matter" is wholly a question of personal idiosyncrasy. The treatment of dead Freethinkers by living Christians is scarcely on all fours with Swinburne's attitude towards "God" and "Christ." To him these were myths.

E. Schofield.—See "Sugar Plum."

C. F. J.—Received, and shall appear as early as possible.

E. B.—Thanks for useful batch of cuttings.

J. Higgins.—We daresay you are right in your judgment of the man and the case. But we do not know enough of the circumstances to make any comment.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Owing to the holidays and the Editor's absence from London, a number of letters, paragraphs, and one or two replies to the letter of "Ignotus" in our last issue are held over until next week.

Mr. Cohen's meetings at Pontycymmer last Sunday were a great success. They were the first Freethought meetings held in the place, but they will not be the last. The day was a wild one of rain and wind, but, notwithstanding the weather, many were present from the surrounding districts. The large hall was well filled in the afternoon, and crowded out in the evening. The lectures were heard with attention and appreciation. A Branch of the N. S. S. is in course of formation, as is also another at Maestig—a neighbouring place. South Wales is very much alive.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (April 7) at Liverpool, in the Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street, at 3 and 7 o'clock. There have been no special lectures at Liverpool lately, owing to difficulties in obtaining a suitable hall. The week following Mr. Cohen lectures twice in the same place.

Now that we are working with a restricted space, we must economize wherever possible. Will all N. S. S. Branch Secretaries please send their reports of meetings, etc., direct to Miss Vance as early as possible after the meetings? These can then be summarized and published whenever convenient or advisable.

The Swansea Branch of the N.S.S. has arranged for a lecture from the Rev. A. W. Wandle, of that town, on "Some Ideals of Christianity." The lecture will be delivered to-day (April 7) in the Docker's Hall at 3 o'clock.

The Daily Express reports an attack by "infidel dogs" in a church in the Hudson Bay country. It appears that the native Christians had built a church of whalebone, and packs of dogs were so starved, they ate the whole of the structure. Christians eat their God inside the church. Dogs from without eat the structure itself. But why "infidel dogs"? They may have been quite orthodox in their opinions.

Mr. Maskelyne and the Spirits.

The late Mr. J. N. Maskelyne was a thorn in the side of the Spiritualists. It was largely owing to his public exhibition of the frauds of the mediums that the physical phenomena of Spiritualism fell into disrepute, and has been abandoned, except in very private circles.

I have to thank Mr. E. Smedley, of Hucknall Torkard, for allowing me to see, and use, several interesting letters he received from Mr. Maskelyne dealing with this subject.

But before dealing with the letters, it will be as well to understand Mr. Maskelyne's mode of operation. Several others beside Mr. Maskelyne have exposed fraudulent mediums—notably Sir Ray Lankester and Sir Bryan Donkin, among others, in this country, and Truesdell and Dr. Hodgson in America. But Mr. Maskelyne was the only one who reduced the exposure of Spiritualism to a business.

Mr. Maskelyne's method was to attend the mediums' seances until he saw how the tricks were performed, and then practise them at home until he was perfect. Then he would advertise that he would perform the spiritualistic marvels in public at his conjuring performances, which he did so perfectly that the Spiritualists' papers declared that Mr. Maskelyne himself was a great medium and received help from the spirits, in spite of his declaration that everything was done by natural means.

There is no recorded case of Mr. Maskelyne's ever getting up at a Spiritual seance and exposing the fraud. He makes no claim to have done so in his book, Modern Spiritualism; and if he had done so, he could hardly have failed to mention it there. Nevertheless, it is often stated in the Press that Mr. Maskelyne exposed the Davenport Brothers. The facts are these.

The Davenport Brothers were two mediums who came to England from America in September, 1864. They created an extraordinary sensation by their performances in London. They had a wooden cabinet—not unlike a wardrobe—with a board at each end for a seat. The brothers seated themselves facing one another, and members of the audience were invited to come and bind them to the seat as securely as they knew how. After this had been done, a guitar, a violin, a tambourine, a trumpet, and two handbells were placed in the middle of the cabinet, apparently out of their reach. The doors of the cabinet were then closed; immediately the bolts were heard to rattle into their sockets, and shortly afterwards the musical instruments were heard in full blast. There is no doubt that the Davenport Brothers operated the bolts with the mouth; and thus making themselves secure from interruption, they freed themselves from the ropes before the audience had recovered from their surprise at hearing the bolts shot.

However, they came to grief at Liverpool, where two gentlemen appeared on the stage with the secret of a new knot known as the "Tom Fool" knot, which they proceeded to apply to the wrists of the brothers. The brothers protested, and ordered their manager to cut the ropes, which he did, inflicting at the same time a small cut, which the brothers declared was due to the tightness of the ropes. The performance broke up in disorder, and they afterwards had such a bad reception in other towns, where the news had preceded them, that they were glad to leave the country.

Mr. Maskelyne's account of his part in the Davenport exposure is, that when the Brothers were performing at Cheltenham, the accidental fall of a curtain during their performance enabled him to see enough to explain the mysteries performed in the cabinet. But he did not get up and expose them; he kept his own counsel, and some months later reproduced their performance in public at the Crystal Palace.

In the same way he helped in the exposure of the notorious "Dr." Slade. He visited Slade's performances until he discovered his method of slate-writing; and when Slade was caught in the act of trickery by Sir Ray Lankester, who prosecuted him for fraud, Mr. Maskelyne gave evidence in the witness-box, showing how the supposed spirit-writing was done. Mr. Maskelyne declared that it took him six weeks' hard work to perfect himself in Slade's tricks; but he considered the Davenport Brothers were the cleverest of all the mediums he had to do with.

Many of our readers will remember the law case of Colley v. Maskelyne, in April, 1907. Archdeacon Colley was a crank of the first water. At his church at Stockton, Warwickshire, he actually had himself clothed in a shroud and laid in his coffin for his parishioners to gaze upon!

In 1874, Colley became a great friend of the American medium, Monck—Dr. Monck, as he called himself. This Monck was a vicious scoundrel, and in 1876, while Colley—who had been appointed chaplain to H.M.S. Malabar—was out in India, Monck, who was giving spiritualistic demonstrations at two guineas a time, was caught in the act of fraud at Huddersfield, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment as a rogue and vagabond. Notwithstanding this crushing exposure, Colley, upon his return from India, resumed his intimacy with Monck, and in 1905 he published a pamphlet, entitled Phenomena: Bewildering, Psychological. Its publication led to correspondence in the Daily Telegraph, including a letter from Mr. Maskelyne on April 17, 1906. Archdeacon Colley replied in a private letter, challenging Mr. Maskelyne to reproduce Monck's phenomena, and offering to pay £1,000 if he succeeded. Mr. Maskelyne accepted the challenge. Colley attended the performance at St. George's Hall on October 9, 1906, and denied that Maskelyne had given a replica of Monck's performance.

> He also resented the statements contained in a pamphlet, called The History of a Thousand Pounds Challenge, which Maskelyne distributed to the audience. In this it was asserted that the Rev. Thomas Colley was not an Archdeacon, and had obtained a nomination for that position under Bishop Colenso by false pretences. This statement formed the basis of the alleged libel, and Maskelyne, for his part, counterclaimed £1,000 as the winner of the challenge.[1]

In the result the Archdeacon won small damages on the technical ground that he undoubtedly had the right to use the title of Archdeacon. Mr. Maskelyne was non-suited in his claim for the £1,000 on the ground that he had not completely reproduced Monck's phenomena, which consisted in the production of a materialized human form from his own body and then reabsorbing it. Mr. Maskelyne succeeded in producing the human form from his body but did not reabsorb it.

After the trial Mr. Maskelyne sent a notice to Colley to say that he was prepared at a future performance to reabsorb the form he produced, but Colley hastily sent a special messenger to withdraw the £1,000 challenge.

In The History of a Thousand Pounds Challenge Mr. Maskelyne gives particulars of the exposure and conviction of Monk for fraud. In a demonstration at Huddersfield an amateur conjurer, a Mr. H. B. Lodge, at the conclusion promised Monck £50 if, after allowing himself to be searched, a musical-box and other apparatus were not found upon him. Monck refused to be searched, and, rushing at Lodge, attempted to strike him in the face. He then bolted upstairs to his bedroom, having locked the door, he escaped with the aid of sheets from the window. The door was forced, says Mr. Maskelyne, and—> an examination of Monck's luggage revealed the fact that two large boxes and a full-sized travelling bath were filled with tricky apparatus, including spirit hands, spirit masks, a large quantity of gauzy material, a spirit bird, apparatus for floating tambourines, bells, spirit names, spirit lamps, and a number of incriminating documents. Mr. Lodge took possession of these articles with the intention of giving public exposures of Spiritualism. The police, however, took the matter out of his hands, and prosecuted Monck. The trial lasted three days, and Monck was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, the maximum penalty.

> What influenced the magistrates in inflicting so severe a punishment were the incriminating documents, which included disgustingly immoral letters from both married and single women, with whom Monck had intrigues under the cloak of Spiritualism and the convenience of dark seances. In this respect Monck was but a fair specimen of professional mediums, as a body, both men and women. I have had good reason to know that they are immoral and blasphemous in the extreme, yet spiritualistic cranks would have us believe that these wretches are specially endowed by the Almighty with the power to raise the spirits of the dead and create through their vile bodies living entities of our loved ones who have "crossed the bar." The idea is revolting.

And yet at the Colley trial the distinguished naturalist, Wallace, gave evidence of his whole-hearted belief in this vile scoundrel.

(To be concluded.) W. Mann.

The Sons of God.

The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair.—Gen. vi. 8.

According to the first book of the Bible, the earth fell into a very wicked condition in the days of the patriarchs. God made everything good, but the Devil turned everything bad; and in the end the Lord put the whole concern into liquidation. It was a case of universal bankruptcy. All that was saved out of the catastrophe was a consignment of eight human beings and an unknown number of elephants, crocodiles, horses, pigs, dogs, cats, and fleas.

Among other enormities of the antediluvian world was the fondness shown by the sons of God for the daughters of men. That fondness has continued ever since. The deluge itself could not wash out the amatory feelings with which the pious males regard those fair creatures who were once supposed to be the Devil's chief agents on earth. Even to this day it is a fact that courtship goes on with remarkable briskness in religious circles. Churches and chapels are places of harmless assignation, and how many matches are made in Sunday-schools, where Alfred and Angelina meet to teach the Scriptures and flirt. As for the clergy, who are peculiarly the sons of God, they are notorious for their partiality to the sex. They purr about the ladies like black tom-cats. Some of them are adepts in the art of rolling one eye heavenwards and letting the other languish on the fair faces of the daughters of men. It is also noticeable that the Protestant clericals marry often and early, and generally beget a numerous progeny; while the Catholic priest who, being strictly celibate, never adds to the population, "mashes" the ladies through the confessional, worming out all their secrets, and making them as pliable as wax in his holy hands. Too often the professional son of God is a chartered libertine, whose amours are carried on under a veil of sanctity. What else, indeed, could be expected when a lot of lusty young fellows, in the prime of life, forswear marriage, take vows of chastity, and undertake to stem the current of their natures by such feeble dams as prayers and hymns?

Who the original "sons of God" were is a moot point. God only knows, and he has not told us. But Jewish and Christian divines have advanced many theories. According to some the sons of God were the offspring of Seth, who was born in holy succession to righteous Abel, while the daughters of men were the offspring of wicked Cain. Among the Oriental Christians it is said that the children of Seth tried to regain Paradise by living in great austerity on Mount Hermon, but they soon tired of their laborious days and cheerless nights, and cast sheep's-eyes on the daughters of Cain, whose beauty was equal to their father's wickedness. Marriages followed, and the Devil triumphed again.

According to the Cabbalists, two angels, Aza and Azael, complained to God at the creation of man. God answered, "You, O angels, if you were in the lower world, you too would sin." They descended on earth, and directly they saw the ladies they forgot heaven. They married and exchanged the hallelujahs of the celestial chorus for the tender tones of loving women and the sweet prattle of little children. Having sinned, or, to use the vile language of religion, "polluted themselves with women," they became clothed with flesh. On trying to regain Paradise they failed, and were cast back on the mountains, where they continued to beget giants and devils.

"There were giants in the earth in those days," says Scripture. Of course there were. Every barbarous people has similar legends of primitive ages. The translators of our Revised Version are ashamed of these mythical personages as being too suggestive of Jack and the Beanstalk, so they have substituted Anakim for giants. In other words, they have shirked the duty of translators, and left the nonsense veiled under the original word.

The Mohammedans say that not only giants, but also Jins, were born of the sons of God, who married the daughters of men. The Jins soon had the world in their power. They ruled everywhere, and built colossal works, including the pyramids.

Of the giants the most remarkable was Og. He was taller than the last Yankee story, for at the Deluge he stopped the windows of heaven with his hands, or the water would have risen over his head. The Talmud says that he saved himself by swimming close to the ark in company with the rhinoceros. The water there happened to be cold, while all the rest was boiling hot; and thus Og was saved while all the other giants perished. According to another story, Og climbed on the roof of the ark, and when Noah tried to dislodge him, he swore that he would become the patriarch's slave. Noah at once clinched the bargain, and food was passed through a hole for the giant every day.

When we look into them we find the myths of the Bible wonderfully like the myths of other systems. The Giants are similar to the Titans, and the union of divine males with human females is similar to the amours of Jupiter, Apollo, Neptune and Mars with the women of old. In this matter there is nothing new under the sun. Every fresh myth is only the recasting of an ancient fable, born of ignorance and imagination.

Let it finally be noted that this old Genesaic story of the angelic husbands of earthly women gives us a poor idea of the felicity of heaven. In that unknown region, as Jesus Christ informed his disciples, there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage; that is, no males, no females, no courting, no loving, no children, and no home. Men cease to be men and women cease to be women. Every body is of the neuter gender. Or else all the angels are gentlemen, without a lady amongst them. Perhaps the latter view is preferable, as it harmonizes with the Bible, in which the angels are always he's. In that case heaven would be, to say the least, rather a dull place. No whispering in the moonlight, no clasped hands under the throbbing stars. Not even a kiss under the mistletoe. Oh, what must it be to be there! No wonder the sons of God wandered from their cheerless Paradise, visited this lower world, and saw the daughters of men that they were fair.

(The late) G. W. Foote.

The Tenement and the Towers.

A Human Document.

The curtain of night was slowly withdrawn from grey sea and dun wintry landscape. The tall grey tenement stood out with prison-like grimness, silent, almost sinister in the cloud-filtered light of smiling morn. No one was about. The beauty of the morning and the Sabbath calm were, as yet, unprofaned. But by way of contrast with the serene exterior, within was noise and confusion enough. The Tenement children were awake and in nondescript deshabille rolling, fighting, shouting on the floor of the kitchen bedroom. Mater, with her attention distracted between a crying baby and a tardy fire, had her share of the morning duties. Robbed of a precious hour of Sunday sleep by his band of wakeful brigands, a careworn pater somewhat ruefully surveys the scene, and strives in vain to quieten his clamorous brood. He is merely answered by brave merry shouts of "Daddy" this and "Daddy" that. Running his fingers through his unkempt locks, Daddy responds feebly, and all the while absurdly his mind keeps reverting to Mrs. Hemans's "Stately homes of England," "Cottage homes," etc., and wonders if this sweet-voiced lady ever sewed on a button or dressed the kids in the morning. In a happier, more heroic mood, he would have hummed over that exquisite old plantation melody—

> The young folks roll on the little cabin floor,
> All merry all happy and bright;
> By-m-by hard times comes a knockin' at the door,
> My old Kentucky home good-night.

The mother was excusably tart after a week of constant toil and worry, and the children came in for many a sharp rebuke, which they heeded as much as the idle wind. Little garments and other debris of domestic life lay about in confusion.

Feebly, yet palpably, impelled by a conscience worn somewhat thin in the sordid struggle for existence, Pater would fain have risen and helped to clothe his boys, but shrank from the formidable task of disentanglement and due apportionment of the "duds." This was left to the miracle-worker. Only the woman's patient and practised hand might assort the miscellaneous mysteries and clothe the children in contentment's happy rays! It was thus, at any rate, the feeble Pater quieted his conscience. And yet the poor chap was not without some wit and industry. He had great theories of household management—in his bachelor days! So has everybody—in his bachelor days!

This morning he wondered how those theories had fallen through.....Other things, too, were more sternly troubling what was left of a brilliant intellect—rent and taxes were overdue, and smaller expenses loomed gigantically over a meagre and depleted exchequer. The gamins on the floor held his wistful eye and wrung his heart, concentrating in their innocent irresponsible presence all the pathos and love of the human heart. How was the few loaves and fishes of his weekly earning to be multiplied in this non-miraculous age? He would go forth and consider the matter yet again. Sweet was the breath of morn as he emerged from the grey block of many dwellers. An Englishman's house is his castle, but Brown, Jones, and Robinson share the noble pile. Past many similar blocks, he took his way, with hives as busy as his own. It is largely an "artificial" man that finds fullness of life in towns and cities. The natural man craves for the fields and freedom. As driven sheep, for instance, gathered from their native hills, from the great peace of the wilderness, to endure long road marches will climb instinctively each little hillock by the wayside and nibble at the sweet herbage as they are allowed by shepherd Destiny and his dog, so Pater, dumbly driven as the silly sheep, but, now and then, would fain escape to the wilderness. He was discontented, ashamed of his own and the stupidity or indifference of his class, and yet in his scarred breast was noblest yearning for higher things, and perhaps infinite capacity for virtue and happiness. He was sad at times. Sometimes in despair. Nothing so surely restores lost proportion as solitary converse with nature herself—the just and gentle, serious and sublime, smiling, whispering, frowning fearful, muttering thundering, all-commanding mother of us all; she who must be obeyed; the constant, the impartial, the inexorable, the non-arbitrary, but the best-beloved. In such filial, faithful communion the healthy passions, long quiescent, reassert their stimulus, and the soothed mind perceives its need and shapes its purposes.

As a boy, Pater remembered he was happy and eager, with wide blue, steady eyes, wistful, apprehensive, humane, joyous as kittens and puppies are, dwelling in a large optimism as in the azure atmosphere; singing, shouting in the woods; blythe as the birds, graceful as the bending spray, lithe and strong as sapling oak; but the bludgeonings of chance and fate, the long immurement in a brick-and-mortar world (albeit a chosen world), the long, unvarying hours of toil, and perhaps that gravitation we call sin, had made him timid in the wilds, and almost afraid to enter the wood, where the "pampered menials" of some little lord of earth might drive him from its grateful shade. But at length, saying "They can't hang me," he leapt the wall, and found himself—at home. Glorious! Soft, dry footing in the bleached grass and rustling leaf; long grass stems, untrampled and erect, glistening in the morning light, and gleaming afar down every glade like glittering ranks of fairy hosts welcoming back the long-lost heir to his domain. There is a pleasure in the pathless woods; there is an inspiration; the eye sees visions and the soul has a revelation. Pater saw the truth with great suddenness and unequivocal certainty. He saw what quicker-sighted men had seen before him—that there were but two kinds of people in the world, the Haves and the Have-nots; that the latter were not the blessed.....

Beyond the wood was a noble expanse of lawn surrounding the massive towers of a mansion, sequestered and serene. Pater's well-read mind and vivid imagination could picture the interior, and appreciate the comfort and glory of "high life." He was not envious. He merely knew for the first time the vast social gulf that separates even the moderately rich from the average poor—as far away as Paris is. Yes, the Towers are distant from the Tenement as Heaven is from both. He knew, also, with the utmost certainty—Pater was terribly definite at times—that the denizens of the Towers were not primarily superior to the dwellers in the Tenement, but only that "Fortune in men had some small difference made." Out of a common heredity, environment works the miracle; and these people become godlike and feel like gods, and, indeed, must look down upon the aproned cobbler and grimed collier as very inferior persons indeed; which for the time, as articles of vertu, they certainly are.

Seeing and thinking these things, Pater felt he was standing on the boundary line between two worlds: on this hand the world of clockwork, hand-to-mouth wage-slavery, with its stupefying, stultifying round; on the other the world of the free-born, the upright, the patrician souls to whom life is is life, and not mere vegetation—a thing of beauty and a joy for ever; noble, deep-breathed beings. Sonorous voice of man; silvern, sweetly modulated tones of woman; all the glorious music and texture of the life refined—that alone constitute man's pre-eminence over beast, and justify Hamlet's apostrophe.

The very dogs in such environment are separated from the curs of the canine world by a chasm as wide as that dividing the human spheres.....Pater starts suddenly. There is a rustling in the brown leaves, a sniffing and pattering in the silent wood. Soon two pairs of bright doggie eyes are gazing at him through the herbage—smiling, careless, magnanimous, friendly eyes—and two tails wag behind, almost in apology. Pater, on his part, uneasy in the company of nobility, would fain have apologized for his intrusion. And yet the poor gentle man might have met all mankind on footings of equality; for had he not sounded all the chords of life—seen all, heard all, felt all, owned all? Owned? you say; where, then, was his estate? Even yours, my lord; it is the Estate of Man. And so Pater said, "God dog! fine fellow! Ha, ha, old chap!" And the dogs understood him, every word, wagged their tails, and trotted off again, and he heard them pattering in the distant leaves.....Pater rose and reclimbed the wall, and, turning homeward, wondered rather sadly what was life worth to him. On the Tenement stairs joy and warmth filled his heart again. Aloft a voice cried "Daddy!" and in a moment he had folded in his arms his little Pater's son!

Le Miserable.

Taste.

Refinement and restraint of feeling are nowhere and at no time insisted on as essentials in the Christian scheme of social ethics. On the contrary, they are frequently condemned, and people are warned that æsthetic allurements are a danger to their immortal souls. These facts should be brought before bawling advocates of the Christian Faith who insolently (and falsely) claim that Christianity has protected learning and advanced knowledge.

We are justified in our assertion that coarseness of taste is compatible with the profoundest piety, and with the most strenuous Christian activity can be proved from broad facts. The Salvation Army has within recent years received well-advertised recognition from the most influential quarters. One of the most run-after Christian orators of to-day is Billy Sunday, an ex-pugilist. Even clergymen who would not like to be thought vulgar, but who are keenly desirous of meeting all classes of men on their own level, exclaim in the heat of their enthusiasm that Christianity is the greatest gamble in the world! Everything is done on the part of those out "to win souls" to make admission to the Christian fold easy and attractive. Churches and chapels have week-night "tea services" in various centres for sailors and soldiers, and pious touts may be observed buttonholing passing Service men, and "compelling them to come in." The text upon which up-to-date Christian drummers exhaust most of their energies is this: "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

We venture to say that a person's tastes is, in 999 cases out of 1,000, a reliable index to his moral standard. We do not associate Billingsgate with thought at a high elevation. Do not let us be misunderstood. We are not stigmatizing even gross vulgarity, which prevails among certain ignorant sections of the people (rich and poor), as a crime. Unconscious vulgarity is as common, perhaps, as unconscious humour. The ignorant, vulgar man is not, as a rule, class-conscious—or self-conscious, if it comes to that. He is what he is by reason of his parentage, surroundings, associates, and want of upbringing. Such a man is not to be sneered at, blamed, or condemned for his vulgarity. It is not vulgarity—to him. But he is to be classified—and anyone who knows better is not doing him or his kind a service by going to the other extreme of praising, encouraging, and even copying, his coarse vulgarisms. And we do claim that we are justified in stigmatizing the "educated" Christians who adopt such methods as being guilty of the most anti-social conduct. We have heard of Parliamentary candidates, sprigs of the aristocracy, going round amongst labourers, garbed like themselves, and smoking short clay pipes. And we have heard of intelligent labourers who were capable of being insulted by such a proceeding. But they did not make their resentment vocal. They had enough sense and restraint to understand that silent contempt was the best policy.

Lack of taste is every day exhibited in the impudent noisiness of the religious tout and cadger. They are, in this War, having the time of their lives; and the orthodox press gives plenty of laudatory notices. What strikes one as the leading feature of such people (after their noses) is their hopeless incapacity to discriminate. But that is always what distinguishes coarse and vulgar minds. The headlong and violent blatancy of their processes causes blurring; the finer sensibilities and perceptions of the brain are atrophied, and differentiation and distinction become impossible. Even approximately accurate classification is beyond them wholly.

Lack of taste is always to be found combined with lack of true knowledge. The mental activities of the many are directed not to the acquisition of true knowledge and of the equipment or desire to beautify life, but to the development of that animal cunning necessary to self-preservation, self-protection, and self-aggrandisement as a weapon to be used against a world of potential competitors, each of which is busy acquiring the same "education" for himself. To such an anarchy has the teachings of Christianity reduced us! The Victorians had their faults. Some of them treated the poor like beasts, and, naturally, the poor multiplied as beasts. But are some of our modern Georgians any better? And are they helping matters by encouraging the idea that a bestial state of life is to be prized?

The stock-in-trade of the pre-War political and religious bluffer—"honey, money, soap, and butter"—is, happily, in the minds of many in all ranks of society coming to be despised. The assertiveness of the individual mind is the herald of the doom of supernaturalism. The independence of the individual mind is that doom accomplished, and the collapse of all the organized hypocrisies of hundreds of years. But progress from intellectual bondage to intellectual freedom should never be represented—as religious touts represent justification by faith to be—as the work of a moment, painless and easy. Things worth keeping are never found without assiduous effort and toil: mental freedom is one of them.

(Y gwir yn erbyn y byd.—The truth against the world).

Thy spirit flamed in bygone years. O land
Of wind-swept mountain-crag and headlong flood!
For thee great leaders shed their patriot blood,
Nor deemed it dear the price they paid. The hand
Of tyrant hatred crushed thy just demand
For peaceful cult of muse in leisure's hour,
Frowned on thy zeal for wisdom's ancient dower.
Fast linked with feudal might, the priestly band,
Suspicious, saw thine aspiration's goal,
Dazzled thine eyes with sight of mystic wine,
With many a fairy tale of Palestine
Thy simple heart beguiled; shall mitre, stole,
Or bigot's frown put out the light divine?
Flame forth once more: win freedom for thy soul.

Views and Opinions.

Religion and Nonsense.

We said last week that nothing seemed strong enough to stop the clergy talking nonsense. And the statement applies with equal force to religious writers as a whole. Presumably it is the fault of the subject. One cannot touch pitch and remain undefiled, and one cannot preach on a nonsensical subject and talk sense. When Charles II. was asked how he could account for the popularity of a certain shallow-minded preacher, he replied that "His nonsense suited their nonsense," and the reply serves as an explanation of much that occurs to-day. Anyway, we had hardly got rid of last week's notes before we came across another illustration of what we had said, this time from the Times, which provides its readers with a weekly religious article from an anonymous correspondent. The article is entitled "The Easter Assurance. An Answer to a Moral Demand." Where the moral demand exists it is impossible to say. It is as imaginary as the assurance is doubtful. Those who find comfort in the writer's "assurance" will quite justify Charles's explanation—His nonsense suits their nonsense.

A Satire and an Absurdity.

What is the "Easter assurance?" What is "the moral demand" to which an answer is given? The Easter message is, of course, the resurrection. "Christ has risen"! And that follows upon the Christmas message of Peace on earth, good will to men! The first part of the message is a satire, the second is an insult to civilized reason. Think of "Peace on earth" when the nations who accept and profess the message are engaged in more ruthless slaughter than the world has yet seen, when the deaths of only a few hundred men are summed up in the laconic message "All was quiet at the Front yesterday"! When has there been peace on earth during the whole period of Christian history? Christian peace is like Christian veracity: it is something peculiar to itself. There is nothing like it in the world. And it is well for the world that there is not. It would be better still for the world if neither were so general. And the satire is equalled by the insult. A resurrection from the dead is beyond human belief, because it is outside the power of human conception. No one can believe it to be true, one can only say one believes it. The savage credits it because he is ignorant of the processes of life and of the nature of death. The civilized man cannot because his knowledge of life and death—imperfect though that knowledge may be—excludes real belief. A mere formula is made to usurp the place of reasoned conviction. The modern Christian does really try hard to remain a savage, but he is not altogether independent of his environment. The modern man will out, and the faith of the savage is apt to wear thin when it runs up against the insistent pressure of civilized life.

A Useless Example.

The Times writer is concerned with the many thousands of young men who have died and are dying during the War. To them and to us, he says, "faith in the resurrection assures us that those who have passed out of our sight have lost nothing that made their life true and beautiful." How so? Faith in the resurrection of Jesus can prove nothing so far as we are concerned. If Christ was God how can what happened to him be any indication of what will happen to us? On the Christian hypothesis he belonged to an altogether different order from that to which we belong. His resurrection may prove that Gods will not remain in the grave, it has no bearing upon what will happen to man. And he did many things that are beyond our power. To commence with, he got himself born without an earthly father. How many of us can accomplish that? He fed thousands with a few loaves and fishes, and had more food left at the end of the meal than he had at the beginning. Not even the Government Food Controller can do that. He walked on the waves, stilled the tempest with a word, cast devils out of men and women, converted water into wine. How many of us can do these things? And if we cannot imitate him in these things, why should we be able to imitate him in rising from the dead? His end matched his beginning. Both are equally reasonable; and the man who begins by crediting the one has naturally, no difficulty in accepting the other. If he was a God his example is useless to us. If he was a man his birth, life, and resurrection are, in the light of reason, a tissue of fantastic absurdities.

Morality and a Future Life.

The Christian doctrine of a future life, we are told, answers the moral demand that good shall prevail. It does nothing of the kind. The moral demand is that right shall prevail, not somewhere else, but here. And a postponement is not an answer. When a wrong is done, the moral demand is not satisfied because someone is punished for it. The moral demand is that it shall not occur at all. Man's faith in God is strained because the wrong occurs; it is not strengthened by being told that in some place God has straightened it all out again. That is merely stupefying the moral sense with the narcotic of faith. And reason is apt to reflect that, if there be a God, he made this world as well as the next. It would surely have been as easy to him to so arrange this world that the reasonable demands of the moral sense should be satisfied. The plea of another world in which God has made things right, is an admission that in this world he has made them all wrong. It is bringing God under the jurisdiction of a First Offenders Act. God is given another chance to redeem his character—somewhere else. He has admittedly forfeited it here; he will reform, and vindicate it there. Man is very forgiving to his gods. He excuses their blunders and palliates their iniquities. He hopes that God will behave himself better in the next world. He knows he has conducted himself but poorly in this. A future life in which the thousand-and-one injuries of this life are to be removed is the hypothesis of a knave that will satisfy only the credulity of a fool. * * *

Digitized by Google

Can the Future Atone?

The future cannot undo the past. An injustice once done, remains an injustice for ever. Think of the folly, the criminal folly, of telling the people of Belgium, or Siberia, or Poland, who have seen their homes ruined, their sons and brothers and fathers killed, their daughters, sisters, and mothers outraged, that justice will be done in the next world! Revenge—natural, inevitable revenge—may be gratified; but will that restore the life of the one or the honour of the other? How can the next world make good the loss of the many thousands of young lives that might have been spent in labour to make the world better worth living in? It is this world that mourns their loss; it is this world that is the poorer for their going. Poorer it might have been had they lacked the courage to face the prospect of departure; but the loss remains a loss none the less. Our grief over their death bears witness to the loss we have sustained, and it gives the lie to the pulpit theorizing of these pious traffickers in human sorrow. It is bad enough that our moral sense should be outraged by the slaughter of the world's youth, but surely there is no need to outrage our reason by this attempted justification of their death. * * *

Away with Cant.

Death sits crowned in thousands of homes to-day, and will sit enthroned in many more with the passing of each day's sun. The fact is before us, gross and palpable, and we all face it with what resolution we may. But it is surely unnecessary to pretend that this world-disaster is a blessing in disguise, and that childish faith in a fantastic future life compensates for the loss the world is experiencing. It is a lie to say that those who have died "have lost nothing that made their life true and beautiful," even though it may be true they would have lived a poorer life had they lacked the courage to lose it. They have lost all. If there is a gain, it lies with [those who remain. The profit from the dead lies with the living; but it need not be the base gain of these profiteers of the pulpit. Our young men have faced death with their heads up and their eyes open, and we only show ourselves worthy of their sacrifice when we clear our minds of cant and face their loss with something of the same courage with which they faced their end.

Chapman Cohen.

The God of the Bible is an old Jew. A maniac, and even a monomaniac.....A furious sort of fool who passes his time in grumbling, threatening, howling like an angry wolf, and spending his time in a delirium of rage shut up in his cloud. He is a fool who thinks himself Judge, Public Accuser, and Executioner all in one. We are amazed at the tenacity of his hatred, which fills the Bible with bloodthirsty murmurings. —Romain Rolland, "Jean Christophe."

The Christ-Myth.

II.

(Concluded from p. 207.)

Some theologians make a distinction between Jesus and Christ. A few maintain that Jesus became the Christ as an historical character, and generally speak of him as Jesus Christ, whilst others regard the Gospel Jesus as a Divinely endowed human being, and Christ as a purely theological creation. Such thinkers as Dr. Anderson, of Dundee, however, deny the historicity of both the Gospel Jesus and Christ, and yet worship the latter as the completest manifestation of God. We are in full agreement with Dr. Anderson as to the unhistoricity of both Jesus and Christ, but differ from him absolutely in his estimate of Christ as a veritable revelation of any superhuman being, our contention being that no such personality has ever existed, and, consequently, that no revelation of him is conceivably possible. And yet there are divines not a few who still believe that Jesus and Christ are two names of one historical character, who lived on earth in the capacity of the God-man. They assume an air of superiority, and refer contemptuously to such Biblical critics as Strauss and Bauer, declaring that they have outlawed themselves "in the sight of all sober judges. What did Bauer, for example, say about the Four Gospels? Simply that they contain not so much history, serving as a basis for dogmas, as dogmas or abstract conceptions turned into history." Bauer says:—

> We have shown that all that which constitutes the historical Christ, what is said of him and what we know of him, belongs to the world of conception, and indeed of Christian conception, and consequently has nothing to do with a man belonging to the real world.

Surely that is a sane and safe position to occupy, against which no valid arguments can be advanced. Henry C. Sheldon, an American, has published A Critical History of Unbelief in the Nineteenth Century, which, though weakly critical, is in no true sense a history. With the pseudo-historical aspect of it we are not now directly concerned; but as a criticism of the anti-Christian theories of last century it is a highly amusing failure. Strauss is pronounced an unreliable critic of the Gospel Jesus, because in his later years he plunged "into the abyss of materialism and negation." That fatal plunge, the author admits, did not "immediately discredit" his critical work; "yet this dismal transition cannot be wholly put out of sight in the estimate which is to be formed of the competency of Strauss to deal successfully with the deeper problems which belong to the history and philosophy of religion." It is beyond all doubt that such an illogical and immoral insinuation puts Mr. Sheldon entirely out of court as an honest and competent defender of the Christian faith. Were such a canon of criticism to be generally accepted all unbelievers in the inspiration of the Bible and the truth of the Gospel narrative would be excluded from the list of "sober judges"; and this is the kind of exclusion in which Mr. Sheldon unblushingly indulges throughout his book, thereby disqualifying profound scholars like Mr. John M. Robertson and Professors Gilbert Murray and Bury for a seat among "sober judges." Merely to state such a pretension is to condemn it. And yet all Mr. Sheldon's attempts to refute the arguments of unbelieving critics are laughably futile. Assuming the existence of the Heavenly Father and the absolute perfection of the character of Jesus he says:—

> To take Jesus for the ideal means, in short, little else than to accept the historical demonstration. Men simply find it impossible out of all the resources furnished by the annals of the past to paint in the abstract an ideal which can take precedence of that which stands forth in concrete form in the Gospel story. No theory about the necessary imperfection of the individual can be permitted to contradict the well-attested fact that in Jesus Christ the real and the ideal found their identity.

Now, as a matter of fact, we do not admit the ideal perfection or sinlessness of the Gospel Jesus. Brief as the alleged record is, it presents him as vain, conceited, claiming equality and even oneness with God. No sane believer in a Supreme Being would have spoken about himself as he almost invariably did. To believe in him was man's chief duty and privilege, while not to believe in him was to be damned for ever. Obedience to his commands was the sole condition of continued acceptance with Heaven. If a person ever lived who made such wild claims for himself, the only sensible inference we can draw is that he was a more or less mad visionary. Then, on the practical side of his character, he was anything but ideal. He even disowned his mother and brethren, who regarded him as beside himself. His one ambition was to be followed as he wandered up and down the country, passionately urging people to leave everything and go after him. "Suffer me to go and bury my father first," one pleaded; but Jesus angrily answered, "No; let the dead bury their dead, but come thou and follow me." With all these strange characteristics in his mind, Strauss spoke of Jesus as a problem, an enigma; but Mr. Sheldon asks, "Why should one who has so powerfully affected the course of history be accounted a perfectly unsolved problem? Is not such a conclusion a virtual judgment on the criticism of Strauss?" For once we are forced to take Mr. Sheldon's side. Jesus is not an unsolved problem, but a burst bubble; not an unread riddle, but a spent illusion. That he has powerfully affected the course of history cannot be disputed; but it is equally certain that he has affected it largely to its detriment. When he came to power under Constantine, the clock of progress not only stopped, but was turned backwards several long hours. His history has been one of turmoil, cruelty, and war. The Church herself has been a well-nigh continuous battle-field, party rising up against party, and faction crushing faction, love being conspicuous by its absence. Mr. Sheldon adds that "a valid criticism surely ought to make of Jesus something better than a mere enigma"; but is a sheer myth of any more value than an unsolved problem? Christ is a myth, and in reality has never done anything, either good or evil; but the Church has wrought mightily in his name, and naturally held him responsible for all. She has opposed social reforms and justified slavery in his name; she has tortured, burnt, and beheaded whom she called heretics to the glory of his name; and she has engaged in many bloody wars in order that his so-called kingdom might come. But at last both the myth behind the Church and the Church herself are being increasingly seen in their true light, and are slowly disappearing. To day's cry is for realities, not dreams; for the light of reason, not the vagaries of faith; for the kingdom of man, here and now, not the kingdom of God in a world to come.

CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE.

Ah! how true it is that Christianity has not, as you say, Christianized the world! There is something curious in the spectacle of the embarrassment of every sect of Christians in accounting for this fact. I know no subject on which there is more miserable floundering among incompatible views and untenable assertions.—Harriet Martineau.

"The Saint Paul of Darwinism."

The distance, and as it were the space around man, grows with the strength of his intellectual vision and insight; his world becomes profounder; new stars, new enigmas, and notions are ever coming into view.—Nietzsche.

Grant Allen deserved well of his generation, for his finest and most suggestive work was that of a popularizer of science. He fell early under the domination of the master minds of Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer, and he never tired of bringing their teaching before popular readers. He was not a specialist, but he had a complete acquaintance with science, and he had a splendid and attractive gift of interpretation. "The Saint Paul of Darwinism," someone dubbed him, and certainly his power of popularizing the master's teaching was very remarkable.

Whatever Grant Allen wrote was always pointed and illuminative. This was, in part, due to the variety of his early experiences. Before he was twenty-five he knew Canada, England, and the West Indies. He was educated in America, in Dieppe, in Birmingham, and at Oxford. He also had some experience in the Indian Statistical Department. And all this varied experience of men and affairs was turned to account in his writings. His papers on biology, philology, the evolution of species, and kindred subjects, were bright and readable, even at times amusing. As a rule, when serious scientists try to be humorous, the result is "too deep for tears." This racy gift of Grant Allen's made him suspect in some scientific circles. Serious pedants professed to scorn his scientific journalism. They despised the star-gossip of Richard Proctor on the same grounds, preferring, presumably, the scholastic and unbearable simplicity of the lamented Dionysius Lardner, whose chaste volumes used to cumber booksellers' fourpenny boxes, alongside such light reading as Zimmermann On Solitude and Hervey's Meditations Among the Tombs. Whether the scientists felt that, having gained their knowledge by years of work, it was prodigality to give it away so easily, or whether the old clerical spirit had found a new lodgment in scholastic circles, may be an open question. Nothing appeared to irritate some of the authors of ponderous monographs so much as having their life-work made intelligible to the masses. But Grant Allen hoisted the engineers with their own gunpowder. He opened up a new universe to tens of thousands, with a charm all its own.

Who that came fresh to the study of science could ever say an ungrateful word of the author of Carving a Cocoanut, The Æsthetic Analysis of an Egyptian Obelisk, The Romance of a Wayside Weed, The Daisy's Pedigree, and scores of other delightful and informative papers? He awoke a new interest, and, unconsciously, led the unsuspecting reader through a course of Darwin, Spencer, Tyler, and many another disregarded author. In entrancing chapters, Grant Allen led the large reading public to understand the mysteries that, expressed in the esoteric terminology of scientific language, else had remained comparatively unknown. Now, thanks to Grant Allen, the ordinary reader has a clear idea of the labours of the great thinkers of our time, and, it may be, see more clearly the tendency of those movements than those who, with technical knowledge, dissect the old faiths whilst still worshipping the Goddess Grundy.

Grant Allen was more than an amateur, but he carried his weight of learning gracefully. Though prejudiced against the classics, he produced a translation, with an anthropological introduction of Catullus's most famous poem. From the lofty region of thought and scholarship it is a sharp curve to turn to Grant Allen the novelist. In the days of threadbare plots, when all the old devices that were as embroidery to well-spun stories, were worn to skeletons of construction, it was a pleasure to find Stevenson and Rider Haggard rivalled in their romances by facts from the laboratory, and problems from the researches of philosophers. Towards the end of his career Allen wrote certain "Hill-top" novels, penned purely for didactic purposes. The Woman Who Did and The British Barbarians did not set the Thames afire, but, owing to clerical influence, they caused a drop in the sale of Allen's other novels. The Irish booksellers, as was no doubt natural in a priest-ridden country, refused to sell these books, and Allen found, to his cost, that propagating advanced opinions was not "roses all the way."

Theology has always met strange bed-fellows, and one is not surprised to find the versatile Grant Allen among the theologians. He was rightly proud of being one of the first to apply seriously evolutionary theories to the belief in deity. In his preface to his masterpiece, The Evolution of the Idea of God, he said:—

> It contains, I believe, the first extended effort that has yet been made to trace the genesis of the belief in God from its earliest origin in the mind of primitive man up to its fullest development in advanced and etherealized Christian theology.

It was an honest attempt to explain a big matter, and Allen had his reward. The book made a deep impression, and Herbert Spencer wrote: "I congratulate you on its achievement. I had no idea you had been devoting such an immensity of labour and research to the subject. The bringing together of the evidence in a coherent form, and showing its bearing on the current creed, can scarcely fail to have a great effect." The tribute was deserved. In Allen's fine book the whole theistic question is discussed in a nutshell. He shows quite clearly that the Christian idea of deity is but a residuum. The attenuated deity is what is left when the other gods of the Pantheon are broken to pieces and ground to powder; simply the abstract form and general designation. A bubble is blown with real soapsuds, but it grows ever thinner and more transparent, and is most beautiful when it is at the point of breaking. The beauty does not save it, it breaks and disappears.

Allen met with great opposition on account of his book. Publishers, who were simply tradesmen, feared to offend their customers, and would not allow him to give full expression to his ideas. Science, pure and simple, did not pay; and novel-writing, to which he was compelled to turn, had to be carried on within absurd and galling restrictions. The publishers wanted "smooth tales, generally of love." The last kind of work in which he exercised his versatile pen was art criticism and guide-book writing. His papers on Italian art are as valuable as they are interesting, and in his series of Historic Cities he showed us what a guide-book should be.

No religious ceremony was permitted at his funeral. It would have been an outrage on his life and teaching if any theological invocations had been intoned over his dead body. His life was a battle against creeds and conventions; he lived free of such bonds and he died free of them. "The rest is silence."

Below all the strife of opponents the quiet growth of appreciation, silent but real, gathers strength. For in the heart of the democracy his lessons have sunk deep, and if professors frown and undergraduates sneer, it is something to have helped the people to grasp the teachings of science. Allen called himself a humble disciple of Darwin and Spencer, but, in popularizing the work of these masters, he made an enviable reputation, and what writer desires more?

The Mechanism of Man.

Physiology, although a quite modern study, has made enormous progress, and the functions of the body, both in health and disease, are now extensively understood. But much remains to be accomplished before this far-reaching department of biology can more than approximate to exactitude. Anatomy preceded physiology in order of historical development, and when we recall the obstinate and vindictive antagonism of the Church towards the pioneers of anatomical inquiry, we cease to wonder that our knowledge of the workings of the animal-organism remains incomplete. But the advances of the science of physiology are now much greater than at any earlier time. Improved methods of investigation are to-day employed in all the leading medical and biochemical colleges in the civilized world. From Tokio and Calcutta to Paris, London, and Vienna; from Cambridge and Edinburgh to the up-to-date laboratories of America, legions of workers are engaged in mastering the problems presented by the marvellous organic substances of Nature.

Many years ago Huxley discerned in protoplasm the physical basis of life. The life and growth of the human organism, in common with the life and growth of all other animals, depends upon the activity of the living material termed protoplasm. And this is equally true of the entire vegetable kingdom. Protoplasm is contained in minute bodies called cells, and one of the single-celled creatures, the tiny amœba, is a fair example of the myriads of cell-units which build up the bodies of multicellular animals such as fish, birds, reptiles, and mammals. A thousand amœbæ arranged in a row would barely measure an inch. Yet each amœba is a complete animal, although, when viewed under the microscope, it seems a mere jelly speck. Still, this primitive creature will protrude any part of its surface so as to secure a fragment of food, or, if the nutrient particle is in contact with the amœba, the unicellular animal closes round the material and absorbs it. Any part of the amœba's body functions as a mouth. It has no organs of any kind, and breathes from all areas of its body surface. Having grown to a given size, it reproduces itself by splitting into two parts, and this process of reproductive division constantly proceeds.

Countless millions of cells similar to those that form amœbæ enter into the architecture of the higher animal body. The human skin, nerves, blood, bone—indeed, all our organs—are constructed by cells. Like the simple amœba, the human body-cells are perpetually changing with the activities of life. Moreover, in the blood-stream of man and the lower animals reside vast colonies of colourless cells—the phagocytes—whose function appears to be that of warriors, for they promptly attack and devour any detrimental substances which invade the circulatory system. The resemblance of these white phagocytes to the amœba is striking, although, unlike the amœba, they are confined to the higher animal blood. Our body-cells multiply by means of division, and thus growth takes place, and injuries to the organism are repaired. The somatic cells absorb the nutrient substances conveyed by the blood, utilize it, develop, and reproduce themselves. New tissue is thus formed. All living Nature, from the lowliest organism to the majestic oak and lordly mammal, consists of cells.

The biological cell is a protoplasmic fragment containing a nucleus, which usually carries a smaller body, the nucleolus. But protoplasm forms the chief material of the cell, which is generally enclosed by a cell-wall. A speck of protoplasm bearing a nucleus is the simplest mode of life positively known to exist. The plasm of the cell-body is termed cytoplasm, while that of the nucleus is the nucleoplasm.

Just as a society is composed of social units, so is the organism constituted of cells. In the amœba we find that all areas of its body-surface function more or less alike. But in the higher living realms a physiological division of labour has been evolved. This differentiation has immense advantages. Not only are specialized organs more efficient in fulfilling their functions, but in the progress of life these peculiar structures have become specially fitted to their work. The chief function of the cells is to build and repair the tissues. They are thus occupied from the cradle to the grave. In one body-region the busy cells are eliminating waste products, in another they are active in restoring with living substances the places vacated by dead material.

Of tissues seven kinds are known. The muscular and nervous tissues—the master tissues—are instrumental in consuming and controlling the energies of the body. The remaining five tissues are the supporting tissues. These furnish energy to the master tissues, sustain them in position, feed, and guard them. The muscular tissue mainly consists of cellular layers arranged end to end. These cells possess the important property of becoming widened or shortened when stimulated by nerve impulses. Nerve tissue is composed of delicately branched cells. The fibres or branches of some nerve cells reach a length of several feet, and may extend from the vertebral column to the foot. The nerve fibres which conduct impulses to the nerve cells are termed sensory fibres, while those which transmit impulses from the nerve cells are the motor fibres. The organs of the body act in response to the impulses sent through the motor fibres.

Connective tissue is also constructed by cells generously furnished with delicate fibres. These last are of two kinds—attenuated and rigid white fibres and coarser yellow fibres which are extremely elastic. This tissue is present in all parts of the body, and connects the other cells and tissues. The muscle cells are interlaced with it, while the tendons at the terminations of the muscles are almost entirely made up of it. As a matter of fact, if all the non-connective tissue were taken away, the connective tissue would provide a complete model of all the animal organs. As Coleman remarks in his excellent Biology: "How abundant this tissue is in the skin may be known from the fact that leather consists entirely of it."

Oil is deposited in the connective tissue cells, and this gives rise to fatty or adipose tissue. The epithelial tissue is formed through one or even several layers of cells lying in close contact. This form of tissue is devoid of connective tissue, and, indeed, of any fibres, and is therefore the simplest of the tissues. The outer layer of the integument or skin—the epidermis—is composed of epithelial tissue, as is also the mucous membrane which lines the interior of the body. Epithelial tissue is destitute of blood vessels, and the epithelial cells derive their nourishment from blood liquids which ooze through the adjacent tissues. These cells are mostly transparent, and the redness of our lips and gums is due to the blood which lies beneath their mucous membrane. The nails of our fingers and toes consist of epithelial cells, and, when clean, are practically transparent. And, in shaving, as Huxley once said, so long as we do not penetrate the epidermis no bleeding results.

Another kind of epithelial cell serves as a glandular lining. Glands secrete useful fluids, and likewise form noxious excretions which, in healthy conditions, are expelled from the body. Then there is cartilage or gristle—a tough if pliable tissue. Cartilage is extremely useful in easing jars and jolts, and in the case of moveable joints in diminishing friction.

When scrutinized under the microscope the hardest bones are seen to contain small cavities. Within these cavities the bone cells lie immured in mineral matter. The stone-like bone is developed by the living bone cells which deposit phosphate of lime and limestone around themselves, and thus build themselves a prison. The imprisoned bone cells are sustained by nourishment which passes to them through minute channels. The duration of cell-life varies considerably. Bone cells remain alive for years, while other cells are born and die in the space of a few short hours.

Acid Drops.

We really sympathize with Mr. Bottomley over one incident connected with the recent German advance. The hanging Virgin of Albert, which was secured in its place by mechanical means, but which Mr. Bottomley "boomed" as a miracle, has now fallen—taken down or shot down by the Germans. So, bang goes another miracle. After doing so much to help God during the War, it would only have been gracious of God to have helped Mr. Bottomley a little. The legend was that the War would end on the day the statue fell. But it is a big blunder to date a religious prophecy. It should have run simply "after the statue falls."

The truth about the Virgin of Albert is that it was fixed in its leaning position by British engineers. Every soldier who had been in Albert knew all about it. The very surprising thing is that Mr. Bottomley, who said he had been in Albert, knew nothing about it. Such want of observation is very regrettable.

The Rev. Professor David Smith, in his Correspondence Column in the British Weekly for April 4, tells an inquirer who doubts the justice and goodness of God that it is not his true self that is speaking, but a lower and less worthy one. All doubters are mad. Scepticism is a form of insanity. It is that kind of silly talk which is making unbelievers by the thousand; and if he but knew it, Dr. Smith is doing our cause incalculable service by flinging such senseless expressions into circulation.

Providence is as careless of its churches as of its children. Iver Heath Church, Slough, has been broken into by thieves for the sixth time.

Londoners were startled on Good Friday by heavy rolls of thunder, but considerable relief was experienced when it was realized that it was only "Heaven's artillery," to quote a newspaper phrase.

Oh, the glorious free press of England! In the case in which the Rev. Sir Douglas Edward Scott, Bart., was charged with bigamy with a barmaid, a number of papers suppressed the fact that defendant was a clergyman. And the dear clergy so seldom pay for advertisements.

The Ashton-under-Lyne Reporter contains a smart passage of arms between the Rev. Mr. Cannings and a Rev. Mr. Parry who had objected to State help being given to poor children. Says Mr. Cannings:—

> Within a stone's throw of Mr. Parry's door there were little children living in wretched slums, ill-clad and insufficiently fed, and very many of them needing medical treatment. Mr. Parry, as a beneficed clergyman, enjoyed a secure position, his food and shelter safely provided. The progressive merely asked that the same security that the State gave to the clergyman should be given also to needy childhood, and that provision should be made for these helpless victims of unjust social conditions. And to foam against these humane and reasonable requests, and ridicule them as "State Pap" was to reveal one's-self as out of touch with the modern demands of reason and humanity.

The only comment we have to make is when Mr. Cannings sees so much, it is a pity that he does not pitch the rest of his religious lumber overboard and have done with it.

Canon Burroughs asks all Christians to stay away from theatres that openly flout "all that we stand for." The world would be a pretty place if some of these clerics had their way. There would be a committee of clergymen sitting to decide which plays should be produced, and they would probably enforce the singing of a hymn before the curtain rose, and a collection in aid of the Churches after the performance closed.

Canon Burroughs, in an Easter message to the Daily News, quoted a passage from an officer's letter at the Front, "Come on! Be a man and fight like hell." This is precisely what the dear clergy will never do. They much prefer to console the girls left behind by the fighting men.

Principal D. L. Ritchie, in an article entitled "An Epochal God," which appeared in the Christian World for March 18, informs us that hitherto we have had two kinds of God, namely, the intellectual and the sentimental, and that now a brand new Deity is about to put in an appearance, who will be known as the moral God. Thus we learn that the Divine Being is a moulded, not a moulding, character—man's creature, not his Creator. That is to say, man has made God in his own image, not God, man's. We have been saying this for many years; but it is a new and most refreshing thing to find it so clearly expressed by a clergyman, and a trainer of clergymen, as well.

The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, the popular Wesleyan minister, tells us that what we need most at present is a new religion, the old one being out of date and impotent; and the great refrain of a lecture recently delivered by him was: "O, God, when will it come?" Christianity, as we know it, has had its day, and even its ministers are looking for its successor. At any rate, Mr. Pearse is said to have held his audience spellbound as he flung orthodoxy to the background and made "a living humanitarian religion his outstanding theme." The world is moving after all.

After extolling the "noble art of self-defence" at a boxing show at Birmingham, Bishop Wakefield said he had just challenged Sir John Holder, the brewer, to stand up in a bout. The Bishop added, "Sir John has given me best." What a pity the contest did not take place! In the event of victory, the Bishop might have aspired to the Boxing Championship.

Sir William Robertson Nicoll declares that "in the new world of Christ and nowhere else is there any hope." Then this world is, indeed, absolutely without hope, for "the new world of Christ" is a sheer myth, and they who believe in it follow the veriest will-o'-the-wisp, though the majority of them know it not.

Sir William's credulity is a perfect marvel. Speaking of the resurrection of Christ, in the British Weekly for April 4, he says: "Who could have imagined the story of his resurrected life if it had never been? Who could have contrived that unimaginable blending of heaven and earth?" Why, the truth is that the world literally teemed with Saviour, God and resurrection stories. At that time of day there was no need to create or imagine anything, but simply to arrange and adapt materials that were already in existence in superabundance. The Christian myth is only one of a great multitude of similar ones.

We are fast approaching a religious agreement as to the cause and perpetuation of the War. We have several times cited religious speakers and writers in this country who said that God allowed the War to spiritually purify us, and permitted it to continue so that we might become religiously clean. Now, the Ex-Chancellor of Gemany, Dr. Von Michaelis says that the German people were also becoming spiritually corrupt, and "God desired to preserve us from complete materialism." So its all for our good. We should be duly thankful!

Rev. W. A. Duckworth, Lord of the Manors of Frome and other places, died leaving an estate valued at over £186,000. Of course, this money did not come from his profession as a clergyman, but it is clear that being a clergyman offered no bar to its possession. So "Blessed be ye poor."

The Church Missionary Society is appealing for £10,000 to Christianize Palestine. After promising to found a Jewish State, a vigorous attempt is to be made to turn it into a Christian one. Of course, the Jewish State is a myth; the most that can happen is a State in which a large proportion are Jews, and in which Jewish freedom is secured. But it is not playing the game to ask British Christians to supply £10,000 to undermine the Jewish State before it is established. And there really are quite enough Christian States in the world. That is one cause of the present trouble. A few more non-Christian States might make things a little pleasanter.

The dear clergy are always assuring the faithful that religion is without money and without price, but ecclesiastics are not innocent of finance. In a recent Chancery law case, the payment of a legacy of £100,000 by the late Baron Llangattock to the Welsh Church was ordered by the Judge. The touch of irony was added, for the followers of the Prince of Peace were instructed to invest the sum in War Loan.

Two women have been admitted as deacons by the Bishop of Llandaff. As most congregations are composed of ladies, Christianity promises to become almost entirely a feminist movement.

£117,503 was raised in the Salvation Army Self-Denial Week. This should have the pleasing result of keeping hell alight a little longer.

Rev. Fort Newton said at the City Temple the other day that "the greatest teacher of the Christian doctrine of forgiveness was Shelley." The peculiar thing is that this "greatest teacher" should have written himself down an Atheist. The truth is that what Shelley saw was the evils of malignity and of the spirit of revenge. Forgiveness is no more Christian than is gravitation. And of vigorous haters and practisers of revenge Christian nations are easily first.

Some of the Good Friday newspapers were rather startling. One had a leading article, "The Day of Calvary." What was that editor thinking of to print "news" two thousand years old?

A Sunday paper declares that Father Bernard Vaughan "makes his own bed and sweeps his own room." Millions of people do the same, but they do not get flowers thrown at them.

The International (Johannesburg) of February 8 publishes the following:—

> A coloured man was going along an East Rand Suburb one Sunday morning. He saw a number of people entering a Church, and as he was far from home he mingled with them intending to spend the hours in worship; but no sooner than he was inside he was jostled out. A policeman was hailed and he spent the next hour in the Charge Office instead of the church. On Monday he was convicted and fined £1 for trespassing in a private place—a church. We cannot wonder at that man turning round and saying, "I shall have no more of your religious mockery with its theoretical 'Come Unto Me,' and your practical £1 or a month with hard labour.

But what would you? Even in Christian America the white man will not usually worship in the same church as the black one. Christian brotherhood has its limitations.

Owing to the demand for War-news, the newspapers were published on Good Friday, and the obsequious editors did their best to put a little piety in their columns. One penpusher wrote, "London was mostly at church," undismayed by the headline in the same page, "Seaside Resorts Packed."

The Bishop of Birmingham declares that "England needs to be aroused by suffering." Indeed! It is a pity that the clergy evade their share of hardships.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 14, Liverpool; April 21, Goldthorpe; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—April 28, Nuneaton.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.—E. J Pearce, 2s. 6d.; J. Maclachlan, £1; J. S., 2s. 6d.; W. Booth, 5s.

Mrs. E. Taylor.—Very pleased to hear from you. Such heartfelt letters as yours does one good to read. We agree with you that nothing can exaggerate the horrors of the old English Factory System. And you have placed your finger on its greatest evil—it has accustomed generations to live in a way that should be impossible in a civilized country.

G. F. Lawes (Vancouver).—We were not thinking of, nor were we concerned with the personal character of the man. We were only interested in the nature and influence of the forces set at work. And we have seen nothing in the course of events to seriously change our opinion. Great ideas have a way of overleaping the character of those who express them.

D. McDermott.—The poem is an imitation of Burns, but not by a master hand, although the topic commends itself to Freethinkers. We have noticed what you inquire after in the journal indicated.

Bert Olds.—The number of clergymen of all denominations in Britain is probably about 50,000. As you say, the casualties amongst them are not striking. But then, as a class, they are exempt. We wish that all parents would follow your example in bringing up their children. The letter by "W. Sivertson" is quite a good one.

Robert Parker (Glasgow) writes that he is trying to show his gratitude for all we have done in keeping the paper going during the War, by putting it into as many new hands as possible. That is the kind of gratitude we want. When we are at liberty to write the story of how we managed, it will form quite a tale of adventure.

H. Dawson.—Glad to hear your son and his comrades find the Freethinker so interesting. As you say, it will tell its tale "when the boys come home."

W. Booth.—Your requirements have received attention. As you say, the difference between a German shell falling on a church and on a Freethought hall is considerable. One is an outrage; the other would have been a divine judgment.

We have to acknowledge several letters of thanks for parcels of literature sent to soldiers for distribution. We rejoice to know these have been found useful, and shall be pleased to send more, so far as we find it possible.

A. Hindley.—Sorry we cannot answer your questions at length. (1) Not received. (2) Shall be pleased to have an account if anything improper occurred when you asked to affirm. (3) We do not know the age of the person mentioned. (4) Certainly, in our opinion, the Bowman judgment legalized all bequests to any Freethought Society. (5) You will only find what you require in the twelve-volume edition of Ingersoll's Works. Thanks for your good opinion of our work.

General Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—Bethnal Green Branch, 5s.; Manchester Branch, £1 4s. 10d.; "In Memoriam" Emma Theobalds, £2; Charles Day, 2s.

Benevolent Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—Bethnal Green Branch, 5s.; Manchester Branch, £1 4s. 10d.

J. Masters.—Thanks for securing two new readers, with a promise of more. Paper has been sent.

H. Amey.—Get your friend to have done with generalities, and ask him where, and in what way, Christianity acted as the champion of women.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen visits Liverpool to-day (April 14), and lectures there in the hall of the Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street, at 3 and 7 o'clock. The Liverpool "saints" have been much troubled lately over the shortness of suitable halls—all being taken up in other directions for the War. Mr. Cohen hopes to see a good gathering, however, of all his Liverpool friends.

Our readers will be interested in the news that Mrs. Francis Gordon Foote, wife of our late editor's only son, presented her husband with a daughter on December 29, 1917. Mr. and Mrs. Foote reside at Berkley East, South Africa, hence the time between the event and the announcement. We congratulate the parents, and wish the young lady a safe and comfortable journey over the ills with which nature so thoughtfully provides newcomers.

The Executive of the N. S. S. has decided that the Annual Conference shall be held in London on Whit-Sunday, for which purpose the Queen's Hall has been engaged. Railway travelling is not over-pleasant under War conditions, but we hope that provincial Branches will make a special effort to send delegates. The business will be important, as will be seen by reference to another column in the present issue.

The Manchester City News for March 30 publishes a report of Mr. Cohen's last lecture in that city. The report is a very good one, and we notice it here in order to record a departure which is a welcome sign of the times. Reports have been much more frequent of late than they were, but there is still room for improvement. We are late in noticing the matter, but the fault is not ours. A copy of the paper has only just reached us.

The leaflet on God and the Air-Raid has been out of print for several months owing to delay connected with the shortage of labour. We have now a fresh supply, and they can be secured at 1s. per 100, postage 2d. extra. The leaflet has been found very useful, and the two editions that have been issued brought plain truths before Christians in a striking manner. We hope our readers will see that this edition gets the rapid circulation it deserves.

We are asked to announce that a debate between Mr. M. Maubrey and Mr. E. Bury has been arranged to take place at the Caxton Hall on April 17, at 8 o'clock. Subject, "The Ship Without a Rudder." Admission is free.

"Tab Can" writes:—

> I have noticed that in Europe, these last few years, the word "Pagan" is coming into employment. The population is slowly dividing, not into sects, but into Christian and Pagan. This shows advance. Gradually, I hope that the the Christians will slip back into a comparatively small minority, holding their own laws, morals, and customs, but unable to impose them upon the nations by force.
> Only, I would that those who are not of them (I am an Agnostic-Deist) should come forward, and boldly declare that all who accept Authority against Reason are intellectual enemies of mankind—for such they certainly are, however well-meaning.

Whatsoever nation should get the start of the other in making the proposal to reduce and fix the amount of its armed force, would crown itself with everlasting honour. The risk would be nothing; the gain certain. This gain would be the giving incontrovertible demonstration of its own disposition to peace, and of the opposite disposition in the other nation in case of its rejecting the proposal. The proposition should be made in the most public manner—should be an address from nation to nation. This, at the same time that it conciliated the confidence of the nation addressed, would make it impracticable for the government of that nation to neglect it, or to stave it off by shifts or evasions. It would sound the heart of the nation addressed. It would discover its intentions, and proclaim them to the world.—Jeremy Bentham.

To the Members and Branches of the National Secular Society.

Directly after my re-election as President of the N. S. S., I said that in my opinion the time had arrived for an overhauling of the machinery of the Society. Further experience has served to confirm the opinion, which, indeed, is widely held throughout the country. I have no desire to dwell upon the defects of our organization—they are fairly apparent to those conversant with the N. S. S. My suggestions take the more positive form of reconstruction. And I am printing them here—preparatory to their being brought before the Conference—because I wish to give all the members and Branches of the Society ample time to reflect upon them and to digest them. I shall also be pleased to receive suggestions for improvement before they are placed on the Agenda.

My suggestions, which are governed by the ideas of securing a more efficient organization at headquarters and of giving all parts of the Society a more direct control of, and greater interest in, its work, are as follows:—

1. That the Executive consist of ten members, elected at the Annual Conference. Not more than one member of a Branch to be eligible for election. Members who do not belong to a Branch must belong to the Society for at least three years before being eligible for election on the Executive.
2. After the Conference of 1918, the names of all candidates for election, with the Branch—if any—to which they belong, shall appear on the Agenda, which shall be issued one month before the Conference.
3. The present Conference (1918) to nominate and elect the Executive.
4. An Annual Report and Balance Sheet shall be issued to all members of the Society.
5. Each Branch shall appoint a Corresponding Member of the Executive, who shall receive a report of all business done by the Executive, and be advised of any special and important business coming before the Executive.
6. In places where no Branch of the N. S. S. exists the Executive shall have power to appoint a representative who shall keep the Executive informed of all events touching the work and welfare of the N. S. S.
7. Branches to be grouped over given areas and an organizing secretary appointed as early as possible.
8. There shall also be appointed, as early as possible, an organizer for the whole of the country, with such duties and on such terms as shall be afterwards decided.
9. Either in conjunction with, or separate from, other officials there shall be appointed local press representatives, and a general Press Representative at headquarters, his duties to consist in watching all matters connected with Freethought work which may arise in the public press.
10. That it shall be an instruction to the Executive to appoint a Finance Committee and a Propagandist Committee.
11. That in place of the Interim Conference ordered by the Conference of 1917, the Executive be authorized to call an annual meeting of members and unattached Freethinkers for the discussion of such subjects as are of general interest and importance.
12. That the place of the Annual Conferences shall be determined by a vote of the Branches, the Executive having first ascertained what places are prepared to receive the Conference, and that the Conference shall not be held in the same town more than once in four years.
13. That whenever possible the Executive shall require a prospective member to be proposed and seconded by two members of the Society.
14. That at an early date steps be taken to (a) combine the N. S. S. and the Secular Society, Limited, under the general title of the National Secular Society, Limited, or (b) convert the N. S. S. into an incorporated body.

I am convinced that the above suggestions contain the skeleton of an organization that will consolidate the work done. During the two years I have been President of the N.S.S. I have spared myself in no degree. What has been done is before the party. The N.S.S. is stronger than it has been for years. Branches have greatly increased in number, and the membership has been almost doubled. Naturally, I am anxious that the results achieved should be conserved, and, I believe, this can best be done along the lines suggested. I hope, therefore, that Branches of the Society will give the whole matter their serious attention, and that the Conference of 1918 will mark the beginning of a new and flourishing era in the history of the N.S.S.

Mr. Maskelyne and the Spirits.

II.

(Concluded from p. 212.)

During the past 40 years I have investigated the manifestations of every Medium of note who has appeared in this country, and I have found nothing but fraud.—J. N. Maskelyne to Mr. E. Smedley, March 31, 1906.

Having obtained his flukey verdict over Mr. Maskelyne, Archdeacon Colley, of course, made the most of it. He gave lectures in different parts of the country, at which he made statements that Mr. Maskelyne regarded as distinctly libelous; and, in a letter to Mr. Smedley, he declares his intention of sending a shorthand reporter to take notes of Colley's statements. In another letter to Mr. Smedley (December 3, 1907), Mr. Maskelyne complains: "He (Colley) entirely suppresses the fact that the Jury gave a verdict against me solely because they thought I should have made the spirit disappear, and immediately I announced my intention of doing this he withdrew his challenge. One of the Jury also informed me that ten of them held out for two hours for a farthing damages but two cranks would not agree to less than £75. Colley claimed 3,000."

Mr. Maskelyne employed a private inquiry agent, who made some astonishing discoveries in Colley's past career, but as the Archdeacon is now dead—he died in October, 1912—we will bury the details with him.

Mr. Maskelyne, commenting on his death, observes (October 7, 1912), "He (Colley) was going to preach Spiritualism at the Church Congress, where he was generally laughed at, and I think the excitement was too much for his weak heart. He was awfully afraid of being buried alive, and directed that his body should be dissected at Birmingham Hospital and cremated."

In a letter to Mr. Smedley dated September 25, 1913, Mr. Maskelyne observes:—

> .....With reference to the address of Sir Oliver Lodge to the British Association, he has said nothing new. For many years he has believed in Spiritual Manifestations upon insufficient evidence. I have sat with him and Sir William Crookes at Seances and have seen them puzzled by the simplest tricks. The minds of Scientists are quite unsuited to such investigations, sharp school boys are much better. You often find that persons who are exceedingly clever in some respects are exceedingly foolish in others. One faculty appears to be enlarged at the expense of others.

But the most interesting letter of all is one dated April 15, 1909, it deals with Home, Dr. Wallace, Mrs.

Guppy, and the Davenport Brothers. It runs as follows :—

St. Georges Hall, Langham Place, London, W.,
April 15th, 1909.

Dear Mr. Smedley,—In reply to your letter of the 12th inst., I must tell you that I never had an opportunity of attending Home's Seances. He was a great swell and never gave public Seances and never made a charge for his services but always expected a present worth 4 or 5 times more than he could charge as a fee. I have been told by persons who know him well that he used hypnotism largely, he could do very little with those he could not get under control. If you read reports of his Seances you will find that he went round the circle and made passes over each sitter. You must always bear in mind that a medium can produce an effect upon some persons that no Conjurer can produce. A Conjurer says I am going to show you a trick. A medium says I am going to raise the spirits of the dead. The effect upon persons who believe such a statement is very great, in fact they become hallucinated and can be made to believe almost anything.

There is no doubt about the sincerity of Dr. Wallace, but if you knew him personally you could not fail to see that he is just the kindly confiding gentleman that can be imposed upon. Some people, such as Mr. Stead, humbug themselves. He can sit down with a pencil in his hand and allow his subconsciousness to run riot and believe that spirits are guiding his hand. I know an old gentleman who could sit and think instantly of his dead wife until he could see her sitting in her empty chair. This gentleman had the good sense to know that it was simply an illusion conjured up in his imagination.

The trick of producing flowers has often been exposed. Females usually perform this trick; they carry the flowers between their legs and the dew is produced by a small bottle of water. Doubtless Mrs. Guppy worked the trick in this manner. She was a fat, vulgar woman. I once advertised a pair of old houses for sale and Mrs. Guppy (then Mrs. Volckmann) came to my house to see them. We struck a bargain and had a glass of wine together afterwards. I asked her how the spirits were getting on, and she gave me a knowing wink and burst out laughing. She had given up Spiritualism then.

As regards the Davenport Brothers, one of them died in Australia many years ago, and shortly before he died both brothers confessed that all they did was trickery.

It is quite untrue to say that all great thinkers who have studied Spiritualism have become believers, it is only those who believe that are paraded by the wire-pullers of the fraud. Thousands of great men have investigated the subject and have turned away in disgust. You should read the "Report of the Seybert Commission on Spiritualism."

I could give you facts that would fill a book but must conclude for want of time.

With kindest regards, Yours sincerely,
J. N. Maskelyne.

The statement about Home bears out what I have stated in previous articles to be the reason why Home was never publicly exposed. His good social position and his refusal to take a fee gave him the power to exclude from his seances all those, like Mr. Maskelyne, who he feared exposure from. Mr. Maskelyne says he never had a chance to attend one of Home's seances. But if Home's manifestations were really genuine, he would not only have welcomed investigation, but he would have challenged it.

Of Mrs. Guppy, as Mr. Maskelyne remarks in his little book on Modern Spiritualism (pp. 99-100), "the great marvel by which she obtains a niche in the Spiritual Temple of Fame is that she was taken up from her household accounts, en deshabille, at Highbury Hill Park, and carried by the spirits to 69 Lamb's Conduit Street, where, when she dropped through the roof and through several ceilings (without leaving any apertures), she came down 'plump' upon the centre of the table, the ink with which those 'household accounts' were being made up still wet in the pen!" The last word, uncompleted, was understood to be "pickles."[1] The distance between the two points travelled is three miles, and as only three minutes elapsed between the wish for her appearance and her arrival, she must have travelled at the rate of a mile a minute. As she was said to have been the heaviest woman in London, it is a wonder she did not knock the house down. She must have been a pretty good handful for the spirits. The cover of Mr. Maskelyne's book is adorned with a picture of the event, entitled "A Moonlight Transit of Venus." Two female spirits and one little sprite, seated on a spirit-bottle, are engaged on the operation. Mrs. Guppy, represented as a fat, middle-aged woman, attired a la middle Victorian, is holding a quill pen in her outstretched hand. In the background looms a public-house, bearing the legend, "Gammon, Importer of Spirits." The moon, wearing a human face and a monocle, looks down smilingly on the scene. Punch satirized it as follows :—

There is a lady, Mrs. Guppy—
Mark shallow scientific puppy!—
The heaviest she in London, marry,
Her, spirits three long miles did carry.

Upon a table down they sat her,
Within closed doors. What! you know better,
And we're all dupes and self-deceivers?
Yah! Sadducees and unbelievers!

Mrs. Guppy was, however, very jealous of her rivals in the medium business, and, says Podmore, "on more than one occasion, assisted in exposing or embarrassing rival pretenders to mediumship. She subsequently married Mr. Volckman, the gentleman who seized the 'spirit' at Miss Cook's seance."[2]

It was during a seance given by Herne and Williams, in June, 1871, that Mrs. Guppy performed her aerial feat which landed her on the seance table. Now, this Herne and Williams were both impudent frauds. In 1878, at Amsterdam, Williams was caught in the act of producing fraudulent phenomena, and upon being searched there was found, says Podmore, "on Williams a dirty black beard with brown silk ribbon, and several yards of very dirty muslin—the simple ingredients which represented the spiritual make-up of the repentant pirate, John King—together with another bottle of phosphorized oil, a bottle of scent, and a few minor properties."[3]

This spirit of the pirate, John King, was the same spirit on duty at the seance in 1871, although it was another spirit named "Katie" who did the donkey work of conveying Mrs. Guppy across London. We give an extract from an account of the proceedings :—

> John King's voice was a very deep one, while Katie's was more like a whisper, but perfectly distinct.....When asked if she would bring us something, she said, "Yes, yes." One of the visitors (a confederate, evidently), in a joking sort of way, remarked, "I wish she would bring Mrs. G(uppy)."..... Upon which another said, "Good gracious! I hope not; she is one of the biggest women in London." Katie's voice at once said, "I will, I will," and John's rough voice shouted out, "You can't do it, Katie," but she appeared to chuckle and repeat, "I will, I will." We were all laughing and joking at the absurdity of the idea, when John's rough voice called out, "Keep still, can't you?" In an instant somebody called out, "Good God! there is something on my head," simultaneously with a heavy bump on the table, and one or two screams. A match was instantly struck, and there was Mrs. G(uppy), standing on the centre of the table, with the whole of us seated round the table, closely packed together, as we sat at the commencement. John King's voice shouted out, "Well, you are clever, Katie."[1]

It is amazing that people could be made to believe that such puerile hooligan antics were the work of spirits.

In conclusion, it may be said that Mr. Maskelyne, by his public performances at the Egyptian Hall, and afterwards at St. George's Hall, did more than any other man to discredit this pernicious superstition; and our thanks are due to Mr. Smedley for allowing the late Mr. Maskelyne's letters to be made public.

CONSCIOUS VILLAINY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—The question raised by "Ignotus" regarding conscious villainy among professional religionists seems to me, as an "ex-Christian," of vital importance to the cause of Freethought—and, indeed, it must decide whether Truth shall triumph soon or only after prolonged struggles. For, if we are opposed to a group of religionists who "consciously and deliberately" assist in what, in the end, amounts to villainy, then we might well abandon the strong cudgel of Reason and try less abstract methods. And by new tactics we could speedily wreck the last hulks of religion. Indeed, so much worthier would our opponents (in my opinion) be, that the fight would be short and sharp, and could only result in universal Freethought. Such, however, is not the case.

Without considering the phenomena of religious mentality or the general trend of human nature towards folly, "Ignotus" has crowned religious practitioners with really undeserved honours—for there is merit in being deliberately and consciously bad or good. He appears to forget that conscious villainy must have opportunity and incentive, and that given such, it is, at the most, a powerful minority in human affairs. And without unconscious folly—where is conscious villainy?

There is, in my opinion, insufficient sub-conscious villainy prevalent to warrant the assertion that "professional religionists consciously and deliberately dose the common people with their narcotics" in order to help maintain an unjust status quo. That in this respect there are a handful of consciously villainous clerics I do not deny, but as with similar human fallacies undergoing the test of time—the main body of them are dosed by their own narcotics, and, being mentally chloroformed from the clerical cradle onwards, are peculiarly prone to the unscrupulous few—who are, of course, of great social influence, and have deeply rooted interests in almost every phase of modern life. But even this villainy is not a predominate cause; it only exists after folly, and decides nothing, and may, all along, have no immoral basis whatever—some of the greatest minds are prone to intellectual perversity.

It is passing strange that "Ignotus" should need clearer evidence of the strength for harm of rampant folly when utilized by villainy than the present War. The parallel is there. Men, far from "intellectual moles," have justified any diabolical deed, and, no doubt, felt anything but conscious of villainy. Nor does "intellectual perception," at its highest, always analyse the moral groundwork of any of our cardinal obsessions to-day. A few scoundrels may pervert the whole mind of a nation; and, from not insignificant intellects, obtain "highly moral" justification.

Far from having the "wrang soo by the lug," the Editor's assertion that "conscious villainy is not a powerful factor in human affairs" must surely be the wider view, and the most worthy of Freethought. After all, though intellectual stupidity is more formidable than rank villainy, we shall not attain the goal by denouncing the lesser evil, in the belief that there lies the root of the trouble. On the contrary, and whether right or wrong, such a proceeding makes the going harder and creates more stupidity where mental clarity is direly wanting.

Finally, "Ignotus" misvalues the quality of moral courage when he thinks that, without legal penalties, it is not implied in conscious and deliberate villainy. It depends, of course, upon the condition of the mind at the moment of decision or inception. Given a certain rectitude or habit of mind, a flash of moral courage is undoubtedly necessary, and generally present, when conscious and deliberate wrong is "wirelessed," as it were. But if such rectitude be absent, both the consciousness of villainy and the moral sense are either partially impaired or entirely absent. Even so, the moral courage, living and dying, primarily and upon the inception of thought, is not influenced in the first place by a sense of one's immunity from, or liability to, punishment. "And the man who will have the truth at all costs promises to die with no better epitaph than 'Here lies a crank'"—the whole human tragedy in one anguished sentence, Sir. Truly, this Freethought is a hard but magnificent cause! Oh, for a millionaire!

In closing, may I—a very recent recruit in your ranks—also record my profound appreciation for the ever-welcome and always re-read "Views and Opinions."

W. O. Parker.

Sir,—May I suggest to your correspondent "Ignotus" that the examples of "villainy" which he adduces as "conscious" do not bear out his contention. "Villains who feel the need of religion" do, as a matter of fact, show the exact contrary very vividly. Their awakened consciousness brings with it repentance and, as a corollary (perhaps temporary), abstention from villainy; and though they return to their vomit again, it is not until their consciousness has been once more lulled into slumber by force of habit or by renewed temptation. It must be borne in mind that few of us are capable of steady, consistent thinking. We act on the thoughts of the moment, and neither remember that those of the past have been different, nor foresee that those of the future will be. We do not even correlate such thoughts as we entertain at any given moment, with a view to their mutual consistency.

Again, "Ignotus" says: "The professional religionist can find justification for any kind of villainy....." Do not those two words which I have italicized destroy his argument? Has he never heard of self-deception? The religionist (and he is not alone in this) has deluded himself into believing his own justifications; that is the truth of the matter. Those who forged apocryphal gospels must have known that they were telling lies, and those who burnt men and women for a difference of opinion must have known that they were killing their fellows; but they glowed with conscious virtue—not villainy—nevertheless.

That the governing classes have often deliberately perpetuated evils is undeniable; but that does not prove that they believed them to be evils. We are all of us too apt to think that what we should not like is nevertheless very good for others. Those who "dose the common people with their narcotics" do often believe that these are beneficial medicines, or at least not harmful. If it be argued that men wilfully and deliberately remain blind—that they will not examine and consider lest they should be compelled to amendment—I am in agreement; but does not this show that they could not continue their villainy, did they become truly conscious of it?

Obituary.

Another link with the age of Bradlaugh has been broken by the death of Mrs. F. W. Theobalds, of Leyton, who was buried in Chingford Mount Cemetery last Saturday. Mrs. Theobalds was born at Kettering in 1850, and joined the N.S.S. at the Hall of Science in 1884. She was a hard-working wife and mother, striving and cheerful to the last hour in spite, or rather because of her lack of religion. She brought up seven children, three of them, it seems, for the War. Two are still at the Front; one has been discharged, a grandson has been killed. Her calm and noble life through sorrow, struggle, and storm will be a ceaseless inspiration to her husband and family. The Secular Burial Service was read at her grave by the undersigned.—H. V. Storey.

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on April 2.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Braddock, Brandes, Eagar, Gorniot, Leat, Neate, Palmer, Roger, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed.

Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

Twenty-five new members were admitted for Goldthorpe, Manchester, Nuneaton, Portsmouth, Swansea, West Ham, and the Parent Society.

Application was made for the formation of a Branch in Portsmouth, and the necessary conditions having been complied with, permission was granted.

The President reported the opening of new ground in Pontycymmer with two highly successful meetings.

A letter from the Birmingham Branch expressing their willingness to make arrangements for the Conference and a similar letter from Manchester, subject to the possibility of procuring a hall for the public meeting, were both discussed. Finally, in view of the increasing difficulties of railway travelling, further augmented by the rationing system, it was resolved that the Branches be thanked for their invitation and the Conference be held in London.

The Secretary was instructed to proceed with the usual arrangements.

Messrs. Eager, Palmer, and Roger were elected as an Agenda Committee.

Grants were made to various Branches for propaganda purposes during the coming year, and the meeting adjourned until April 25.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

The Blank Wall.

XI.

Most people who think at all about anything must have realized by now that the distinctions in society between aristocrat and democrat, rich and poor, were essentially artificial distinctions dependent upon the possession of money and the fineness of wearing apparel. The real distinction, that is the mental distinction, is negligible. The rich are quite as stupid as the poor, the West-end clubman is on a mental par with the L. C. C. dustman; if there is any superabundance of mental vitality it will probably be possessed by the latter, because he is more closely in touch with the realities of human life, and is unprotected from certain ugly truths by large, soft cushions, etc. A man is sometimes forced to think because his stomach is empty, or because the conditions of life are abnormally vile and unpleasant. Nothing is more certain than that the distinctions between rich and poor are artificial distinctions. The same fact may be observed in military caste. The sergeant we may call the working-class; he is the backbone of every army, and without him no great military project would be possible. Yet, the mere accident of birth and education (the latter often nothing more than the development of a bored and delicate series of mannerisms), these things, allied with the power of money and social influence, enable a man with no practical experience of either men or war to become an officer, who is set in authority over the sergeant. His blood is much bluer than the sergeant's language. He is a higher type; he represents the aristocratic caste.

The sergeant can never hope to feel like a "real gentleman"; not even if he wins the Victoria Cross and gains a commission. There will always remain in his consciousness the fact that he is not the social equal of an officer who has been given a commission without any specific effort, and as a result of class right. The two men may be equally brave; take them as men and they are magnificently heroic, but the caste idea prevails. It is a tremendous reality is the caste idea, just as real as the facts of heroism and gallantry. It is artificial, and at the same time a most dreadful reality. It constitutes that fixity of social relationships which thwarts progress and goes largely to make humanity a failure.

Man Power and the Clergy.

When the Government brought in its new Man Power Bill it contained—in spite of its substituting, in the name of freedom and democracy, Government by Order in Council in place of constitutional methods—one feature that gave widespread satisfaction. It provided for the inclusion of all clergymen of military age. At last the Government had decided to drop its "third sex" legislation and treat the clergy as citizens. True, it was only half-heartedly done. They were to be liable to non-combatant service only. And non-combatant service is evasive at best; it is cowardly at worst. The case of a man who voluntarily undertakes to do what he can to repair the ravages of war is one thing, the man who becomes part of the organization of an army, and who of his own choice says: "I will not fight, but I will do another man's work so that he may fight in my place, is in quite a different category. No man is warranted in asking another to do what he would not do himself. The clergy have urged others to fight; the least they could do would have been to set these others an example.

Exempting the Clergy.

Perhaps the clergy realized this at the last moment. Perhaps the Government never intended the conscription of the clergy to remain part of the Bill, but only placed it there in order to facilitate its passage through the second reading stage, and thus get the House committed to the Bill as a whole. The first indication of the real position came with the Government announcement that there should be a special tribunal to deal with the clergy (one member suggested that the proper body to deal with the sky-pilots would be the Air Board). It was going to be Dooley's description of the right way to give votes—give everybody the vote, and do the counting yourself. But even that was not enough. The clergy were not, and are not, taking risks. So on Monday (April 15) Sir George Cave announced that the Government had decided to insert a clause exempting ministers of religion altogether. And that is where the matter stands as we go to press. Even the contemptible farce of non-combatant service has broken down. The clergy are out for privilege, and the Government will see they get it. Whether the clergy will receive a medal and a pension for so bravely urging others to fight, and for conspicuous ability in keeping the home-fires burning, remains to be seen.

Was Conscription of the Clergy Intended.

What lies behind this throwing the cloak of privilege over the clergy. It is noticeable that the expressions of some of the bishops and leading Nonconformists were very guarded. They said they were sure the clergy would not shirk their duty, but they would wait and see how events worked out. Most probably they knew how events would work out, and their waiting was therefore pure farce. "General" Booth complained loudly and bitterly at the Army taking his "officers," and the War Cry said:—

> All around us the Governments and Parliaments, and great captains of this world, can give no place in their scheme of things for anything but force—gun-powder and man power, and so on. God-power, and the power of prayer, and of truth, and of heart religion seem of little moment.

Can it be that the Government has at last awakened—really awakened to the value of "God-power and the power of prayer"? If that is the case something definite should have been announced from the Government benches. Or was the whole thing from the very beginning an elaborate farce—a mere trick of the shifty kind that makes politics stink in the nostrils of honest men?

That Seven Per Cent.

Sir George Cave, in announcing the exemption of the clergy, said that, "after allowing sufficient clergy for the needs of the country, the Government would not obtain a large increase of military man-power from the remainder." "Military man-power" clearly means here fighting men. But the Government has already announced that it does not expect to get more than seven per cent. of fighting men out of the country by means of its new Bill. For the sake of that seven per cent., thousands of homes are to be broken up, thousands of businesses ruined, and men of fifty and upwards will return to civil life, probably broken in health, and quite unable to enter into competition with younger men and with the big combines—which will be the main business firms conserved by the War. But not even this seven per cent. is to be taken from the Churches! The man on whose health and strength the prosperity of a family depends must join the Army, in which he may already have sons fighting; the man who has spent all his life in creating a small business must shut his doors and go; but the dear clergy must remain! Does Sir George Cave, does the Government, with all his and its confidence in the stupidity of the British public, really expect men and women to believe that the country will go to ruin if seven out of every hundred clergymen are put into the Army? There really are limits to human credulity, even if there are none to political jobbery.

Does the Nation Need Religion?

What are the religious needs of the country? Who is to decide what these needs are? We have heard no complaint from any quarter that there is a shortage of religion, there has been no clamour from the people for more parsons. We have seen queues standing for supplies of butter, of meat, of sugar, and other things, but we have neither seen nor heard of queues waiting for religion. Why not adopt the system of rationing? We feel quite sure that there would be no complaint, however small the ration fixed. Allow one parson to so many thousand people, and let the people say whether they really feel they require a clergyman to look after them. Letters have, we believe, poured into the letter-boxes of Government officials pointing out the hardships and injustices that will be the result of the Man Power Bill. Against all such protests the Government is adamant. Businesses must be ruined, homes broken up, the future of children jeopardized. The nation needs men. Everything and everyone must go—except the clergy. And Sir George Cave declares that the religious needs of the nation demand their exemption! Religious interest and vested interest hang together. Perhaps one day when the British people are bitten with a desire for genuine freedom they will hang together in a more satisfactory sense.

Our Contemptible Clergy.

At the opening of the War, the clergy disgusted thousands of their supporters by their general attitude. When conscription became the law of the land, and the clergy, after being zealous recruiting agents, obtained exemption, contempt was added to disgust. And now, when a further measure of conscription is about to be enforced, the clergy decline to give even a miserable seven per cent. of their number. And the Government, insistent in its plea that the nation needs every man, yields to pious pressure, and declares they must not be touched. We hope the mothers, and daughters, and wives, and sweethearts of Britain will remember. We hope it will help them to realize that in every clergyman they have a representative of one of the most useless classes that ever saddled itself on a civilized community. Aristocracy may be an affront to civilized sense, but an aristocracy will play its part at a time like the present. It will claim privilege, but it will also face duties. The clergy ask and stand for privilege alone. They will inflame men's passions to the point of battle. They will urge others to go and join in the battle. But for themselves—their mission is to stay at home and prey.

"The Justification of God."

Such is the arresting title of a characteristic and deeply significant book from the fertile pen of P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D., Principal of Hackney College, Hampstead, which, in a sub-title, is said to be a series of Lectures for War-Time on a Christian Theodicy. Dr. Forsyth is an exceptionally clever man, endowed at once with a keenly artistic and critical intellect, who has cultivated an exceedingly forcible but not always too lucid style of writing. He is a theological specialist who affects a burning hatred of the amateur. He used to taunt Mr. R. J. Campbell, during his brief New Theology campaign, with being nothing better than a theological charlatan, who had no moral right to mislead the public on the most momentous of all subjects. It is necessary to bear in mind, therefore, that Principal Forsyth comes before us in the guise, and assumes all the authority, of an expert in theological lore. Powerfully impressed by "the magnitude of our present calamity," he is under the spell of an all-consuming passion for the high task of adjusting the ways of God to conscience. In other words, following the example of a great predecessor, he has come forth in the work now before us,—

> To vindicate Eternal Providence,
> And justify the ways of God to man.

The Justification of God is a theodicy, a fresh attempt to defend the Divine character, to adjust the ways of God not only to man's conscience, but "to his own conscience above all." Describing the work in the Preface, the author says:—

> Its object is not to bring God's ways to the bar either of man's reason or man's conscience, but rather to the bar where all reason and conscience must go at last, to the standard of a holy God's account of himself in Jesus Christ and his Cross. A philosophical theodicy or vindication of God's justice has not yet been found. And if faith wait for it, the soul may perish first. But a religious and theological theodicy (for here the one means the other) is not only not impossible; it is our only refuge.

Already we are in possession of an all-important admission, namely, that hitherto no attempt to defend God philosophically has been crowned with success. In Dr. Forsyth's opinion, Leibnitz, in his famous Theodicee, utterly failed to justify the Supreme Being, nor has the Hackney trainer of budding clergymen the least hope that any work on those lines will ever succeed in achieving the desired object, and myriads of immortal souls may perish before there is any chance of such a work making its appearance. It follows, therefore, that if the theologian fails us, the cause of God is utterly doomed. It is from him alone, if from any source, that a satisfactory theodicy can be expected. The Principal adds:—

> This is the kind of theology that retains much public interest or promise to-day—the justification of God by himself, and not by a course of history which is a dim mixture of his ways and our ways, and where the cross lights make it impossible to see it steadily and see it whole. The only vindicator of God is God. And his own theodicy is in the Cross of his Son Jesus Christ. The problem of God is the problem of history with God in it. The doubts that unsettle men most to-day are those that rise not from science but from society, not from the irrational but the unjust.

Two alleged facts have now been brought to our notice in the short Preface, namely, that of the complete inability of the philosopher to produce a theodicy, and that of the supposed competency of the theologian to supply the much-needed article. And yet our author seems to think that even the theologian is scarcely equal to the herculean feat, a religious and theological theodicy being merely declared to be "not impossible," though "our only refuge." Indeed, Principal Forsyth is courageous enough to concede that history is by no means exclusively on God's side. Superficial divines, like the Rev. Dinsdale T. Young, are constantly appealing to history for confirmation of their apologetic positions. In one of his popular lectures, in which he so successfully plays to the gallery, Mr. Young repeatedly, and with a show of conscious triumph, exclaims, "If people would but honestly face history they would see what Christ has done for the world," "If you only consult history you will realize how uninterruptedly God has been fulfilling himself"; but though the reverend gentleman makes ever so many confident appeals to history, he seldom dares to make literal citations from it. Dr. Forsyth, however, is veracious and discreet enough to confess that history is, at best, but a doubtful witness for God, there being in it "a dim mixture of his ways and our ways." No; history, at any rate, is not one of the data upon which the belief in the justice and goodness of the Divine Being can be verified. Brought to the bar of human reason and conscience, or, in other words, brought to the bar of history as interpreted in the light of human reason and conscience, God neither is nor can be justified. Dr. Forsyth, by making such admissions, makes it clear that even to the theologian the construction of an adequate theodicy is in no sense a simple undertaking.

The chief obstacles which lie across the apologist's path are not scientific but social. Scientific discoveries have swept away supernatural beliefs not a few, such as the Mosaic cosmogony, the inerrancy of the Bible, and the theological view of death; but the most cogent of all arguments against the existence of God is derived from the conditions of social life at which Christianity has winked in all generations. The fact that man's injustice to man has been allowed to exist throughout the ages is an insuperable barrier flung across the road pursued by the apologist. All the dogmas which science has discredited are now regarded by the theologians as entirely non-essential, the disappearance of which has been a gain rather than a loss; but the continued existence of the evils from which society has always suffered, and in consequence of which it has now been overtaken by the most dreadful calamity, discredits not a dogma here and there which may or may not be essential, but the entire Christian system. This being the case, Dr. Forsyth is forcibly driven to the following conclusion:—

> It will then be found that the justification of God to man is not possible except to the conscience of man as justified by God. We have God's justice as a gift and not as a conclusion. God vindicates his justice by saving man from the doubt of it, and not by demonstrating to him the truth of it.

Such is Principal Forsyth's theodicy as condensed in the Preface to his book. The sum and substance of all he says is that, to the natural man, the justification of God is impossible. Judged by unaided human reason his ways are not equal, his government of the world is a total failure, the argument being: "If he has power to stop these things and does not he is not good; if he is good, and does not, he has not power." This argument never has been and never can be refuted; and Dr. Forsyth does not even try to meet it. He says: "The only vindicator of God is God," only he never acts the part. Had God been his own justifier there would have been no need of such a book as this one which the Hackney College divine has seen fit to publish. God has never undertaken his own defence, with the result that his self-appointed champions are never tired of issuing apologias on his behalf, not one of which can be pronounced in the least degree adequate. Fancy a man in his senses saying that "God's method with evil is not prevention but cure"; but the fact that stares us in the face is that God neither prevents nor cures it. Evil is with us now, and seems to exercise a completer sway than ever. What is the difference between a Christian and a non-Christian? The former believes against evidence that God is just and good, while the latter is convinced by irrefragable proofs that there is no God at all. On the Principal's own showing, God never demonstrates the truth of his own justice, but saves man from doubting it, thus verifying Tennyson's well-known line—

> We have but faith, we cannot know.

While this frightful War is raging at the top of its fury, the believer can only exclaim: "In spite of all these indescribable horrors and abominations I am convinced that a God of infinite justice and love is over-ruling them so that they shall hasten the coming of his own glorious kingdom.

J. T. Lloyd.

It surely is far sweeter and more wise
To water love, than toil to leave anon
A name whose glory-gleam will but advise
Invidious minds to quench it with their own,
And over which the kindliest will but stay
A moment, musing, "He, too, had his day!"

—Thomas Hardy.

The Leicester Secular Society.

We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson, Pioneers! O Pioneers! —Walt Whitman.

Rough work, Iconoclasm, but the only way to get at truth.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Pioneers and apostles are ever prophets. Swinburne saw and sang "A Vision of Spring in Midwinter," and long before that Shelley asked the question: "If winter comes can spring be far behind?" Happy are the pioneers who can ignore the mistakes of the past and the present, and fix their gaze on the promise of the future. For them the darkest night is jewelled with the brightest of stars. For them there is a budding to-morrow in every midnight. For them there is nothing irrevocable, for their eyes are ever looking forward.

Even the pioneers who are not poets possess this fervent belief in the future. Hissed at by the superior people, stoned by the vulgar, they have a hard road to travel. Perhaps the hardest of their trials is that of seeing charlatans ride by in their carriages, or, in other words, to mark the success of humbug and chicanery whilst they find that intellectual honesty is not a paying career. Yet good and true men and women have had to submit to this treatment. Charles Bradlaugh, prematurely aged by his many years' struggle for liberty, saw honours showered on men not fit to black his boots; Francisco Ferrer, fronting the rifles of the soldiers of Authority, had to find his triumph in his own heart; George Foote had to listen to the mocking voice of the Christian judge telling him that he had devoted his great talents to the services of the Devil. Yet in their hours of apparent failure these men had triumphed. They were martyrs who missed the palm, but not the pains and penalties of martyrdom, heroes without the laurels, and conquerors without the jubilation of victory. Labouring not for themselves, but for the world and for coming generations, for them shall be influence as far-reaching as the utmost reach of the great wave whose crest they sometimes were.

Now and again the work of the pioneers comes to fruition within a shorter space. Such, for example, is the record of the work of the Leicester Secular Society, which recently celebrated its thirty-sixth anniversary. Its history is a veritable romance, and dates back to the "stormy forties" of the past century. It is a noble record of small beginnings, of struggles, and of ultimate brilliant victory. The Society sprang from a discussion class held in the Mechanics' Institution, originated and animated by George Bown, one of the small band of pioneers who carried the flag of Liberty in those dark days. Among the young men who gathered about him was Josiah Gimson, the father of Sidney Gimson. The intellectual subjects discussed in the class soon became the talk of the town. Afterwards a school was carried on during the week, with lectures on Sundays, and a lending library was formed. The advanced views of progressive thinkers were discussed constantly, and Leicester thus had the opportunity of listening to new thoughts, and of widening her mental horizon. Out of this evolving institution, which readily adapted itself to changing circumstances in 1873, was organized the Secular Hall Company, and the site of the present hall was purchased. Eight years later the hall was completed from the designs of W. Larner Sugden, one of whose hobbies was the publication of pretty little booklets of a Freethought character. It is a handsome structure on one of the best streets of Leicester, with ample accommodation for improvement and pleasure.

The opening took place on the first Sunday in March, 1881, and a large number of notable Freethinkers were present from all parts. That sombre genius, James

Digitized by Google

Thomson, contributed a poetic address at the opening of the hall. A few lines are well worth quotation, for they show the vigorous Freethought of the poet, whose talents have won for him an imperishable name in his country's literature :—

> So, all the lands wherein our wandering race
> Have led their flocks, or fixed their dwelling-place,
> To till with patient toil the fruitful sod,
> Abound with altars to the unknown god
> Or gods, whom man created from of old,
> In his own image, one yet manifold,
> And ignorantly worshipped. We now dare,
> Taught by millenniums of barren prayer,
> Of mutual scorn and hate and bloody strife,
> With which these dreams have poisoned our poor life,
> To build our temples on another plan,
> Devoting them to god's creator, man ;
> Not to man's creature, god. And thus, indeed,
> All men and women, of whatever creed,
> We welcome gladly if they love their kind ;
> No other valid test of worth we find.
> Who loveth not his brother at his side,
> How can he love a dim dream deified ?

Another illustrious name associated with the Leicester Secular Society is that of Professor Huxley, the world-famous scientist. Not only was he in agreement with the objects of the organization, but he was one of the financial supporters. In enclosing a cheque in support of the Society, Huxley said it was sent "in evidence of the full sympathy with the objects of the Society." To a request for permission to publish the note, he replied : "You are quite at liberty to publish my note, and I shall be glad if it is of any service." This record places Huxley in complete accord with the principles of Secularism, and should clear away much misapprehension on the subject.

The importance and far-reaching nature of the Leicester Movement will thus be understood. For near two generations it has spread Secular principles far and wide, and still maintains a vigorous propaganda, including a Sunday-school for the children. We thus see that, give Secularism a fair field, it will show its true adaptation to human needs and welfare.

In the hall are the portraits of Charles Bradlaugh, George Jacob Holyoake, and Josiah Gimson. The name and fame of the last-named can never be forgotten in the history of this Society, or even in the record of the Secular Movement. He was one of its founders, and a most generous supporter. At his death, in 1883, he bequeathed, in maintenance of the institution, an income of one hundred pounds annually for ten years.

The lesson to be drawn from the inspiring record of Leicester is that "Unity is strength." Forgetting trivial distinctions in the face of entrenched ecclesiasticism, these brave Freethinkers have closed their ranks and stood shoulder to shoulder against the common enemy. It is precisely because the hearts of these dauntless pioneers were aflame with human sympathy that their work has had vital and permanent effect. They deserved well of their generation, for they did their best to hasten the day when the world will be one country and to do good the only religion.

BIBLE MORALS.

How little good and bad conduct were associated in thought with the intrinsic natures of right and wrong, and how completely they were associated in thought with obedience and disobedience to Jahveh, we see in the facts that prosperity and increase of population were promised as rewards of allegiance ; while there was punishment for such non-ethical disobediences as omitting circumcision or numbering the people.—Herbert Spencer, "Principles of Ethics."

The Mechanism of Man.

II.

The skin of the human body is composed of two layers. The skin's external layer is the epidermis, and is distinguished from the internal layer—the dermis—by its greater transparency, rigidity, and thinness. The epidermis is made up of epithelial cells lying in close contact. The inner layer of the skin is a complex woven mass of connective tissue, and appears under the microscope as a medley of blood vessels, lymphatics or absorbent vessels, sweat and oil glands, nerves, and hair roots. The dermis is, therefore of much greater moment to the organism than the epidermis.

The epidermis is composed of a mass of cells bound together by a cement-like substance, similar to the white of egg. Epidermic cells situated on the surface are hard and flattened. These are dead cells, and are removed by washing the body or cleansing the hair. The scurf, which we brush from the scalp, or remove when we bathe the skin, is simply the worn-out cellular material which has been thrust out by the active cells of the dermis, so that it is no longer nourished, and, therefore, dies. But quite unlike these epidermal cells, the dermal cells are soft and circular. They are living and growing cells, and as they multiply they replace the cells of the surface skin-layer, and thus maintain the epidermis.

In the deeper layers of the epidermis, grains of colouring material or pigment are present. Pigment differs from ordinary epidermal cells in possessing the property of absorbing and arresting light. In animals where the normal amount of pigment is present the usual colours peculiar to the species are displayed. But in abnormal instances where the pigment is absent, albinism is manifested. Organisms devoid of pigment have pale skins and pink eyes, for the absence of pigment in the iris permits the blood vessels of the eye to become visible. In one of the leading exhibits in the Natural History Museum in London various examples of albinism may be seen which range from white ravens, crows, and blackbirds, to white, or extremely pallid moles, mice, and frogs. A tropical climate seems favourable to the development of pigment, and the native races are darker there than elsewhere. There appears to exist a tendency towards the darkening of the skin among the European settlers in the sunnier regions of America, while the fair Norwegian affords an illustration of an adaptation to colder and less sunlit surroundings.

The hair of our heads and bodies arises from a sac or follicle. Vascular vessels and a nerve fibre run to the bulb or root from which a hair springs. The hair continues to grow so long as its papilla or bulb lives. It not only serves to keep the head warm, but it also provides protection to the brain. In the lower mammals and with savage man the hair is useful as a protective covering to various important areas of the body. Oil glands discharge their secretions into the hair pits or follicles. These glands elaborate oil from the blood. The oil produces the glossiness of the hair, and prevents undue dryness and hardness in the skin.

In common with the hair bulbs the sweat glands lie entrenched in the deeper parts of the dermis, and assume the appearance of a tube coiled into a ball. This tube passes as a duct through the two skin layers and emerges at the surface as a pore. Perspiration in average circumstances evaporates as readily as it flows from the pores, but at moments of unusual exertion, or in hot weather, it pours out very rapidly, and then forms into beads or drops. This sweat is chiefly water, but it holds in solution several salts with a trace of urea. The blood, which circulates in a network of small vessels around the sweat gland furnishes the material for the perspiration. Nervous subjects are more prone to blush or perspire than the more self-possessed. The nervous system controls sweating in two ways. Certain nerves regulate the activity of the epithelial cells which coat the gland, while other nerves regulate the diameter of the vessels which supply the gland with blood.

Digitized by Google

It is an obvious inference from the foregoing that a clean skin is conducive to health. It is a plain verity that "A bath is to the skin what gymnastic exercises are to the muscles." The muscular walls of the blood-vessels, with their nerves exercising authority over them, crave activity in company with the other organs of the body.

When wild in woods the early savage ran, his skin was bare to all the winds that blew. He was probably not so much addicted to the bath as were the old Romans, but his constant exposure to the sun, the rain, and the breeze helped to invigorate and healthen his skin. Many modern Europeans to whom ordinary ablutions were not unknown have experienced utter astonishment as the dirt ran from their bodies during their first Turkish bath. Heavy underclothing, combined with the absence of open-air exercise, allow our sweat-glands to become quite clogged. Hence the hygienic value of tepid or cold baths. These promote the physiological activities of the dermal structures, and assist in maintaining in healthy action the pores of the skin. Even the dingy London sparrow, that Arab among birds, delights in washing, even in dirty water; while that most intelligent mammal, the elephant, is fond of showering water over his body with his trunk.

The kidneys are highly important organs of the body. Situated on each side of the spinal column, in the lumbar region—the small of the back—they extend a little above the level of the waist. Shaped in the form of a bean, their length is about four inches. They are attached to the rear wall of the abdominal cavity. One artery travels to each kidney, and becomes distributed into minute vessels or capillaries, and these encircle the tubules of the kidney. A secretion in which impurities of the blood are suspended is constantly being lodged within the tubules, and these convey it to a funnel-like cavity at the kidney's inner edge. Proceeding from this receptacle is a tube termed the ureter, which passes along to a storage organ in the pelvis. This organ is the bladder, which must be emptied from time to time. There is ample accommodation for the free flow of liquid from the ureters—one from each kidney—into the bladder, and from that organ into the urethra, and for its final expulsion from the body. There is, however, this reservation. Arranged circularly around the neck of the bladder, at its junction with the urethra, there are certain muscular fibres forming the sphincter, which are usually in a contracted state, and thus function to close the bladder's exit while the remaining muscular fibres of the organ are relaxed.

At given moments, however, this state of affairs becomes reversed. Then the walls of the bladder contract and its sphincter relaxes, and thus the urine is discharged. This latter process is intermittent, but the excretion itself is constant. The urinary fluid is driven drop by drop "along the ureters by rhythmic contractions which pass along their walls in the direction of the bladder, where it accumulates, until its quantity is sufficient to give rise to the uneasy sensations which compel its expulsion" (Barcroft).

The fluid holding the nitrogenous waste materials of the organism varies with the amount of liquid imbibed, and with the skin's activities. The lungs assist the skin and kidneys in eliminating superfluous moisture, while the kidneys are almost entirely responsible for the excretion of certain mineral salts and a white crystalline substance termed urea. When retained in the body, urea proves very detrimental. This product is largely responsible for rheumatism, head troubles, and other ailments. Nitrogen is introduced into the animal system as protein food, and almost all of this element is expelled from the body in the form of urea. It is worth recalling that urea was the first animal product artificially elaborated in the chemical laboratory from inorganic (non-living) substances.

A report reaches us that religion is a feature of the National Federation of Discharged and Demobilized Sailors and Soldiers. We are loth to believe the report, but it may well be that, in some of the Branches, one or two fanatics may try to introduce their anti-social ideas. If we might give advice, we would say to the members, "Destroy the infamous" while it is small and weak, and so prevent future troubles, leaving a free and untrammelled field for the social and intellectual welfare of all connected with the cause for which the Federation stands. Belief in the supernatural is a weed-like growth, and, like all noxious growths, if not kept under, will quickly overrun and destroy the beneficial plants of humanity.

The dear clergy like to pose as belonging to an overworked profession, but the social activities of the bishops and higher clergy do not lend support to the view. By the death of the Rev. C. W. Holditch, Vicar of Warrington, the interesting fact is revealed there have been only two vicars of the parish in 107 years. Evidently, these two clergymen were not cut off in their prime by overwork.

A pocket guide to the May Meetings contains a list of 404 fixtures to be held in London. Christian loquaciousness has not lessened since Lord Macaulay remarked sarcastically that "Exeter Hall sends forth its annual bray."

Canon Burroughs, of Peterborough, says that a Chaplain at the Front had written to him that "to the layman denominations are damned nonsense." That Army Chaplain is learning things at the back of the Front.

A religious contemporary says that the first duty of a poor Christian is to suffer and obey. Just so! And if he only obeys, the autocracy will see that he suffers.

"There is a very great shortage of biscuits," says a daily paper, and posters advise the public to "eat less bread." Perhaps the dear clergy will take the hint, and dispense with wafers and bread in their services.

"Our novelists ought to write for the young citizens of both sexes," declares Mr. James Douglas, who is old enough to know better. For whom, does Mr. Douglas think, the "smooth tales, generally of love," are written? The dear clergy agree with Mr. Douglas, but they also thrust the Bible into the hands of "young citizens," and the Bible is the bluest of blue books.

The War is teaching the clergy that there are many heresies mixed with the orthodoxies of the ordinary Christian, even after centuries of clerical teaching. Principal Forsyth, for instance, is astonished that average Christians display "far more passion to see their dead than to know Christ." The wish is not so unreasonable after all. Surely a mother would wish to see her own son rather than an Oriental preacher she had never been introduced to.

Principal P. T. Forsyth has written a new book, This Life and the Next, in which he trounces the Spiritualists. He is also out of patience with those Christians who seek to communicate with the dead through mediums. It is the old, old story of the disagreement of rival tradesmen.

Present-day novelists make a great display of originality, but there is precious little fundamental brain work in their books. Conan Doyle, Wells, and others have tickled the ears of the groundlings with their romantic views on theology, and other writers of fiction follow dutifully like a flock of sheep. There is a Spiritualistic element in Sir H. Rider Haggard's new story, Love Eternal, and the villain of the story is a parson. Rider Haggard had better be careful or he will be excommunicated by the dear clergy, who have great weight on the committees of "free" libraries.

The Archdeacon of London says that all sincere prayer is answered, either by "Yes," "No," or "wait." How does this apply to the prayer asking that our legislators may have "grace, wisdom, and understanding"?

"The Army of Movement"—The Church Army which is too proud to fight, but valiantly defends the communion-port.

The charges for getting hair cut have recently gone up. Pious folk may adopt the style of hair-dressing favoured by the Twelve Disciples—in pictures.

Mr. Moses Brain, of Warmley, who is a Sunday-school superintendent, has celebrated his hundredth birthday, and the newspapers are recording the pleasing fact. It is only reasonable that Christians should make the most of what Brains they possess.

What quaint ideas religious folk have! A Sunday paper reminds its readers that "the Devil is a mighty fighter," and a daily editor prints a headline referring to the soldiers: "Fought like Demons." One would imagine that both periodicals were published in the South Sea Islands, and not in the capital of a civilized nation.

The clergy pretend that they receive their call from "on high." The following paragraph from a daily paper is therefore interesting: "Canon Adderley has accepted the living of St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden, which is in the gift of the Duke of Bedford." In this instance the call was no higher than the Peerage.

In order to save space, newspaper editors are condensing information into single-line paragraphs. Sometimes the result is humorous, as in the following, which appeared next to each other: "The Archbishop of Canterbury is 70 to-day. Vesuvius is in eruption."

"I do not know a single Churchman who has been a conscientious objector," says the Bishop of London. Few people, however, expect to find consciences among the followers of the Government religion.

One of the great doctrines of the Christian Church is that of justification by faith, which means that a guilty sinner, if he only believes in Christ, may be pronounced innocent. But Principal Forsyth has just introduced a new dogma, which he calls the Justification of God. The Supreme Being, too, is a guilty sinner in the estimation of thousands, but he, also, may be justified by the faith of those who trust and love him. The one justification is as much a figment of the religious imagination as the other, and both immoral.

The Canadian Government has passed an Order in Council asking the Imperial Government not to create any more hereditary titles for Canada. We wonder when the flunkeyism of our own House of Commons will lead it to pass a similar resolution. As matters are at present, a title is almost an insult to a man of worth, and a slur on the nation when it is given to a man of un-worth.

Principal W. B. Selbie says: "When spiritual ends are to be gained no price is too high." This may account for the fact that poor laymen permit thirty-nine archbishops and bishops to share £180,700 annually.

Dr. Colin Simpson, an Aberdeen doctor, who has served with the soldiers since the outbreak of war, has performed 2,000 operations, treated 38,000 wounded, and superintended 47,000 dressings. This is better work than that of the Army Chaplains, who conduct "divine service" at a safe distance from the fighting front.

The Founder of the Christian religion said, "Woe unto ye rich," but the dear clergy are quite willing to take their chances. The late Canon Hawkins left estate of the value of £29,177, a sum sufficient to keep him in the place where there is no winter.

A religious contemporary says that the present World-War is "the world's Calvary." Our contemporary might have added that mankind was being crucified between the two thieves—Kingcraft and Priestcraft.

Mr. John Oxenham, a minor novelist, whose articles lighten the solemnity of a weekly newspaper, says that, prior to the War, "as a nation we were dropping God out of our reckoning." Bless his innocent heart! Does he think that a nation of Atheists would maintain 50,000 parsons and build churches?

In a leading article, the dear Daily News says that "In Egypt the priests were custodians of everything, knowledge, wealth, power." The editor might have noticed the same phenomenon nearer home. In this country they are the "custodians" of everything they can get their saintly hands on.

A new and original hymn "for those in peril in the air" has been written and composed by two enthusiastic Churchmen. We hope that it will not displace the old favourite, "There's a friend for little children, up above the bright, blue sky."

The sacred side-shows in the Holy Land are well patronized by the soldiers, so the Times assures its readers. "All who can, visit the Church of the Nativity," writes the correspondent in Jerusalem. We rather fancy that correspondent is an Army chaplain.

A Sonnet.

To a Christian Child.

Oh, Thomas Jones, why dost thou stand and cry?
(I need not ask you why you do not sit)
Your punishment was only meet and fit
As witnesseth the law of God on high.
For as your teacher saw your grandsire lie
Sodden with liquor, and devoid of wit,
Last night; why, then, to-day, his cane did hit
Your flesh with sanction from the very sky.
For He who gave the laws to Moses sware
That if one sinned, his son, and his son's son,
Should feel the weight of His destroying might.
Why dost thou, then, a doleful visage wear,
And murmur now that justice has been done?
"Shall not the Judge of all the Earth do right?"

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 21, Goldthorpe; May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—April 28, Nuneaton.

T. O. Harding.—Thanks for cuttings. The "miracle" of the Virgin of Albert ought to be dead now; but one never knows. If it pleases some other politician, or journalist, or pietist to tell the lie, he will certainly do it. While there are fools there will always be knaves to trade on their folly.

A. J. Marriott.—We quite agree with your opinion as to who is the "villain of the piece." But what a commentary on the calibre of the British public!

S. Cottart (Sergt.)—We are sending you on Freethinker, with other literature, for distributton.

J. Breese.—You will see next week we have acted on your suggestion. Hope the change of residence will be beneficial.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street. London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen visits the new Goldthorpe Branch to-day (April 21), and lectures there in the Empire Palace. The morning lecture, at 10.30, is on "Christianity and the Logic of Life"; evening, at 6.30, "Why Atheism is Inevitable." The local friends are expecting large meetings, and we hope they will not be disappointed.

A Correspondent writes:—

> I have been visiting friends at a Surrey village who have a son six years of age. This child attends the village church, the incumbent being a parson named Longley, who, each week, gives the children texts to learn for the following Sunday. Imagine my surprise when I ascertained that the text for this child to learn was: "Thou shalt not commit adultery." I protested against the six-year-older being compelled to repeat such stuff, but was informed by his guardian that he would have to get it by heart, otherwise he would have a whipping and be sent to bed without any tea, which forced me to the conclusion that there is as much ignorance in the villages as ever there was.

The subject of Determinism is not really a difficult question to master, provided the issue is fairly stated, and the terms employed used with care and accuracy. In The Problem of the Will (Watts & Co., 9d.) Sir George Greenwood supplies a very effective answer to many of the false issues raised by opponents of Determinism, and, in so doing, places the subject in its proper relation to morals and sociology. Sir George properly emphasizes the truth that the whole essence of Determinism is the application of the principle of causation to human conduct. And once that is grasped, its opposite, the denial of causation, is seen to be downright lunacy. We can safely commend The Problem of the Will to all interested in the subject.

Another work, issued by Messrs. Watts & Co., is The Popes and their Church, by Joseph McCabe, price 6s. The first part deals with the history of the Papacy, the second with the position and influence of the Roman Church to-day. The first portion strikes us as being too compressed to quite do justice to the subject. The second part is more satisfactory, and it is a phase of the conflict between Freethought and Supernaturalism with which all should be familiar. After all, there is nothing worse than underrating one's enemy, unless it is to mistake one's enemy. And the Roman Church represents by far the strongest, and the best organized enemy that Freethought has. Mr. McCabe, as usual, makes effective play with his own experience within the Catholic Church.

Mr. William Romaine Patterson (better known, perhaps, under the pen-name of "Benjamin Swift") publishes—also through Watts & Co.—The Credentials of Faith: a Conversation on Religion (4d. net). The speakers are a clergyman and a sceptic, and within a small compass many of the questions with which Freethinkers are concerned are discussed. We are glad to see Mr. Patterson combating that popular delusion—popular even with Freethinkers—that, religiously, Christianity represented an advance. It did not. It was a retrogression, here as elsewhere. The pamphlet is a small one, but "meaty."

We are asked to announce that an "important" business meeting of the Glasgow Branch will be held in the Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram Street, on April 21, at 12 noon.

Two very satisfactory meetings were held last Sunday at Liverpool by Mr. Cohen. In the evening the hall was rather inconveniently crowded, and the opposition led to its being rather late before a conclusion was reached. But everyone seemed in high good humour, and so all ended well.

Argument.

O stormy winds of argument,
How ruthlessly ye blow!
In whirling up the blinding dust,
Accumulated by the rust
Of thoughts formed long ago,
Ye cause mine eyes to lose their trust
In paths they do not know!

O stormy winds of argument,
Ye fill mine ears with pain!
Not that ye make them truly ache;
But gusty truths delight to take
On wings unto my brain;
Whereby I gather thoughts which make
My childlike faith complain.

Yet, stormy winds of argument,
Why should I thus bemoan?
Though ill winds blow no good, as said,
Your winds of robust thought have spread
Their seeds of knowledge sown
In soil on which your rains are shed—
Where wisdom-trees are grown.

Come, stormy winds of argument,
I'll face each lusty gale!
With mind well fixed on solid fact,
Stout Reason makes his sure compact
With Truth, who does not fail
In leaving wisdom-trees intact
Where arguments prevail.

The Soul of a Dog.

One summer evening last year, accompanied by my faithful dog, I wandered into one of our many parks in South London, and came across a group of elderly men who were discussing a variety of topics. I listened for awhile, until one, who looked like an old-fashioned Scripture-reader, introduced a subject upon which I was deeply interested, and then I thought it was time for me to join in the discussion. Several times I heard the name of "Tom Paine" mentioned by the speaker, and once I heard him declare that Paine was a confirmed Atheist, and that he died a miserable death, recanting at the last moment, and calling upon God to destroy all his blasphemous writings that had done so much to contaminate the minds of the rising generation. Although I had heard these Christian lies many times before, I felt very indignant at the wretched misrepresentation of the views of Thomas Paine and the calumny of his alleged death-bed recantation, and I undertook on the spot to produce, on the following evening, Thomas Paine's Age of Reason, and to show that the author was not only "not an Atheist, but a sincere believer in God and a future life." When the group of "grave and reverend signiors" heard this, they were astonished, and begged of me to tell them something more about Thomas Paine; and when I went on to tell them that Paine was one of the greatest and noblest men this country had ever produced, they began to feel a keen interest in the subject, and sat with open mouths while I recounted some of the more important incidents in his great career. I told them that Thomas Paine had taken part in two Revolutions—one which gave America her independence, and the other in France, in which Louis XIV. lost his head. Further, I told them that if Thomas Paine had not written his famous work, the Age of Reason, in which he tried to prove the existence of a God who was less capricious and more just than the God of the Bible, he would probably have been regarded in America as one of the greatest patriots and political philosophers in the English-speaking world. But he paid the penalty for speaking and writing what he believed to be the truth on religion by being ostracized and persecuted by all the priests and parsons and bigots of Christendom.

When the little group of listeners heard this, they, with one exception—that of the parsonic-looking gentleman who had calumniated the character of my hero—proclaimed that it was a great big shame, in a sentence in which a big D played an important part, and expressed their agreement with me that Christians never recognized talent nor nobility of character in men who were outside the pale of their narrow creed.

"Ah, but," said the Pecksniffian representative of the Christian religion, "if Tom Paine was not an Atheist, Bradlaugh was, and he believed that man died like a dog, and that there was no hope for the future for any of us."

I retorted that "at all events, Charles Bradlaugh did not believe in hell, and that if the Christian religion was true, the future prospect of most men was to pass an eternity in that warm place, where the Devil appeared to be engaged as the permanent stoker."

To this the Christian gentleman replied in one word, "Blasphemy!" which he repeated several times.

At this juncture my faithful dog came from under the seat, and that reminded me that I had something to say in reply to the statement of man dying like a dog.

"Did you ever see a dog die?" I asked of the whole group, and without waiting for an answer, I said, "Well, I have. The dog I had before this little terrier—a fine, large collie—was poisoned by some callous wretch, and I shall never forget the pathetic look he gave me just before he expired. It was pitiful to behold, and I shall never forget that look 'while memory holds a seat in this distracted globe,' as Hamlet says. Never!"

"Yes," said one of the group, who had been a sailor, "I can confirm that, for I've had several dogs in my time, and they die just like an ordinary human being—in fact, just like a Christian."

"Better than a good many Christians," I exclaimed, "many of whom die with the fear of hell before their eyes, whereas a dog goes into the everlasting sleep with no fear respecting the future."

When I said this, the narrow-minded Christian before mentioned got up and left the company, and shook off the dust of his feet in disgust. So I continued to harangue the company without further interruption.

"Yes, my friends," I said, "my little dog deserves to live again as much as any Christian; and if the soul of a dog is associated with its brain, then, I think, it can be demonstrated that the soul of a dog is just as likely to be immortal as the soul of a man."

"Indeed, in some countries, when a child dies they bury a dog with him. What for, you may ask? Well they think that when the child arises on the day of the resurrection he will not know his way about, will not be able, in fact, to find his way to heaven without the guidance of the dog."

"Well, I never heard that before," said one of the group.

"It's a fact nevertheless. Now, it is admitted that if a man has a soul, it must be associated with the brain—the intelligence. My little dog has plenty of intelligence and a marvellous memory. He knows Sunday from all other days, and though he never attempts to come out with me on the morning of any other day of the week, because he knows I go to business, he is always ready and eager to go out with me on Sunday for my mornings ramble in the park."

"Look at that," exclaimed one of the group, "just like my dog."

"Now memory is the basis of all reasoning."

"A man takes perception of objects about him, arranges his perceptions in his mind, and judges between two or more perceptions. A dog does just the same, but if a man or a dog did not remember their perceptions they would not be able to carry out this process of thought—in other words they would not be able to display the intelligence they do. Are we agreed on that?"

"Yes," I think so," said one of the group who had been an engine driver. "I have seen much evidence of great intelligence in dogs."

"Well, then," I continued, "most scientific men agree that the difference between the intelligence of men and dogs is only one of degree. And where are you going to draw the line and give an immortal soul to the man with a large brain, and no soul to an intelligent dog with a lesser brain, but much intelligence. No, it will not do. And, finally, think what a fine animal a dog may be, how faithful and how heroic. We have all heard the story of the dog—the noble Beth Gelert—who saved a child from the ravenous fangs of a wolf, and the pitiful look he gave his master when he slew him, because he found blood upon his mouth, and could not at first find the child, or perhaps you have read the dramatic story of a dog told by my friend Geo. R. Sims in one of his Dagonet Ballads, entitled "Told to a Missionary." The dog was taken down to the canal by his master with the object of drowning her, but by some accident the master fell in and would have been drowned but for the faithful bitch rescuing him just at the critical moment."

"Yes, gentlemen, and I could tell you many more stories of noble deeds performed by dogs if I had time at my disposal.

"But do you really believe that dogs have souls and will live again?" asked one old gentleman of the group who had been listening most intently to the argument and the stories.

"No; I do not say that. What I do say is, that the same arguments that are used by Christians to show that man possesses an immortal soul, are equally good to show that a dog possesses an immortal soul also, and, in many cases, the nobility of his conduct entitles him to live again."

"Enough! I will tell you some more stories about dogs when next we meet. Gentlemen, good evening!"

Writers and Readers.

"In the dazzling diadem of Freethought, which stretches from Desperiers to Remy de Gourmont, there is no jewel more glorious, more resplendent, than Rabelais, the immortal son of an obscure innkeeper of Chinon." I must hasten to assure the reader that I am not quoting from myself, but from an ingenuous young friend of mine, whose glowing enthusiasm is apt to get in the way of his critical judgment, and who, I imagine, has not always more than a bowing acquaintance with the subjects of his indiscriminating eulogy. No doubt I shall be told that there is really some excuse for an English reader's ignorance of Rabelais. Translations in a handy form are difficult to come by. There is, of course, the ill-printed, paper-covered, and bulky volumes exhibited in the window of the bookseller of malodorous reputation, usually flanked by the so-called Complete Works of a great Greek philosopher, and fiction of the ultramarine, aphrodisiac school. For the book-lover with the average amount of self-respect, such an edition is an eyesore, an abomination; it is much worse than none at all. I remember, as a boy, reading Rabelais for the first time in English, in an edition carefully "Bowdlerized" by that sympathetic if not very accurate scholar, Henry Morley. It has been out of print for a long time. Something of this kind, however, is needed if Rabelais is to be put in the hands of young people; and even for those of us who are familiar with the original, a purified version has a charm of its own. Obscenity is usually more tedious than amusing. Still, a Rabelais without the grossness is only half a Rabelais. You must read the whole of him if you want to get the strong characteristic flavour. The smell of him is worse than the taste, like a Limburger cheese. There used to be an edition issued by Chatto and Windus, with illustrations by Dore, but it is now out of print. Like the same publisher's Boccaccio, it was not a scholarly book. The version used was that of Urquhart (1653), and Motteux (1693). By the way, it is a common literary delusion that old translations are always the best; most people will tell you that the only translation of Montaigne is Florio's (1603), yet it is no more like Montaigne than Mr. Bernard Shaw is like Moliere. The best version of Rabelais is a modern one, made by a distinguished Cambridge scholar, Mr. W. F. Smith, who has the good sense not to try, as the older translators did, to improve upon the original. This version, with a companion volume, Rabelais in his Writings, just issued by the Cambridge University Press, will help both the student and the general reader to clearer notions on the subject.

. . . . .

Like all great men who have appealed strongly to the popular imagination, and who have attracted the enmity of the malevolent, Rabelais has his myth or legend. The traditional date of his birth, although even now accepted by the illiterate, was long ago proved impossible. Instead of 1483, it was somewhere between 1490 and 1495. He was just as certainly not the son of an innkeeper. This was a lying invention of the holy and pious water-drinkers of the times, who were scandalized by Rabelais' constant association of wine and veracity, and his suggestion of a complimentary proverb, in aqua mendacitas: and it is not impossible that our Protestant water-fanatics are even now inventing a legendary potman for the father of Mr. G. K. Chesterton. In fact, Rabelais' father was a lawyer, a landed proprietor in Chinonais, who was the owner of a house in Chinon which was afterwards (1590) turned into an inn called "The Lamprey." But legend did not stop at his birth; it went on to the day of his death.

. . . . .

The attack came from three sides; he was abused by the monks, the Reformed clergy, and the Rousard group of poets. The monks were furious with the apostate, as they called him, for exposing their ignorance and gross viciousness. In 1547, a Benedictine, one Gabriel des Puits Herbault, fell foul of him in a scurrilous pamphlet. "This plague-spreading monster," he calls him, "this art-master of every unmentionable kind of debauchery, more impious than the Genevan Atheists; this miserable wine-bibber and glutton, soiled with unspeakable vices of those filthy heathen Greeks." If the monks were inarticulate with rage, the Reformers were coldly virulent, and attacked without anger their ancient ally against Rome, monasticism, and the philosophy of the schoolmen. In 1550 he had the honour of a place in Calvin's "Index Expurgatorius" (Tractatus de Scandaliis), while Ramus, a Rationalist of some importance in the history of thought, denounced him as an Atheist. Robert Estienne, the Humanist, reproached the Sorbonne with neglecting to burn the atheistic creator of Pantagruel. "He often enough amused himself by throwing stones into our garden," said Henri Estienne, who thoughtfully gave him a prominent place in the chapter of his Apology for Herodotus that deals with "Blasphemers." For the Protestant fanatics, Rabelais and his hero were two figures of Anti-Christ. The poet Ronsard and his friends were not less bitter than the raging monks and the coldly malevolent Calvinists. Rabelais had ridiculed unmercifully these stupid, if learned, innovators, who were trying to turn the graceful French language from its natural line of evolution by overlaying it with Greek words and phrases, and so converting it into an uncouth jargon. Although an ardent lover of the New Learning, the rediscovered literature of Greece, Rabelais refused to bow down before it in abject adoration.

. . . . .

The moment the death of Rabelais had relieved them of all fear of his derision and corrosive irony the three enemies formed a sort of Triple Alliance, and at once set about the pleasant task of inventing the legend of his last hours. The holy monkish liar who received his confession, solemnly and mendaciously asserted that Rabelais had passed away in a state of drunkenness. At the very last moment, we are told, he gathered together his strength for a final sarcasm, and exclaimed: "Draw the curtain, the farce is ended!" A similar phrase, however, is attributed to Augustus; but it is doubtful if the exclamation ever escaped the lips of a man at the point of death. It was obviously a man-of-letters that invented the famous last will and testament of Rabelais: "I possess nothing, I owe much, the remainder I bequeath to the poor." This amusing witticism may be found in a letter from Erasmus to Beda written in 1527 and, no doubt, was borrowed from someone else. When he was anointed with the holy oils he said to the priest that he was greasing his boots for the last long journey. This has the authentic, the characteristic flavour; but surely there is in it nothing of blasphemy. The "Great Perhaps" is very likely a Calvinistic invention to fasten on Rabelais a philosophic scepticism. He is a Montaigne sceptic only for those who have never put themselves to the trouble of reading him intelligently. In fine, we may be pretty certain that he accepted the inevitable with the serenity born of a natural good humour, and what is more than many of his enemies had, a conscience free from all remorse.

. . . . .

Was Rabelais a Freethinker? I imagine that there is little doubt he was not, at least, not in the meaning we now attach to the word. There is nothing to show that he did not believe in God, and little to show that he did not believe in a life after death. That he could ridicule the ignorance and coarseness, the greed and lubricity of the monkish rabble, that he could denounce monastic institutions as radically unsocial, is not sufficient proof that he was not a believing Catholic. The Roman Church then, as now, permits a good deal of latitude in the criticism of what it considers the non-essentials of the faith. Both the Protestant and the Freethinker are inclined to ignore or forget this essential fact, and to judge the standards of an earlier period by those of to-day, with the result that many a good Catholic is made to seem either a Protestant or a Freethinker. For Prof. Lounsbury, a literary man with a bias to Agnosticism, Chaucer is a sceptic in religion; other people, with an anti-Roman bias, see in him a leader of the Wickliffite revolt which heralded the breaking away of England from Rome. Both these opinions, to my thinking, are hopelessly wide of the mark, simply because they are not nourished by what I may call the sympathetic imagination. Too much is made of Chaucer's attack upon celibacy in the Wife of Bath's Tale, the Protestant commentators arguing as if it were a dogma of the Church, which of course, it is not. Rabelais, no more than Chaucer, attacked the fundamental dogmas of Christianity; and the more intelligent of the Roman clergy would never have dreamt of calling him an Atheist on the strength of his unseemly handling of sacred things. An Italian peasant will, in a fit of anger, couple so filthy an epithet with the Virgin Mary that even a Freethinker would be shocked. And yet he is devoutly religious. It is the Latin temperament which has in it more of Paganism than is readily admitted. Coleridge once noted a good illustration of the Latin attitude to religion:—

> This is a story from some old Spanish humourist which had by some strange oversight escaped the shears of the Inquisition. At the Sacrament, a priest gave, without perceiving it, a counter instead of a wafer. The communicant thinking it would melt, very patiently waited, but without effect. The priest seeing him hesitate, inquired what was the matter? "Matter," said he, "I hope you have not made a mistake and given me God the Father, he is so hard and tough there is no swallowing him."

Now such a story, I am inclined to think, did not "escape" the Inquisition, simply because the Spanish Inquisitors, unlike Coleridge, who, with all his philosophy, could not get rid of his Puritanism, could see in it nothing blasphemous. For the solemn Puritan type of mind God is above a joke, for Rabelais, he was probably the great Cosmic humourist—a Rabelais writ large.

* * * * *

Rabelais had no desire for the crown of martyrdom, and he was prepared to tone down some of his expressions. He felt that he would be more comfortable in his ordinary clothing than in a sheet of fire. He liked his jokes at superstition, but he was not so foolish as to pay too dear for them. As with all great creative artists, his philosophy lies deep down in his work, and the only way one can get at it is through the sympathetic imagination. Even then we may be reading our own ideas into it, as so many of us have done with Shakespeare.

A Building Made with Hands.

It is satisfactory to know that many State officials have a correct appreciation of their position towards the public generally; but, unfortunately, there are some who abuse their positions, and who are easily induced to figure at Christian functions. Statesmen, judges, sailors, and soldiers ought to be subject to one rule. They ought, by virtue of their offices and as servants of the State, to be debarred from appearing publicly on sectarian platforms. They must know that the country, with whose administrative interests they are entrusted, comprises thousands of citizens who do not believe in, or who are definitely hostile to, the Christian religion. Notwithstanding, several such officials have on various occasions succumbed to the persuasive blandishments of priest and parson, and thereby put an affront upon members of the community who repudiate the pretensions and presumptions of clericalism.

An example of such a lapse from official correctitude is to be found in the case of the Rt. Hon. Robert Munro, the Secretary for Scotland, who, on March 8, opened a new Y.M.C.A. building in Edinburgh. Accompanying him on the platform were divines representing the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Established Church of Scotland, and the United Free Church of Scotland; the Permanent Under Secretary for Scotland, an M.P., a Judge of the Supreme Court of Scotland, and others. At an evening meeting, the notorious Sir Arthur Yapp appeared, and sufficiently indicated the main function of the Y.M.C.A. in "that time of reconstruction towards which they were all looking forward. In that great period the red triangle might be the clearing-house—the communication trench for the Churches." We begin, pondering such an utterance as this, to see some light being shed upon the hitherto inexplicable lack of co-operation between the Scottish Churches and "General" Booth, who recently decided to make Scotland a "unit of the Salvation Army's life." The position is becoming clearer. At the function to which we have directed attention no mention was made of the Salvation Army; not a word was heard of "General" Booth's magnanimous succour for a Scotland fast falling from grace; not one humble private even of the Salvation Army was present to convey greetings to the Y.M.C.A. Is this, then, the solution? Has the Y.M.C.A., in the estimation of the clergy of Scotland, beaten the Salvation Army, in its utilization of the chances offered by the War, "to a frazzle"? Therefore, let us part company with the Band of Blood and Fire, and let us thank God for and put our trust in the Y.M.C.A.! Indeed, the Rev. Dr. Fisher, of the Established Church, recently went the length of saying that the Y.M.C.A. was just the Church under another name. At the function to which we are now referring, the Rev. Dr. Sclater, of the United Free Church, declared that suggestions of rivalry between the Church and the Y.M.C.A. were most ludicrous and fatuous, and that "the Y.M.C.A. was simply the Church in action." What, then, is the Church apart from the Y.M.C.A.; and what in the name of common sense must the Church have been before the Y.M.C.A. existed at all? Anyway, the parsons were unanimous in asserting that there was a "growing good understanding" between the Y.M.C.A. and the Church; and we may live to see Sir Arthur Yapp's vision of the red triangle as "the clearing-house—the communication trench for the Churches" realized. It certainly looks very much as if the writing on the wall, "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin," is appropriate in Scotland to the case of "General" Booth. The "General's" organization has been beaten by several heads by the old young sprinters of the Y M.C.A. The "General's" job is taken from him "and given unto another." The denouement is complete, and it is a staggering answer to the very much trumpeted mission of the "General" to Edinburgh but a few weeks ago.

Having gone out of his way to open this new Y.M.C.A. building in Edinburgh, the Secretary for Scotland went the whole hog in the matter of rhetorical recklessness. He "evened" (as they say in Scotland) the red triangle with the Red Cross in its works of generosity, sympathy, and mercy! He "thought he saw one of God's good gifts to us even in the midst of war." The War must needs be glorified because it has afforded opportunity for service by the clerically controlled Y.M.C.A.! "Mr. Munro," we read, "said that the War's annealing fires had cleansed and purged the world. They had burned off the dross and left us the pure gold." Can anyone conceive a statement less in accordance with actual facts than this? The War is daily impoverishing humanity in physical, intellectual, and moral respects. Are the agencies that caused or permitted the continuance of the evils which have culminated in this damnable, devitalizing, desolating, dehumanizing, demoralizing, and disintegrating War to be looked to to renovate the world—to eradicate the wrong and wretchedness of which they themselves are the authors and condoners? Are there no Freethinkers bearing arms in what they believe to be a campaign against tyranny? Are there no Freethinkers succouring the wounded and helping the bereaved? Has the Secretary for Scotland been informed that in connection with the Red Cross Department of the Army of our great Ally, America, there is an ambulance car named the "Robert Ingersoll" car? This we know with a certitude, which no amount of oratorical wealth can disprove, that it is solely because of its secular activities that the Y.M.C.A. has been of service. Christianity filches the virtues of humanism; but the thinking observer knows full well that they are stolen plumes.

We have no hesitation in claiming that the money spent on this new Y.M.C.A. building in Edinburgh is a piece of unnecessary extravagance in war time. In the issue of the Scotsman newspaper of March 9th, which reports the proceedings at the opening, there are ninety-nine churches advertising their "services" for Sunday, March 10. Many of these church buildings are well constructed and commodious, and scarcely ever used on six days of the week. Most of them could, at little expense, be adapted as hostels with reading, writing, smoking, recreation, and sleeping rooms. But there seems to be a section of the community which has a craving for faked shows, at which its members may have an opportunity of posing in the limelight as public benefactors, while they are really countenancing and indulging in reprehensible waste of good money. Multiplication of organizations, too, means multiplication of officials with comfortable salaries. Administration could be cheapened to an almost incredible extent if there was a central pooling of resources and energies, and if limits were put to mawkish, misdirected, and patronizing philanthropy which inevitably leads to lamentable overlapping and unhealthy emulation.

There was a glint of common sense in the middle of the address of the Secretary for Scotland—strangely at variance with the prediction of the egregious Yapp. Mr. Munro said that the service being rendered by the Y.M.C.A. "had shone like a lamp through the dark night of war—a lamp which would not be extinguished till day broke and the world was once more fair with the sunshine of peace." We trust Mr. Munro does not delude himself with the idea that war in every form will cease when peace dawns on a stricken world. All mens' energies will continue to be needed in war against ignorance, disease, poverty, and cruelty of all kinds and in all places. But the signs of the times furnish evidence that in that war of the future confidence will be placed in agencies that are purely humanistic in their constitution, operations, and aims. Agencies controlled and vitiated by religion will have found their graves in a forgotten past.

Ignotus.

War.

War-correspondents and artists are often severely blamed for picturing too clearly the real horrors of the battlefield, the ambulance, the hospital tent. What, then, shall we say of the rulers and statesmen who—for the most part wickedly and wantonly, on the one side, if not on both—safe themselves, set the tremendous machinery of these horrors in motion? What of the chivalrous heroes who hire themselves out to be always ready for the human butchery, be their country's cause just or unjust? What of the pious priests and prelates who render fervent public thanksgivings to their God of Love and Mercy when the slaughter has been exceedingly great, but greater of another people than their own? We exult and triumph in national actions whose inevitable consequences we cannot bear to look upon in the dim vague reflection of pictures or words. Unashamed of the deeds, we blench from their truthful record. Tender girls and women worship the scarlet at balls and reviews, while they shrink with abhorrence from the blood of which it is the proper flaming emblem, shrink with nausea from such far faint suggestions of the blood as red ink or red paint. As for the common Jingoes (we no longer need borrow chauvinists from the French, having by recent vile experience gotten us so much viler a name for a so much more despicable species of the same genus among ourselves)—as for the cowardly, greedy, callous, vainboastful Jingoes, of the clubs, the slums, the Exchange, the music-halls, the press, and even the pulpit, who inflame others to the carnage to which they never expose themselves, we will not heed their piteous protests against the faithful record of murder and devastation, for the personal comfort of those persons that they could not see or conceive the actual state of their darlings; but it would be infinitely better if all men and women could see, or, not seeing, could conceive and realize in of every battle, such misery and desolation and bereavement as are the fruits of every campaign; for then war would be soon extinct, drowned and consumed beyond resuscitation in a lava flood of horror and loathing, throughout all our pseudo-civilized world. Therefore, the more plainly, the more brutally and disgustingly, because the more veraciously, the horrors and agonies of war can be depicted by pen and pencil and related by word of mouth, the better; that the poor foolish, *un*imaginative people who are fascinated by the flaunting trappings of war in peace, may be terrified into shuddering abhorrence of war in action; ravaging, burning, mangling, murdering; changing rich fields to trampled swamps, fair cities to black ruins, brave strong men to carrion; leaving parents childless, children fatherless, wives widowed, maidens frustrate of wifehood and motherhood. "Sensational?" Are you so imbecile as to dream that there can be one thousandth part so much "sensation" in any writing or picture as in the fever-stricken, the wounded, the maimed, the ruined, the dying, and all their afflicted families, the teeming produce of every glorious war?

James Thomson (B. V.).

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—On March 29—Good Friday—a large church in Paris was struck by a shell fired from a gun about seventy-five miles away, so it was apparently specially attracted to this building. At the time it was filled with a devout congregation engaged in solemnly commemorating the anniversary of the death of their Saviour. This shell killed seventy-five and wounded ninety persons.

Jesus is reported to have said: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt. xviii. 20). So, it is a legitimate inference that he was in the congregation. As, however, he was not among the casualties, it would be of great public interest if some privileged theologian—I mean one of those who is on intimate terms with God—would explain what became of Jesus. For, if he cannot, we are once more driven to believe that—

Providence moves in mischievous ways,
Its blunders to perform.

What Will You Put in Its Place?

What, says a correspondent, is the best reply to make to a man who asks what we propose putting in the place of Christianity? Well, the best reply, and so far as we are concerned the only reply, is "Nothing." Why should we put something in the place of Christianity? If it were admittedly good and serviceable, the question would be pertinent. If one is removing the foundations of a house, the nature of what is to be substituted is of first-rate importance. But if the foundations are being weakened because water is percolating through the soil, the question of what will be put in the place of the water we purpose diverting is quite irrelevant. When it was proposed to make factories consume their own smoke, that man would have been looked on as a lunatic who had demanded, "What are you going to put in its place?" If the suggestion had been to remove the atmosphere, the question would have been pertinent. When the Germans send over the Front a cloud of poison gas, no soldier inquires of his officer what is to be put in its place if the wind blows it back from whence it came. There is no need to put anything in the place of a thing that is injurious or dangerous. Its removal is all that is needed. That is why we say that the only correct answer to "What will you put in the place of Christianity?" is "Nothing."

Begging the Question.

As is not unusual, when the Christian states a proposition, he does so in a way that begs the whole point at issue. If Christianity is useful, if it is performing some beneficial function in life, then there is need, before it is removed, that we should have some idea of what is going to take its place. But no Freethinker believes this to be so. His whole case is that Christianity is, at best, harmless, and normally it is obstructive and dangerous. "What will you put in its place?" is a question that one Christian may properly ask of another; but it is a question that a Christian is never justified in putting to a Freethinker. If a man believes that some sort of a god is necessary, he is bound to provide a new one before he destroys the one already established. And human nature is such that, provided a new absurdity is substituted for the old one, most people are convinced that an improvement has been effected. But the question of putting something in the place of Christianity does not trouble the Freethinker. It is not his concern. The Christian makes the same blunder when he asks the Freethinker to account for the existence of evil. That, again, is the Christian's concern. And the Christian has really no right to manufacture a lot of conundrums and then look to the Freethinker to supply answers to them.

Our Aim.

What is it that the Freethinker is trying to remove? Our whole aim may be summed up in a sentence. We wish to destroy the belief in, and the influence of, supernaturalism in science, in morals, in sociology. That is the negative aspect of our work. The positive aspect is that of encouraging the growth of true ideas in all these departments. And, of course, if a man believes that you cannot have a sound science, a healthy morality, or a progressive sociology without supernaturalism, he is warranted in asking for something equally effective in its place. But in that case the discussion obviously turns on whether supernaturalism is necessary or not. The Freethinker says it is not. He asserts that the whole influence of supernaturalism in all these departments is to mislead and to obstruct. It serves no useful purpose whatever. His function is not that of a surgeon faced with the problem of finding a new leg for a man after he has amputated a useful one; it is that of a physician removing a stricture in the social artery. The physician knows that when the obstruction is removed, the normal recuperative powers of the patient will do the rest. The Freethinker knows that when the poison of Christianity no longer operates, human life will freely supply all that is necessary to life and happiness.

The Persistence of the Savage.

Christianity has had a long run, religion has had a still longer one. And during its lengthy career, religion has become more or less closely associated with a thousand and one things with which it has no real connection. But to ignorance and unreflection, when things are seen together in fact, their separation in thought is almost impossible. Religion has always been associated with morality; people have expressed their ideals in terms of religion; therefore, says ignorance, without religion of some sort our morality and our ideals cannot stand. That is exactly the way we can imagine some fear-stricken savage thinking the first time someone suggested that seed should be sown without sprinkling the ground with blood as a sacrifice to his God. The two things had always been associated, therefore they could not be separated. But when courage had its way, the blood sprinkling was seen to be useless. The savage didn't have to put something in its place, he simply cancelled it, and applied his intelligence and energy to the work before him. And, as here, so elsewhere. Religion has no organic, no necessary connection with the real things of life. Its association is always accidental. Ignorance created the union between religion and life, and is still fearful that the social structure will collapse when a divorce is pronounced.

If Religion Goes?

But suppose we imagine this country subjected to a devastating epidemic of common sense—of all things the most unlikely—and religion to disappear as a consequence, what would be the result? Would anything be lost of real value? Clearly the human relations between parents and children, husbands and wives, friends and friends, would remain. The State would remain. Society would remain. The beauties of art, the wonders of science, the glories of literature would remain. The world would remain with its problems infinite in number and seductive in character. Babies would still be born, boys and girls would grow up, men and maidens would marry, human beings would continue to laugh and cry, and love and hate, to toil, to triumph, or flounder to despair; all that is now would go on then exactly as before, save for the one thing that we should cease to squander our energy in a useless manner, and rid society of something that has never yielded real help to any human being during the whole of its history.

Human Nature Enough.

That is why we say there is no need to put anything in the place of Christianity. We do not want to take away one God and recreate another. We do not want to take away the Christian heaven and hell and give another heaven and hell in their place. Any exchange effected along that line is not worth the trouble of making. When a gardener sets about pulling up the weeds from a flower bed he doesn't put something in their place; he knows that the weeds are absorbing nutriment the flowers should receive, and that if he removes the weeds the natural strength of the plants will do the rest. Our work is to weed the garden of human nature. We realize that human nature contains within itself the potentialities of its own greatness, and that if we clean out the weeds of superstition and ignorance we may trust to the sun of reason and the pure air of human fellowship to produce a better race from the fruitful soil of human society. We do not want anything in the place of Christianity; our aim is to rid the world of a superstition that has been a canker in the heart and a cramp in the intellect of humanity ever since its inception.

Chapman Cohen.

"The Unashamed Church."

It is our contention that practically there is no distinction between Christianity and the Church. Some theologians, on the contrary, for apologetic purposes, declare that the two are fundamentally different, and that what is true of the Church is the very opposite of true of Christianity. They admit that, though the Church has often proved a lamentable failure, the Christian religion has been an unqualified success whenever people have been sufficiently courageous to give it a fair trial. Clergymen of the type of the Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury Chapel, openly acknowledges that if the Church had been but loyal to her ideals the present deplorable War would not have broken out. In our judgment, however, the Church is Christianity in practice, organized Christianity as it has existed in the world being the only Christianity known to us. In an article in the Christian World for April 11, the Rev. Arthur Pringle says that "to-day the Church is much blamed or, what is worse, despised as simply not counting." In this reverend gentleman's opinion, her being despised does not matter so long as she is not despicable. Of course, being one of her ministers, Mr. Pringle cannot be expected to speak slightingly of her, much less to admit her total failure; but whatever her condition may be, it is his firm conviction that "in the fierce flame of the present tragedy one of two things must happen—destruction or purification." He is confident "there can be no middle result: we shall come out either dead or mightily alive." Then he quotes Paul Sabatier's description of what happened in France at the close of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. The famous French divine tells us how at that time the more or less superstitious crowds invaded the old cathedrals, being deeply stirred by the heart-breaking calamity that had overtaken the nation—how even "notorious heretics, members of more or less Masonic associations, contended for seats with professed devotees, and were only remarkable for their attention." But it is the following sentences of which we wish special notice to be taken:—

> The people of France were returning to their Mother, quite simply and sincerely, to sit down at her table..... Now the board was not laid. The old Mother had no fatted calf to kill, nor even energy to prepare a little substantial food for the famishing.....They went away irritated, incensed, and with bitter regret that ever they had come.

Those are the words of a Protestant in condemnation of the Catholic Church; but they are tragically true of the Church as a whole, by whatever name she may be known. Now, Mr. Pringle has the audacity to affirm that many of the Churches have no need to be ashamed of the way in which they are meeting the position that faces them to-day. He supplies his readers with the following manifesto:—

> With our own accent and significance, we have good reason to say with Paul that we are not ashamed of the Gospel, because it answers to the facts of life as nothing else does. For, so far from the Christian faith having been shattered by the War, it stands illumined and vindicated as never before within living memory. It has, so to speak, anticipated and underlined all that is happening. To put a great matter in fragmentary outline, our faith had already prepared us for the heights and depths of human possibility which the War has so wonderfully and disconcertingly revealed: how man has it in him to be less than the beasts or more than the angels. The centre of our faith has always been the Cross that is the supreme example of that "greatest love" by which men lay down their lives that their friends or their country may be saved. And, pace Mr. Wells, it has from the beginning been part of the fibre of Christianity that God is not a quiescent or occasionally intervening spectator, but man's fellow-sufferer and fellow-conqueror in life and death and on to all-compensating immortality. It is not our province or pretence to dissolve all difficulties; but at least we have a faith that, soberly reckoning with all that the darkness means, promises at last to turn it into light.

We have cited that long passage in order that Mr. Pringle's case may be fully and fairly before us. That it is a hopelessly bad case is beyond all possible doubt. Of all attempts to exonerate God from blame in connection with the War, or to explain away the utter failure of Christianity either to prevent or to end it, this by Mr. Pringle is surely the most glaringly and absurdly futile. It amounts, in reality, to a complete negation of the Gospel preached by St. Paul and embodied in the great creeds of the Church. Instead of being the Saviour of the world, God in Christ is represented here as a sharer in the sufferings and sorrows caused by human sins. Instead of delivering mankind from the guilt of that original depravity which is the root of all the evils and miseries which darken and curse our life, Christianity is said to promise nothing better than at last, in another world, to turn the prevailing darkness into light. No wonder the reverend gentleman confesses his inability to "dissolve all difficulties," when, as a matter of simple fact, he dissolves none, but creates a great host. New Testament Christianity represents God as being in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, as redeeming, cleansing, elevating, and ennobling it; but, according to Mr. Pringle, it portrays the Heavenly Father as simply "man's fellow-sufferer and fellow-conqueror in life and death." To St. John, God is light and love, St. Paul calls him the God of peace, whose supreme gift to the world is good will engendering universal harmony; but to this twentieth-century preacher, as to some Old Testament writers, he is "a man of war," "the Lord mighty in battle," "the God of Hosts." Mr. Pringle's Gospel is a new thing under the sun, of which no one ever heard the lightest whisper until now, and which pictures the Deity as anything but a Divinely beautiful and noble character. In other words, our divine has flung Christianity down the wind, and reduced God to the position of man's fellow-worker.

Can it be true that the Church has no reason to be ashamed of her record? Of what benefit have her ministrations been to the world at large? She has doubtless provided her clergy with rich and comfortable livings; but what has she done towards lifting society to a higher level of life? Mr. Pringle puts that point thus:—

> What is the Church doing? What is there to show at the end of its day's work? That the Church has failed dismally from the outwardly impressive, spectacular point of view must be admitted. It could not prevent the War, neither can it stop it; and there, in the eyes of many, lies its final condemnation. Must it, therefore, close its doors?

Should not the Church's success be outwardly impressive, seen and read by all? Will Mr. Pringle be good enough to specify some of God's providential ways which are not marked by outwardly impressive, spectacular happenings? Will he tell us what so-called "acts of God" can be clearly distinguished from "acts of man"? It is easy enough to characterize those events which are beyond human control as "acts of God"; but no such occurrences can be discovered in human life. Neither is there any difficulty in stating that there are things which even God cannot do. "Even Christ had to shed helpless tears over the city he would fain have saved. Is there no lasting significance in that"? Yes, certainly, and it is this: that neither immediately, nor yet through the Church, God either does or can do anything at all. Mr. Pringle asserts that "there are many Churches in the land that need have no shame as they meet the test of results." We admit that clergymen, not a few, have been excellent recruiting officers, and that from the Churches tens of thousands of fine young men have gone to the Front to kill Germans; but does the reverend gentleman verily believe that Christ instituted his Church to serve such a purpose as that? We hold that the Church ostensibly came into the world to save it from all its evils, and to sow therein the seed of universal peace and prosperity, and that she has lamentably failed to answer the alleged end of her existence. Great Britain is at last finding out that she owes none of her good things to the Church, and that she could and would get on much better without her ghostly ministrations.

How frightened Christians are at admitting that a man of genius can be a Freethinker! Swinburne's heterodoxy is as well known as that of Shelley, but the dear Daily News will not admit the soft impeachment. In a review of Swinburne's Letters, it points out that the poet's correspondence "show him as a man with a religion; he would testify to beauty wherever he saw it." Let us hope that the Daily News is not so unscrupulous in its political propaganda.

A Secular Teacher and His Work.

> Spirits are not finely touched
> But to fine issues. —Shakespeare.
> To bear all naked truths
> And to envisage circumstance, all calm;
> That is the top of sovereignty. —Keats.

Letters published in the Freethinker from time to time show that there are many Secularists who retain traces of their early religious training. This lends point to the oft-quoted remark, attributed to a Catholic ecclesiastic, that if a child were in his care in its early years, he did not mind who had the child afterwards. Yet there have been few attempts on the part of Freethinkers to supplant the thousands of schools of the Christian majority by educational establishments in which superstition has no place. So far as I know, there were recently but two schools in the country in which the curriculum was entirely secularistic, and one of these was compelled to close down owing to the adverse conditions caused by the World-War. With this one I was well acquainted, and a few notes concerning it may be of interest to others.

My first acquaintance with Ruskin House School, Southend-on-Sea (alas! now no more), arose under peculiar circumstances. A friend showed me a beautifully written piece of dictation, in which some passages from Ingersoll were transcribed by a child's hand. Seeing my look of wonder, he informed me that it was the ordinary work done at a school conducted on Freethought lines. The next day I visited the school, and was surprised and delighted at what I saw.

There was an air of novelty about the institution. On the walls were portraits of Herbert Spencer, Charles Darwin, Huxley, Walt Whitman, Bradlaugh, and other intellectual worthies, and the scholars were familiarized with the life-work of these pioneers by daily talks from the principal and staff. These chats ranged over a variety of subjects, principally scientific, historic, and biographic. Birthdays of great or famous men and women were honoured. Even the school-books had a novel appearance, for they included Gould's Children's Plutarch and Brave Citizens, Dennis Hird's books, and Ingersoll's works, all being freely drawn upon for purposes of dictation. The classes were mixed, boys and girls sat together, and the tuition was precisely the same for both. Experience proved that the girls became more self-reliant, and the boys more amenable and courteous. Physical culture was in use, the rudiments of science were known to all, and every scholar had a sound groundwork of knowledge. Even the youngest children knew the star-groups and the fundamentals of science. The elder scholars were also instructed in bookkeeping and shorthand, and thus fitted for commercial life immediately on the termination of their school careers, and in many instances situations were found for them by the principal.

During the summer months weekly rambles were arranged, and the scholars journeyed to the heart of the country or the seashore, and learned to read directly from Nature's "infinite book of secrecy." A short walk or train journey was usually sufficient, but once a year the children went to London and visited the Zoological Gardens, or the Natural History Museum. On one of these visits Sir E. Ray Lankester was interested in the young visitors, and had a kindly word for the little students.

Every opportunity was given to the pupils for mental experiment, and the critical faculties were kept alert. One day the scholars would be told the story of Henry VIII., and, may be, on the next day that of Socrates. Then they were asked to contrast the personalities. These are but instances of how unconventional was the work at this school. Another point worth noting was the entire absence of corporal punishment. Discipline was maintained by moral suasion, the principal believing that a teacher who had to rely upon a stick was unworthy of the care of the young. The whole school was simply one happy family of boys and girls, and the teaching staff foster parents. The education imparted was quite sound, and boys who left the school were enabled at once to take appointments as bank clerks and other positions of value.

The principal of this school, Mr. W. H. Thresh, made a gallant attempt to supply a long-felt want in the Freethought movement. For ten years he maintained the school in the face of enormous difficulties, which would have daunted any but the most ardent and enthusiastic Freethinker. Full of a high and unflinching courage, he was only beaten in the end by the dire results of the present World-War. Among schoolmasters of his time he was what Dr. Arnold was at Rugby in the school-days of Judge Hughes. Animated with the idea of the high nature of his calling, he threw himself into forwarding the education of some of the rising generation, free entirely from the "lie at the lips of the priest." Men and women may come after him and accomplish what he bravely attempted, but the credit will always belong to the pioneer schoolmaster, whose ten years' crusade for the young forms a high and perfect tribute to the ennobling ideals of, what George Meredith called, "the best of causes."

Freethinking.

The habit of mind engendered by Freethinking, a condition of careful watchfulness combined with patient scepticism, is one which is highly creditable to humanity, but which, in common with all things of real value, is rather rare; which rarity accounts for the slow permeation of ideas, in themselves neither revolutionary nor revolting, but which contain the germs of great progressive movements. Contrasted with the normal type of mind, it may best be described as energetic as compared with lazy, and intrepid as against pusillanimous. It is the mind of the scientist, of the discoverer, of the thinker.

Freethinking is not necessarily relative to religion, although it is in this connection that the term is mostly used—a subtle compliment unwittingly paid to those who have discarded the beliefs of savages by those who hold them. It is, properly speaking, the examination of facts urged to support a conclusion, and the acceptation or rejection of the conclusion as a result of personal decision. Among the troubles that beset the Freethinker, such as unpopularity due to heterodox opinions expressed, is this most serious drawback, which appears, perhaps, unnatural to the inhabitants of these islands, of having to exercise his mind rather frequently, instead of drifting whither popular papers decide. It is certainly much more comfortable to have one's thinking done for one; but there is just as much virtue in such ease as there is in lying abed till noon each day. The iconoclast who smashes ideas which have ruled for years, been made idols, and been expressed in maxims, does work the value of which cannot be immediately appraised, but which can be recognized as of infinite use, as it is only through keeping the minds of the people in a condition of ferment that progress is possible, and, when possible, made.

A favourite argument against the practice of Freethought is that it is destructive without being constructive; and the connection between the ideas of destruction and construction is so close that not infrequently one is tempted to launch out on a tentative scheme of construction, to the joy of the opponent, who uses the scheme to cover up the weakness of his own position. Destruction is necessary; it clears the ground. It may or may not be necessary that a substitute be provided for what is destroyed. One can scarcely imagine a farmer substituting one weed for another which he has been at great pains to destroy on his farm; and yet, not unusually, those who kill ideas are asked to provide a substitute. The crux of the question is whether the old idea was beneficial or harmful. If beneficial, the aim of the new idea is to eliminate such parts as reduced its value; if harmful, there can only be substituted the idea of abandoning the old idea, which is complete destruction. Illustrative of this contention is the existence of the office of President of the United States. When the Constitution of that Republic was being drawn up, Paine pointed out both the uselessness and the folly of having a President; but so strong a hold had the idea that construction involved the substitution of one head for another, that he was unable to convince the 1787 Convention of the value of his suggestion.

Mental laziness interferes with progress in many minor matters, no less than in large ones, and it was a matter of minor importance that first drew our attention to the prevalence of the disease. During a discussion on "Education and Social Democracy," one lady deplored the imposition of "home lessons"; and no sooner had she sat down than up sprang another lady, who held that education must be made difficult and distasteful because life itself was full of annoying incidents, and none could get his own way, and that, in short, a relatively speaking unhappy time at school inured the children to these vexations. We should not have noticed the statements so particularly had we not been amazed to find that they had considerable support from other members of the audience. Why diseases common to children should not be allowed to spread in order that we may have the survival of the fittest, in a precise biological sense, appears to us due to that reason which urges that school life ought to be pleasant. The hardships of life are to a great extent due to causes which could be removed were they to be efficiently tackled; and, in any case, school is not a training-ground for hardships; it is presumed to be a training-ground for life; or, properly speaking, the art of living.

The development of machinery has progressed in the direction of relieving man of the arduous manual labour which obtained for many in the early days of manufacture. Many things which before were only fashioned at the cost of much sweat, are now made by automatic machinery. One of the simplest illustrations of the benefits derived from the use of machinery is in the hoisting up of goods. In the days before the windlass no inconsiderable amount of effort was required to hoist articles such as stone. The windlass made the work much lighter, but now, in those places which have machinery something short of ancient, we find an electric hoist which places on man only the necessity of pulling a rope.

This is an obvious advance, and the application of the illustration to the case of education points out that the whole tendency of life and work is towards ease. This feeling of ease must be recognized by educational experts. It is useless mimicking the ostrich. Economically, work tends to become lighter; learning is work; therefore, learning ought to become lighter or easier. There is no doubt but that advance has been made in the right direction. A child is curiosity personified. It is the simplest thing in the world to encourage that curiosity. In schools more time should be devoted to the study of natural history, to botany, and kindred scientific subjects, and that study should not be of the nature of a grand assimilation of nomenclature, the which sickens whilst it stultifies, but should be the assimilation of facts, and the discussion of reasons. Nine years at school under the present methods and subjects finds a child bright and full of initiative, and leaves him a respectable ha'penny with no character. It is of primary importance that every means be taken of encouraging children's curiosity, for only by such action will it be possible to have men fully capable of being citizens in that Utopia for which pioneers work and mankind hopes; it is necessary, if progress is to be at all rapid, that children should not be so inured to vexation in school as to make them incapable of perceiving vexations in after life; it is essential that the children should think for themselves in order that they may grow up efficient in the art of living. Such a training would allow the child to retain its curiosity, to develop its confidence, to control its temper, and to appreciate the art of living; and of that appreciation springs happiness.

Acid Drops.

The Government policy in first including and then excluding the clergy from the operations of the Man Power Bill gets "curioser and curioser." Sir George Cave explains that the Government originally acted because of representations from "authorities and ministers of certain Churches, who felt it somewhat of a grievance that they were not put in the same position as the rest of the manhood of the country." Then the Government withdrew it because, after allowing for "Conscientious Objectors" and those in ill health, and also allowing for the religious needs of the country, there would not be many left. But Sir George might have remembered that it is not really a question of how many are left; it is a question of treating the clergy as a privileged body, and relieving the whole of them of an obligation that rests on all other citizens.

A still more curious sentence is that "the Government did not think it worth while to run counter to the strong feeling which existed in the matter" in order to obtain the number available. But seven per cent. is all that is reckoned on, and surely there are seven per cent. of clergymen fit for military service. And how comes it that the Government speakers, after heaping all sorts of abuse on Conscientious Objectors, go out of their way not to hurt them when they happen to be clergymen? Moreover, where is the strong current of feeling against the clergy being conscripted? If the representations from the clergy were so strong as to induce the Government to put the clause in the Bill, what becomes of the strong feeling against it which caused the withdrawal? When Sir George Cave was arguing in the Appeal Court against the Secular Society, we said he was about the worst hand at conducting an argument we had come across. What he now says, and unsays, proves it.

One other point remains. The tone adopted by some of the clergy: "I would be pleased to join the Army, but the Act does not apply to me" is sheer hypocrisy. The Act does not compel them to join, but it does not prevent their joining. It is open to any clergyman to join the Army, and there is nothing on earth to prevent his doing so. If, therefore, it be true that any clergyman feels it a grievance that he is not in the same position as "the rest of the manhood of the country," his is a grievance that can be removed at the nearest recruiting office. The whole thing seems to us, as we said last week, an elaborate piece of humbug played on a people that are becoming as subject to the hypnotic influence of an "official" statement as is any Prussia.

The Archbishop of Canterbury assured the House of Lords "that the clergy had not been exempted at their own request, and they were ready to respond to any call made on them." We presume if they had been enrolled along with others they would have had to respond. And they can still go. Sir George Cave said the number available would be very small. The Archbishop, who ought to know, admitted that had the clergy remained in the Bill "there would have been a considerable number" enrolled. Sir George Cave also said there was a strong feeling against it. The Christian World, again a better authority, says: "it is clear that public opinion on the whole rather resents the exemption of ministers and clergymen from national service." When placed together these statements only confirm one's opinion of the "fishy" nature of the whole business.

Then we have the Church Times declaring that the clergy were finally exempted owing to the opposition of the Roman Catholics and the dissenting ministry. But the Church Times admits that the "greater part of what the clergy busy themselves with can either be spared for a time or done by laymen." The really necessary work is "the ministration of the Sacraments, and the care of the sick and the dying." But, surely, laymen and women are as capable of attending the sick and the dying as are the clergy? And we do not think anyone will be injured if the Sacrament is not administered, or if it is passed over to the district visitor. All it means is that the clergy must stand as a privileged class. When that is said all is said.

Finally, it should be noted that in exempting the clergy we are following the example of our pious enemy—Germany. She also keeps her clergy at home in order to look after the morals of the people. France and Italy make no such exception. Somehow or other Frenchmen and Italians can keep all right without having the clergy told off to look after them. We Britons are evidently made of poorer stuff.

A Welsh Baptist minister has just been fined £40 for slandering the W.A.A.C.'s. We have often commented on the tendency of the pulpit to make statements without adequate foundation on fact, and usually these statements escape without reproof. If every Christian minister who has slandered Freethinkers had been fined £40, the total would mean a big reduction in the national debt.

Whilst waiting for a train at Oxford, the Rev. T. W. Martyn, Vicar of Aston Abbotts, Aylesbury, dropped dead. Had he been a Freethought lecturer, it would have been regarded as providential.

In shuffling off this mortail coil, the Rev. Robert Mays, of Corsham, Wilts, left estate of the value of £43,540. This sum should be sufficient to prevent the reverend gentleman from handling a harp.

The Church Times protests against a notice exhibited by a provincial clergyman: "A special service for men is held in this church on Sundays from 2.30 to 3.30. Subject next week: The Missing Link. The Vicar."

The announcement that the Bishop of Hereford would appear at Bloomsbury Baptist Church caused a flutter in religious circles. Apparently, Christian brotherhood is more honoured in the breach than the observance.

"St. Mark's Vicarage, Peterborough, worth £300 a year and a house, is going a-begging," says the Evening News, which adds: "the living has been vacant four months." The hesitating clergy should remember, prayerfully, that the founder of their religion was a poor man.

From a leading article in the Manchester Guardian of April 9 we gather that the endeavour to excite feeling against the Bolsheviks for dissestablishing the Church has broken down. It says:—

> Western Europe hardly noticed that the Bolsheviks, among other things, had broken up one of the oldest, closest, and as it seemed most firmly welded marriages between Church and State.....On February 3 they issued a decree separating Church and State, and prohibiting any religious qualification or disqualification for public office.....Thus Russia has with a stroke of the pen secularized education and the State, separated Church and State, and disendowed the Church (and other ecclesiastical societies) and declared it incapable of owning property. For the disendowment there is precedent in the eighteenth century, when the State took over the Church lands. The "bourgeois" press anticipated that this decree would initiate a bitter war between Church and Government. When the Government took over the great Alexander Nevsky Lavra in Petrograd a monk was killed in the struggle, and an immense religious demonstration, numbering 200,000 or more persons, protested. The Patriarch, too, anathematized and excommunicated the Bolsheviks, and adjured the believing children of the Orthodox Church to have no intercourse whatsoever with such scum of the human race. Nothing serious, however, seems as yet to have happened.

In other words, the overwhelming majority of the Russian people recognize the change as for the better.

Miss Atkinson, President of the Women's League, said at the London Congregational Union meeting that the day had passed in which the Church treated women as spiritual charwomen, fit only for cleaning and renovating. Just so! Even the Church must be polite to its only remaining customers.

The wife of the vicar of Tollerton was fined £5 at Nottingham on April 3 for stealing £12 worth of food tickets from a munition works. The vicar had previously received six weeks for the same offence. The clergy have received exemption in order to guard and nourish the moral strength of the country.

Undeterred by the Easter week of prayer, which was followed by a rapid German advance, the Wesleyan Methodists held a ten-hours' intercession service at the Central Hall, Westminster. The Rev. Dimsdale Young pleaded for "splendid tenacity" in prayer—which means, we assume, worrying the Lord until he does something. Another minister said the enemy was supernaturally checked at Mons, and prayed for the intervention of "angel hosts" to-day. But the Government seems to place infinitely more reliance on a "comb-out" and on raising the military age. Perhaps there is a strict age-limit for angels, and all are now exempt from further service.

The British Weekly exhorts those who are troubled and bereaved in these terrible times to go to God for the succour and comfort which they so greatly need; but they are reminded that they must repair to him along the road which he himself has appointed, which "road has two steps. Offer unto God thanksgiving: that is the first. And pay thy vows to the Most High: that is the second." Here are parents who have lost four sons in the War, whom they willingly offered up on the altar of patriotism. On what conceivable ground of reason can they be expected to feel grateful to God? Their hearts are broken; their brightly burning hopes are extinguished; a pitch-black night has fallen upon their spirits; but God flatly declines to comfort them unless they approach him with thanksgiving upon their lips. And yet the British Weekly is surprised that there are people who refuse to believe in such a cruel-hearted Deity!

In a case now before the Privy Council, involving the ownership of seventy-two million acres of land in Rhodesia, some interesting letters were quoted that passed between Queen Victoria. In one of them, Lobengula complains that the white men are "troubling too much about gold," and also that, after signing a document, he was told he had parted with his mineral rights. This is a trick that has been played on natives all over the world, and illustrates Christian methods of "peaceful penetration." There is also a note of satire in a reply to Lobengula, written by Lord Knutsford on behalf of the Queen:—

> The Queen understands the trouble caused to Lobengula by different parties of white men coming to his country to look for gold, but wherever gold is, or wherever it is reported to be, it is impossible for him to exclude.

The same thing may be said of rubber, or oil, or anything commercially valuable. Given a coloured race with valuable soil, and the whites become acutely anxious for his religious conversion and for his instruction in the arts of civilization. Given a country where no commercial exploitation is possible, and the natives are permitted to go to hell in their own fashion. "Blessed be ye poor"—especially when the white Christian is around.

Another letter from Lobengula to the Queen complains that white men stole his cattle, and shot thirty of his soldiers when they were sent to bring them back. And he plaintively adds:—

> The white men told my people that they had bought the country, and the people who live in it. Your Majesty, what I want to know from you is if people can be bought at any price?

But Lobengula was only a savage; had he been properly Christianized, he would have known better than to have put such a question.

A prayer offered at the annual meeting of the London Congregational Union included a special petition for the "frivolous and flighty young girls of England." This petition ought to move the heart of a bronze statue.

We can quite appreciate Sir George Cave's belief that he would be demoralizing the country by sending clergymen into the Army. We see that the Rev. J. Griffiths, of East Corwick, Yorkshire, was summoned by his wife for not providing her with a reasonable allowance. Whereupon the Southport magistrates ordered him to pay her 15s. per week. We think the Army allowance would be 12s. 6d., so Mrs. Griffiths is half a-crown better off through her husband being kept in England to keep up the moral tone of the country.

Both Lord Kitchener and Lord Roberts are dead. Religious paragraphers might, therefore, refrain from converting them into drivelling idiots. Yet the Midland Daily Telegraph solemnly records that when, in the early days of the War, the Germans turned back from the apparently certain capture of Paris, Lord Roberts said, "Only God Almighty could have done this." And Lord Kitchener added, "Somebody must have been praying." We know very well the type of religious liar who concocts this sort of story. Our difficulty is to mentally picture the type of idiot who really believes it.

The spectacle of Christians murdering each other by the million is not lost on, what the dear clergy call, "the heathen," and a striking instance occurred at the West Ham Police Court. A West-Indian seaman was asked: "Are you a Christian?" His reply was disconcerting. "No, sar, we quiet men."

"Billy Sunday will be heard in London soon," says a daily paper. Students of philology will be glad of the opportunity of hearing the American language in all its purity.

From the Westminster Cathedral Chronicle:—

> A wounded soldier who had been in a comatose state for several days told the doctor on recovery—that during all that period he thought he was dead. Whereupon the doctor asked the patient why he was sure that he was really now alive.
> "Oh," replied the soldier, "If I were in heaven I should not be hungry, and if I were in the other place I should not have cold feet."

The Globe opens one of the stock stories about the Prince of Wales offering an umbrella to a man during a storm, thus: "During his recent stay in London an American officer found himself in a severe storm. One afternoon a young man in civilian clothes was passing," etc. Now we wonder how long that storm lasted? For "one afternoon" while he was standing there the incident happened. And one wonders how many afternoons he stood there in the rain waiting for the Prince to pass.

"The following is an extract from a Palestine officer's letter: On the day after the official entry I got leave to go into Jerusalem and have a look round, to see some, at least, of the places with whose names I had been familiar. I particularly wanted to find the Mount of Olives. Seeing one of my own platoon, I walked up to him and said, '——, where's the Mount of Olives?' He looked at me in a puzzled way for a moment, and then blurted out, 'Dunno, sir! I don't know wher' any o' the pubs. is.'"—Daily Chronicle.

The editor of the Daily News was fully justified in stating, in one of his Saturday articles, that "what the War has revealed is the inadequacy of organized Christianity as it exists in the world to deal with a moral question when it is complicated with political interests." In an article, entitled "The Great Problem of God," which appeared in the British Weekly for April 11, Sir William Robertson Nicoll furnishes a striking illustration of the truth of that statement. The reverend knight—like the Kaiser—claims God as the avowed Ally of his side in the bloody conflict. Each is equally certain of Divine approval and support; and yet the War, a purely political concern, goes on exactly as if no God had any share in it at all. Sir William lays great stress on God's promised deliverance, while the facts of the battlefield give that promise the direct lie every day.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—April 28, Nuneaton.

T. Fowler.—Pleased to hear of your son's distinguished career in the Army. As he has been through all the heavy fighting since 1915, and remains unscathed, it is evident that brains, good physique, and "luck" does quite as well as much prayer. We hope his good fortune will continue to the end.

E. A. McDonald.—We agree with you as to the stupidity of much of the writing on Nietzsche. As you say, "it is ridiculous to interpret his Zarathustrian discourse on war as giving sanction to the present kind of warfare. If he had lived to-day, he would have dreaded the triumph of 'Kultur.'" Sheer ignorance is, we think, the best explanation of the newspaper writing on Nietzsche. We are glad to know that we have your "fullest confidence in piloting the dear old paper through present difficulties."

A. Radley.—D.O.R.A.

E. Harvey.—Too late this season, but if all goes as we anticipate, we hope to do still greater things next autumn; we also anticipate seeing a number of new centres of activity opened. We have set ourselves the ambition of planting a Society in all the big centres, and we shall not rest content until it is done.

E. Ilsley.—We hardly think that a lengthy discussion on the subject would be justified with the restricted space at our disposal. We can only say that "abstraction" is not identical with "unknowable." An abstraction is a generalization based on sensible qualities. An "unknowable" cannot be a concept, since that implies something positive, and "unknowable" simply means the absence of everything knowable. It is a pure negation, and an absence of anything to think about cannot well provide the material for thinking.

J. McKenna.—We do not think the Salvation Army ever attempted a reply to Mr. Manson's exposure of its methods. It probably judged silence, and reliance on the forgetfulness of the public, the wiser policy.

H. Dawson.—Closed for the present. We quite appreciate your comments, and we know that your interest in the Cause is sincere. The length of your letter needs no apology; a letter is never too long when there is nothing superfluous.

Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—N. S. S. Benevolent Fund: Chingford, 5s.

T. Courden.—If the conditions for printing were more favourable we should have no hesitation in reprinting the "Views and Opinions" of last week for distribution as a leaflet. We are flattered by your opinion of the notes as a "biting exposure" of the "Black Army."

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Goldthorpe "saints" were highly delighted with the success of Mr. Cohen's meetings on Sunday last. These were the first Freethought meetings held in Goldthorpe, and the attention given to the lectures was all that could be desired. The interest of the audience was indicated by a good sale of literature, and an accession of members is anticipated. Visitors were present from Sheffield, Barnsley, and other localities. As the restricted train service involved a walk of from four to five miles from some of these places, their interest in the Cause was manifest, and augurs well for future operations.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (April 28) at Nuneaton. This is Mr. Lloyd's first visit to the new Branch, and we hope the meetings will be worthy of the lecturer. We are quite sure the lecturer will be worthy of the meetings, however large and enthusiastic they may be.

It is not easy to get printing orders undertaken or executed nowadays, and the state of the labour market is the cause of the delay in publishing the report of the Bowman Case. However, it is now ready, and we publish this week a verbatim report of the House of Lords' Judgment. The speeches of the five law Lords give between them a full and interesting account of the law of blasphemous libel, and so constitutes a volume of first-rate importance. It is one that every Freethinker should have as reference to a long-maintained injustice, and of a great Freethought triumph. The volume, issued by the Secular Society, Limited, is published by the Pioneer Press at 1s., postage, 1d. An introduction is contributed by Mr. Cohen, who gives a brief history of the Bowman litigation, and a summary of the present legal standing of Freethought.

The Pioneer Press is now offering for sale at a reduced price a limited number of copies of Mary Wollstonecraft, by G. R. Stirling Taylor. The life of Mary Wollstonecraft will always be of interest to Freethinkers, and her "Vindication of the Rights of Woman" gave a great and genuine impulse to the movement for the legal equality of the sexes. As Mr. Taylor says: "The advanced women of to-day are saying and thinking, with very little change, what was so brilliantly put down" by the subject of his memoir. The book is handsomely produced, and is enriched with fine portraits of Mary Wollstonecraft and William Godwin—two Freethinkers too little known to the present generation. The volume wa published at 7s. 6d. net, and is being offered at 3s., post age, 5d.

A Leeds correspondent writes: "It is nothing short of a scandal the way in which the black Army is singled out fo special treatment. I consider now is the time for Free thinkers to let their voice be heard." So do we, and if all Freethinkers would speak up some people in the country would be greatly astonished. Their exemption is a manifest injustice. And to be told that grown-up men and women require a body like the English clergy to look after them is a downright insult.

Mr. F. Norman Crosby, Secretary of the Federation of Discharged Soldiers and Sailors, writes:—

> I see in this weeks "Acid Drops" a report has reached you that religion is a feature of our Federation. May I point out that although I am Honorary Treasurer of the above Branch it has not prevented me undertaking the organization of the Portsmouth Branch of this Society, and also that the Chairman is one of our most esteemed members.

We are glad to have the above note, and hope that it expresses a truth over a wide area.

Progress is Secular not Christian. The true Christian ages were "the Dark Ages" when men lay prone at the foot of the altar and the throne. The light of Arabian science flashing upon Europe was the daybreak of our modern era. The infidel Mohammedans had homes of science and seats of learning when the Christian prayed and hymned in mental darkness, and the Mosque had its school when the Church had none. Science lifted her head in Christendom, and the Church crushed her down. It made Galileo recant what everybody now knows to be true; it burnt Bruno at the stake; it plucked out the tongue of Vanini before reducing his body to ashes. It fought against reason with the ferocity of a tiger. It revelled for ages in blood. It broke men on the wheel even in the days of Voltaire. The world grew pale and breathless at its crimes. But that stupendous genius, the greatest Freethinker of France and of the world, challenged its pretensions and impeached it at the bar of humanity. And the peoples have gathered round the tribunal, marvelling at the great indictment, and still more at the weak defence.—G. W. Foote.

The Mechanism of Man.

III.

The skeleton is built up by an architecture of osseous substances. These solid bony structures are animal tissues which have become petrified. There are over 200 bones in the human framework, but this number is not constant. Various bones that are distinctly separate in youth and early manhood become compacted together in old age. There are, for instance, thirty-three separate vertebræ in the spinal column in the young, and the upper twenty-four usually remain distinct during the whole course of life; but five of these bodies unite at an early period to form one large bone, the sacrum, while four other vertebræ usually run into a single bony structure, the dwindled tail, or coccyx. In the springtime of manhood the skull is composed of twenty-two distinct bones, but in childhood the number is much greater, and in advanced life considerably less.

The bones serve to support, protect, and move the body. The anatomical mechanism is constructed by long, flat, and irregular bones. Thick and solid bones provide support. Broad and flat bones furnish protection; while long and straight structures are the instruments of manipulation and locomotion.

The femur, or thigh-bone, is an elongated hollow shaft of solid, compact bone. Its cavity is occupied by yellow marrow. This marrow consists of fat and blood-vessels, and assists in nourishing the bone. Long bones, such as the femur, are confined to the upper and lower extremities of the body—the arms and the legs. Ribs and other flattened bones possess no yellow marrow; they are spongy internally, and hard and dense externally. A red marrow is found in the cavities of the spongy parts of bones. In this special marrow red blood corpuscles seem to be developed. Vascular vessels and connective tissue unite to form a closely adhesive covering for the bones. This substance is termed the periosteum.

Bones are composed of animal and mineral matter. The organic matter is gelatine, and the mineral substance which comprises about two-thirds of the weight of bone is mainly lime. In later life and old age the organic gelatine decreases; the bones consequently become light, and are more susceptible to fracture, and hey heal less easily than in earlier life.

The mammalian organism, including man's, is composed of head, trunk, and limbs. The spinal or vertebral column forms the axis of the skeleton, and with this column all the other bones of the body are immediately or mediately connected. The trunk is divided into the thorax or chest, and the abdomen or belly, and its leading bones are those of the shoulder-blades, hip-bones, collar-bone, chest, and spine. The vertebræ of the spinal column are arranged in a series, one above the other, and their three projecting processes serve for the attachment of ligaments and muscles. The main body of each vertebra, however, serves to sustain the weight of the upper column of bones. At the dorsal or rear side of the thick region of a vertebra is an orifice, and each opening, situated as it is in succession, in the chain of bones, forms a long canal for the spinal marrow. Proceeding along the channel of the vertebral column, the spinal cord ultimately enters the cavity of the skull which houses the brain. The brain may be regarded as an enlargement of the spinal cord, and the two together constitute what is known as the cerebro-spinal system. Between the vertebræ thick gristle pads are interposed. These cartilages function as cushions, and thus prevent jars, while their elastic nature permits the easy bending of the bony column.

Attached to the rear of the vertebral column there are twelve pairs of ribs, which extend round the ventral or front part of the trunk in hoop-like fashion. The true ribs—the first seven pairs—are directly attached to the sternum or breast-bone. Each of the three succeeding pairs—the false ribs—is attached to the pair above it. Beneath these, again, there are the two pairs of floating ribs, which, unlike the others, do not form a girdle, but remain free in front. Then we possess the collar-bones, the shoulder-blades, and the pelvic girdle. The hip-bones and the extremity or base of the spine combine to produce a bowl-like structure termed the pelvis. To this structure the lower limbs are attached.

The skull consists of the cranium or brain cavity and the bones of the face. In the progress of evolution the skull has assumed an arched form, and this modification is well adapted for opposing pressure, and mitigating the effects of blows. All flat bones are furnished with a spongy layer which is placed between the harder layers of bone composing the inner and outer surfaces. The flat bones forming the skull are thus protected, and their elasticity helps to shield the skull from serious injury when struck. The eye is guarded from danger by the nasal organ, the cheek bones, and brow. The spinal cord is safely secluded within its osseous covering.

In all the higher mammals the bony structures of the fore and hind limbs are fundamentally the same, and the modifications undergone in these organs have all been effected through functional and anatomical adaptation to changed conditions of life. In that upright mammal, man, each extremity is provided with thirty bones. The upper arm bone (humerus) corresponds to the thigh bone of the leg (femur). The bones of the fore-arm (radius and ulna) correspond to the shin bone and splint bone (fibula and tibia). Of wrist bones there are eight, and there are seven ankle bones. There are respectively five bones to the palm and instep, and fourteen finger and fourteen toe bones. No bone is present in the elbow which corresponds to that of the kneecap, but the wrist possesses one bone more than the ankle. Each arm and leg consequently consists of thirty osseous structures.

The junction of two bones forms a joint. The joints of the pelvis, and of the various bones which compose the skull, are so firmly interlocked that they are immovable. On the other hand, movable joints possess a couple of cartilages which enable the bones to turn. The most important mobile joints are those of the limbs. Coleman thus describes the ball-and-socket and hinge joints:—

> When one end of the bone is rounded and fits into a cuplike hollow, the joint allows motion in all directions, and is known as a ball-and-socket joint. The hip joints and shoulder joints are examples. A hinge joint allows motion in only two (opposite) directions; for example, the to-and-fro motion of the elbow.

Pivot joints permit of rotary movement, while gliding joints possess the power of sliding one upon another.

Movable joints are held in position by the ligaments which bind the bones together. Bones are safeguarded from injury by means of a coating of cartilage lying at their terminals, while friction during the bending of a joint is lessened by the synovial fluid which lubricates the cartilages. The escape of this fluid into the adjacent tissues is prevented by the collar-like capsule which embraces the joint. The free surfaces of bones upon which they glide over each other are coated by a delicate membrane and this membrane secretes the lubricating liquid scientifically known as the synovia.

The blood channels enter the bones from the periosteum. The bone's life is maintained by its supply of blood. With the removal of the periosteum, the larger vascular vessels are eliminated, and when this happens the adjacent bone perishes. But the bone itself may be removed, and if the periosteum be permitted to remain, the bone will be restored. Experiment has proved that the circulation of the blood throughout the osseous structures is surprisingly rapid:—

> A curious proof of the active circulation in the bone is furnished when madder is mixed with the food of pigs. In a few hours the bones become a darker pink than usual; and if the madder is fed to the pigs for a few days, their bones become red.

The Leicester Secular Society.

A Few More Notes.

The friendly hand of "Mimnermus" has given an interesting account of the Leicester Secular Society (Freethinker, April 21). As I was Secretary and Organizer of the institution, 1899-1908, and am still a member, though located in a very churchy London suburb, perhaps I may be allowed to add a few more notes. So long ago as 1883, when the chair was taken for me by Thomas Wright (son of Michael Wright, one of the founders), I gave my first lecture on its platform, and, the year after, George Jacob Holyoake presided when I lectured the second time. And as, only a few months ago, I had the pleasure of talking to the Sunday-school, as well as speaking to the adults, in the old familiar hall, the reader may agree that I ought to know something of (as Patrick Geddes would say), the Place, the Work, and the People.

I doubt if any hall in Europe, or America, or elsewhere, quite fulfils for its social environment just such a function, both intellectual and municipal, as this at Leicester. Perhaps it would be difficult now to establish another of like pattern. When it was founded (1881), movements which are now strong—labour, free libraries, Sunday lectures, and the non-theological press—were then relatively weak, and eager spirits discovered in the hall at Humberstone Gate a unique centre for learning and discussing new ideas on religion, history, literature, economics, and the rest. Leicester has since developed a big Socialist activity; it has a fine Shoe-trades hall; it possesses some thirty Council schools, a group of free libraries, and a good museum—open on Sundays. This social and civic life has been all the time, and for nearly forty years, leavened with a wide-viewing Freethought. There are churches and chapels in the town quite juvenile compared with the Secular Hall, and the present generation, accustomed to the sight of this Rationalist cathedral, only smile at the recollection of the orthodox groans that greeted the opening in 1881.

I have used the phrase "wide-viewing Freethought," because I had in mind the five busts which adorn the front of the building, and which were selected by the Father of the place, Josiah Gimson. The five busts represent Robert Owen, Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Sokrates, and Jesus. When the bust of Jesus appeared, and smiled engagingly at Leicester's priests, Nonconformists and shoe-hands, the local clericalism passed many sleepless nights. But time heals all, and I remember that a distinguished Baptist of the town attended one of our Secular bazaars, and handed me, as Secretary, ten pounds; and, to make the gift more golden, his mace-bearer accompanied him. Often, as I have passed those five remarkable busts, I have spiritually saluted Josiah Gimson for his choice. To me, they symbolize Socialism, English Common-sense, French wit, Greek Philosophy, and Catholic Poetry; though I rather fancy that, to Councillor Gimson (Josiah was a member of the Town Council), the figure of Jesus would have stood for what he called Christian Secularism. Yet "Mimnermus" will agree, if no one else does, that Poetry and Secularism ought to go well together. And this reference to poetry calls to mind the fact that a portrait of the poet Thomson, B.V., hangs in the Hall. It was given by Mr. John Barrs, with whom Thomson lived once as guest at Kirby Muxloe, near Leicester, and who, as "Jack," appears jocularly in Thomson's lines on "Belvoir Castle."

As descriptive reporter, I might fill columns with tales of the Debaters, Co-operators, Socialists, Individualists, Critics, Artists, Scientists, Clergy, and Cranks, who, as members, or lecturers, or visitors, have fluttered in and out of Larner Sugden's red-brick temple for more than a generation, and helped to preserve the soul of Leicester from decay and dulness. Many I have only heard tell of; many I have known face to face; and at the graves, or the cremation-rite of many, I have uttered a serious, but never gloomy, farewell.[1] Some brisk young veterans (if the term may pass) still recall the early and stormier days of the Society. Such a one is William Lee, whom I lit upon in a remote Nottinghamshire village recently, still permeating his neighbours with progressive notions, and thrilling the local Adult School with sensible questions.[2] Another such is William Wilber, who never forgets the Bible which he studied in Christadelphian days, and who can make excellent use of Scripture in discussion. Long would be the list if I named the sons and daughters of the hall who are worthy of honourable remembrance. Such, for example, was William Holyoak, the ancient bookseller, who was born in the time of George III., whose soul was staunch as granite, whose manner was simple and gentle, and who cheered us with his quavering ballads. And another was Mrs. Perkins, who, unskilled in book-learning, possessed vigorous common sense, and an extraordinary spirit of devotion to the Society. For bazaars, "socials," teas, operetta-preparations, excursions, and the like, she had a genius of resource, enthusiasm, and good temper, and no saint of the Middle Ages surpassed her genuineness of service.

I would sooner not say anything at all about the Leicester Secular Society if I had to omit the name of Josiah's son, Sydney, the President for many years past. When I was an officer of the Institute, a sort of etiquette would have prevented my praising him. But now that I am removed from his immediate circle, I trouble not to ask his august permission, and I affirm here that he is a most honest and just man, a capable and straightforward administrator; and, as a Town Councillor (though I am sorry he does not belong to the same political party as I do), he is respected and valued by people of all varieties of opinion. He can give you his reminiscences of William Morris, who lectured at the Hall some thirty years ago or more. If he wrote a book of anecdotes, he could enliven it with little tales of visitors to the Hall platform—Holyoake, Foote, Watts, Touzeau Parris, Joseph Symes, and many others, over whom now hangs the purple banner of death; and I am glad that so many co-workers still live to lend his Society the aid of their voices. As he sits in his well-stocked library, and conjures up the faces of living or dead comrades in the great Thought Exploration, to which Leicester has so richly contributed, he must have a large vision of fellowships,

[1] Yes, but it perplexes one why Freethinkers should approve (and rightly so) of funeral addresses, but attempt little or no provision for ceremonial at marriage, or for the welcoming of infants.

[2] Mr. Lee is father-in-law to Mr. Joseph McCabe.

and behold a gallery crowded with brave and genial figures. Yet none is more brave and genial than himself. I know that I speak for a multitude when I express the wish that he may, many and many a time, still preside at the Sunday evening meetings in the Secular Hall, and look down with joy at the people who come to listen, to criticize, to appreciate, and to applaud.

The Soul of Beauty.

How wonderful is a tree—as wonderful as a man, and as likely to have a soul, and with as much need for it. Soul is but the abstract essence of the ideal, the mystery, metaphysic, or romance with which the natural psychology of the rational being invests the objects, etc., of experience. Man, for instance, thus transforms his environment, or his environment transforms him.

How beautiful is night—still, quiet, dusky night, lustrous with the stars. Orion blazoning himself abroad in the heavens, the Pleiades overhead, and near these, a solitary blazing orb, the brightest of all. But we are no astronomer, much less astrologer, or dealer in mystery or magic of any kind, however "orthodox"; the natural interpretation sufficeth us, the monistic soul of beauty in the quiet country road, under the trees, under the stars; nor do we, in cant phrase, look through nature up to nature's God; it were as legitimate to look through nature, down or up, to nature's Devil; for there are good and evil, more or less evenly balanced, and apart from the idiosyncrasies of mannikin himself; good and evil sufficient to prove, or disprove, either, but between the two is the soul of beauty and the compensation of life.

It was a mild, clear, night in mid-winter, more like Spring, or early or late Summer, on the winding way the trees almost met overhead, all jewelled with the stars! Never had jewels such a setting, and never was setting adorned with such perfect gems. The tall trees with their lofty brooms swept the skies, and the star dust on the floor of heaven sparkled the brighter. Notwithstanding, the road was dark below, and lonely, and, resting in the grateful gloom, we only feared we frightened the passing woman with the lamp, timid and brave, bent on some errand of duty or mercy, so we lit our pipe to reassure the solitary maid, or matron, as she might be, but, to us, the Lady of the Lamp. The footsteps died away, and we lingered still. Seeing and feeling, thinking and imagining, are sometimes eerie occupations. Frankly, we grew afraid. Of what? Nothing! we thought of "the child in the world," and feared—everything. We had been reading L'homme que Rit, "The Man who Laughed," that amazing production of a gigantic and exuberant, often extravagant, genius, re-reading it, and pondering its purple passages, its significant sentences; its lurid light on English history; its terrors of legal and religious ghouls; its poignant glances into the deepest deep of human psychology. To think deeply is to be alone. To know is to be armed—or defenceless—against a thousand dangers, Concentration, says Victor Hugo, is solitude. How well our author loved, how completely he understood, children.....The philosopher had fed and bedded the foundlings:—

> The little boy and girl, lying naked side by side, were joined through the silent hours, in the seraphic promiscuousness of the shadows; such dreams as were possible to their age floated from one to the other.....Such innocence in such darkness, such purity in such an embrace, such foretastes of heaven are only possible to childhood, and no immensity approaches the greatness of little children.....Innocence is higher than virtue.....They slept. They were in peace. They were warm.....They were there as in the nest of the abyss.
> Their lips were four red roses on a stem,
> Which in their summer beauty kissed each other.

Frankly, this is a digression. Up from the sylvan valley came the music of a stream, filtered, diffused, making the "hush" audible. We thought of Byron's Bonnivard and his prison floor, "worn until his steps had left a trace": and also, in a psychological sense, of this narrow environ of our own, but made beautiful and boundless in the subtle chemistry of habit, time, and reflection. From the printer's "Mercury" to the Prime Minister, a rut of habit and custom awaits us all at last; but—

> Stone walls do not a prison make,
> Nor iron bars a cage.

The mind is the monarch always.

> Eternal spirit of the chainless mind!
> Brightest in dungeons, Liberty, thou art!
> For there thy habitation is the heart.

And has not Scotland's own beloved bard said:—

> The heart, aye's, the part, aye,
> That mak's us richt or wrang?

But these are matters too high for the humbler muse..... Not by night alone, in this denizen, is the soul of beauty found. Here the day also has its riches, that grow more alluring with every fresh experience, every supreme psychological moment of deep sadness or great joy. Shakespeare, we said, as we walked by the stream, on its fantastically rooted banks of brown mould carpeted with living green, with its cascades, and sermons in stones; Shakespeare, we mused, and Burns, were vastly over-rated persons. Why, they were merely natural and truthful, as most other men were false and artificial. Thus the great men are little; thus only they are great. Such is the great idea of a little man. It is simple—and profound. The vast learning of a Victor Hugo is forgotten, and out of his rational, humane, simple, loving touches is formed the enduring statue of his fame—or, perhaps, the one may breed the other.

But great learning, it seems to us, while not to be despised, is often mere sophistry—a middle flooring, too high for earth, too low for heaven—a wondrous new heaven and new earth, but in the midst of which its creator, self-exiled, dwells, unhappy and alone, and only its shadow falls on those below. .....These were night thoughts, of the midnight of the year; as we recall them it is April, and Winter lingers in the lap of Spring. Cold is the passing wind, reminding us of the passing years, but most of wasted time and mistaken efforts. However, it is our —th birthday. One cannot begin life with the wisdom of fifty years!.....The further bank is hung with tattered fern, and ivy tendrils, pendant, stray and swing, and the glade beyond is brown with littered leaves, and all but the winds and the waters are still; the soul of peace and beauty and music broods and mingles in the scene.

The birds are silent. Only the winds and waters make perpetual sound. From whence to where those winds of yesterday and to-morrow? To what and whither blowing us on their constant, austere, inexorable, viewless wings? Ah! ask the inexorable—and incorrigible—War Lords; supplicate the jack-boot and the iron heel. Davus sum non Œdipus. Nor are we Alexander the Great.....Underneath are the roots of memory! Growth in the soil, gravitation in the water, sculpture in the stones; in all, health, hope, happiness, peace, content, the soul of beauty; and we would not gain the whole world and lose this, our own soul. No, a thousand times, no!

Andrew Millar.

A Christian's Prayer.

(When duty calls him to cross the ocean in war-time.)

Oh, thou who once on stormy Galilee
Did'st bid the mighty billows "Peace, be still";
Who hushed the raging of the angry sea,
And walked upon the waters at thy will,
Forgive me if my faith be cold and mean,
But canst thou circumvent a submarine?

Two thousand years ago thou could'st do aught;
E'en mountains would remove if thou decreed so:
But hast thou kept apace with modern thought,
And made innocuous the Hun torpedo?
The Galilee of which thou wert so fond
Is somewhat shallower than the Herring Pond.....

Dear Lord, I hesitate to hint a doubt
Of thy goodwill or power to succour me,
But sons of every Church go daily out,
And daily their dead bodies mar the sea.
Oh God, until the day of peace shall come
I'll praise thy saving grace—and stay at home.

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

A RATIONALIST "GREAT ADVANCE."

WILL YOU HELP?

In view of the organized efforts now being made on the part of the Churches to awaken a "Religious Revival" on a colossal scale (vide Cardinal Bourne's Manifesto and similar pronouncements), it has been decided to make a counter effort by circulating Rationalist books in tens of thousands, if not indeed hundreds of thousands, throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The four following books have been chosen for the inauguration the campaign, and others will be drawn upon later:—

1. THE AGE OF REASON. By Thomas Paine. 128 pp.; 3d. net, by post 4d.
2. THE CHURCHES AND MODERN THOUGHT. By P. Vivian. 432 pp.; 9d. net, by post 1s.
3. THE CHRISTIAN HELL, from the First to the Twentieth Century. By Hypatia Bradlaugh Bonner. 160 pp., with 28 illustrations; 6d. net, by post 7½d.
4. THE RELIGION OF THE OPEN MIND. By Adam Gowans Whyte, author of "The World's Wonder Stories," etc. 160 pp.; 9d. net, by post 10½d.

The above four books contain a reasoned and searching criticism of the teachings of the Churches, and also an effective presentment of the constructive case for Rationalism. No impartial person can read them without having his mind broadened, if not transformed.

It is no exaggeration to say that "The Churches and Modern Thought" has already brought many thousands into the ranks of Rationalism; while it is certain that "The Age of Reason" has, during its eventful history, shattered the convictions of hundreds of thousands who previously had belonged to some religious denomination. "The Christian Hell" is a thorough exposure of probably the most repellent teachings of Orthodoxy, aided by striking photographs reproduced from religious publications. Mr. Whyte, in his "Religion of the Open Mind," writes persuasively and with a master hand, at one and the same time entrancing the reader by his captivating style and compelling acceptance of the scientific truths which he sets forth. It is, in short, doubtful whether any other four books are better suited for the inquiring mind, or more likely to arouse interest in the Gospel of Reason.

Readers of "The Freethinker" are earnestly invited to assist in launching "THE BIG PUSH" which Messrs. Watts are planning with all the resources at their command. Without co-operation little can be accomplished; with it, wonderful results may follow. Every Freethinker is asked to order at least one copy of each of the above four books for distribution among his friends or in his immediate district; and those who are in a position to help more generously are requested to order six or a dozen copies. Those friends who prefer to send a donation in aid of the work may do so with every confidence that it will be used to the fullest advantage, especially in regard to the circulation of free copies to oldiers in the camps at home and in the trenches abroad.

One copy of each of the four books will be forwarded, carriage paid, to any inland address for 2s. 9d.; six copies of each for 14s.; or twelve of each for 26s. The Trade will be supplied with quantities on very liberal terms.

Address all communications to Messrs. Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C. 4.

Views and Opinions.

The New Education Bill.

The new Education Bill of Mr. Fisher has not yet been brought before the House of Commons. Education can always wait, although in this case the plea of military necessity has some justification. Still, with a Government in which a Minister classifies books as "luxuries," and which sees in an educational scheme little more than a possibility of turning out more efficient human adjuncts by way of creating more trade, one cannot expect the task of education to be undertaken with a due sense of the importance of the question. In this, at least, the Government may be said to reflect the nation. The bulk of the English people never have taken education as they ought to have taken it. After lagging far behind many continental countries, a few ardent reformers, in 1870, forced a general Education Act on the country. It was agreed to by the people, mainly on account of the docility of the general public—a docility which in this case made for good. Since then, people have sent their children to school mainly because there was an Act of Parliament which said they should do so. But large numbers of the working classes have always regarded schooling as more or less of a nuisance, as is shown by their readiness to get their children away from school as soon as possible; and others have treated education as a sort of introduction to the "upper classes," to reach which the average Englishman will make any and every sacrifice.

A Probable Policy.

The new Education Bill does not deal with the question of religion in the schools. But it would be folly to assume that it has been either overlooked or forgotten. Too great a vested interest is involved for that. The question has really been more or less under discussion all the time. The upholders of religion in the schools have been busy, and unless the friends of Secular Education are on their guard, they will find, almost before they are aware of it, that the clergy have scored another triumph. And this Government of tricks and traps will be equal to the occasion. It is clearly its intention to get its Education Bill without touching the religious question at all. And if it is not raised on the discussion of the Bill, it will be because an agreement to that effect has been reached behind the scenes. Conferences between the various religious denominations have been going on all the time—some public, some private. It was because we were aware of this that we urged Freethinkers all over the country to get resolutions passed in favour of Secular Education, and to see that they were sent on to the Minister for Education. And when some kind of a bargain has been struck between the sects and the Government, and the Education Bill passed, we may expect to see a small Bill, dealing specifically with religion, rushed through the House of Commons and placed on the Statute Book. And that will mean the establishing of religion in the public schools on a firmer foundation than ever.

A Warning to Freethinkers.

The danger of this is real. And to leave it to the existing House of Commons is quite useless. The present House of Commons will submit to anything; it will agree to anything. The Government can order it to do as it pleases, and it will obey—unless it receives a more imperative order from without. That is the vital thing to bear in mind. As the majority of members do not appear to have any convictions of their own, it is well that those who elect them should make them feel that they at least possess opinions, and are determined that those opinions shall receive attention. There are, there must be, some millions of Freethinkers in this country. There were seven millions in France at the last census, and we refuse to believe that Britain is so far behind her in mental development as not to have at least two-thirds of that number. And, beside avowed Freethinkers, there are large numbers of people who sufficiently recognize the justice of Secular Education as to support it. Let, then, the friends of Secular Education get everywhere to work. See that resolutions in its favour are passed wherever and whenever possible, and that these are sent to the proper quarters. See that members of constituencies are written to, let them know the opinions of at least some of their constituents; that strong opinions are held on the subject, and that voters will act on them when the time comes for recording votes. It is really time that Freethinkers aimed at making their existence felt as Freethinkers. If churches and chapels organize for a purely sectarian advantage, there is no reason whatever why Freethinkers should not also organize to secure an act of justice towards the whole of the nation.

Justice for the Child.

An Act of Justice! That is the strength of our position. We, at least, are not out for a sectarian advantage. We have no desire that children shall be taught in the public schools, at the public expense, our particular views on the nature of religion. That would be to take the same advantage of the child that the religionist takes, but in the other direction. We aim at justice for the adult, and freedom for the child. It is little short of an outrage that generation after generation the childhood of the nation should be exploited in the interest of a selfish sectarianism. Not even the parent is justified in forcing upon the child as absolutely true, religious doctrines which he knows are probably false, and which are, at any rate, questioned by the leading thinkers of the civilized world. The political injustice of compelling all sections of the community to pay for the religion of a selected few is manifest—so manifest that on that ground no one defends it. But the moral injustice is greater still. We want the child to grow up mentally fitted to select any religion it pleases, or able to intelligently reject them all should it feel so inclined. Childhood has one clear demand from the adult—the right of protection. And the adult fails conspicuously in that when he does not protect the growing mind of the child from the machinations of an interested priesthood.

The Flowing Tide.

The secularization of life is one of the chief signs of advancing civilization. All over the world we see the growing separation of the life of religion from the life of the State, and, in some instances, as in France, the process is complete. The life of the State is common to all, that of religion is an idiosyncracy of the individual. Even where the Church is still part of the State, sheer force of circumstances prevents the State forcing a particular religion on the individual. And in ceasing to force religion on the adult individual, the State, surely, surrenders all right to force it on the child. The only reason why the child is forced to have religion is the reason why a man beats a child—it is not big enough or strong enough to hit back. It is the child's weakness, its ignorance, its trustfulness, that is being exploited, and through that there goes on the exploiting of civilization. Freethinkers know this to be the case, they should see to it that others recognize it as well. In this matter a more militant policy is needed, and we, for one, hope that it will be pursued.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Defeat of the Cross.

IN the Times there now appear weekly articles on the Christian religion which, though ably written, are characterized by tantalizing vagueness. What the real theological position of the writer is no one can tell. The title of one of the latest is highly significant, namely, "Preaching the Gospel: the New Evangelism"; but it is impossible to discover from it what the Gospel or the New Evangelism stands for. The opening sentence is of a perplexingly ambiguous nature: "At the heart of Christianity there is unchanging truth"; but as to what that truth is the article does not furnish us with the faintest glimmer of an idea. We are assured that "it is truth which matches the needs of all men," and that "every one may understand it and respond to it"; but such an assurance conveys no enlightenment whatever. We do not even know what the heart of Christianity is, much less, what truth, if any, is deposited therein; and to assert that an unspecified, undefined, truth "matches the needs of all men" is to be blindly dogmatic. The next sentence is a veritable glorification of vagueness: "But Christianity is not merely truth; it is also life." Christianity is here stated to be what in the former statement it was said to contain. As a matter of fact Christianity, as described in the New Testament, is neither truth nor life, but a system, device, or power whose supreme object is to remove guilty but believing sinners from under the wrath of God. We are now confronted by the most astounding claim conceivable:—

> The Gospel is the proclamation of this Truth and the gift of this new Life. It thus transfigures those who accept it, conferring on men powers by which sooner or later they recreate the world in which they live.

The distinguishing mark of that extract is its untruth. St. Paul defines the Gospel as the power of God unto the salvation of those who believe and put their truth in it; but the Times reduces it to a mere proclamation. And yet it is alleged that those who accept it as such are transfigured, becoming new men and women under its moulding influence, charged with "powers by which sooner or later they recreate the world in which they live." Those who are fairly well versed in the history of Christendom, if not dominated by prejudice, know how absolutely false that allegation is, the truth and the life which Christianity is declared to be having produced, on the one hand cruel tyranny, and, on the other, abject slavery. Popes and emperors were invariably jealous of one another, and for ages each fought with all his might to gain ascendancy over the other, while the subjects of both were trodden under foot. The amazing fact is, however, that after making such great claims for the Gospel, the writer of the Times article, in the second decade of the twentieth century of Christianity, is obliged to make the following humiliating confession:—

> Organized Christianity is under a cloud; the Church does not attract the great mass of the people, who, failing to gain from it what they need, have either abandoned all spiritual effort, or have turned for the inspiration of great ideals and the challenge of strenuous service to trade unions and friendly societies, the labour and women movements, or religious cults such as Theosophy and Christian Science. The Gospel is not attracting men and women to-day.

Now, had Christianity, particularly in the Ages of Faith, transfigured its professors, conferring upon them powers by which they could recreate the world, such a passage as the one just cited could not have been written to-day. We would have been living in a transformed, regenerated world in which such a calamity as the present War would have been an impossibility. The mass of the people are now alienated from the Church simply because it has at last dawned upon them that its Gospel is a sham, and that its claims for itself have been completely falsified. The writer of the article is wholly mistaken when he affirms that "the great mass of the English people are Christians in feeling, sentiment, and desire," and that "nothing is farther from their thought than to reject Christianity." Has he never heard of the propagandist activities of the Ethical Societies, the Rationalist Press Association, and the National Secular Society with its numerous Branches? Has he not learned that modern science is non-Christian, and in some instances anti-Christian? Does he not know that in all sections of society, specially among the workers, unbelievers in their tens of thousands are to be found? He is evidently under the delusion that churches and chapels are being deserted solely because the clergy have lost the art of preaching. As to the mass of the English people, we are informed:—

> Nothing is farther from their thought than to reject Christianity. Too often, however, it is presented to them in a jargon they do not understand. The forms of worship to which they are invited offer them rites and ceremonies which are meaningless to their minds. The sermons they hear take for granted views about which they have grave doubts, and the preachers, if they do not discuss topics of minor importance, use arguments which bring no conviction. The official representatives of the Church seem to live in another world than that of the average man's experience. Consequently, many are "Gospel hardened," while others are puzzled if not chagrined by a presentation of a religion from which they know they can derive no benefit.

In that extract there is considerable truth, but its main contention is contradicted by the facts. It is incontestable that the majority of the clergy do their work as well as it can be done. No remissness of any kind can be laid to their charge. In intellectual calibre and loyalty to duty they compare favourably with those of any past age. Their non-success is due to no professional fault of theirs, but to the fact that the Gospel which it is their business to preach has lost is hold upon the minds of the people, because its central message no longer appeals to them as true. It is true that "men do not ask for a new Gospel," but that is no proof whatever that they would welcome the old Gospel if only it could be differently presented to them, the truth being that they desire no version whatever of a supernatural Gospel. Such a Gospel cannot be expressed "in terms level to their experience and needs," because experience and observation combined have convinced them that supernaturalism in all its forms is powerless to deliver the world from the evils which darken and befoul its life.

What is needed to-day, therefore, is not a new statement of the old Gospel, or a reconstruction of the theology of the Cross, but a vivid realization of the truth that the Church's teaching as to the power and glory of the alleged supernatural factors in human life is but the baseless fabric of a dream. With the honest historian's eye upon us, we are driven to the conclusion that in conflict with the world's forces the Cross has been totally defeated. Dr. Fort Newton recently preached an eloquent sermon on "The Victory of the Cross"; but on his own showing, a more appropriate title for his discourse would have been "The Defeat of the Cross," as we hope to prove in a future contribution.

Browning as a Religious Teacher.

Browning as a Philosophical and Religious Teacher. By Professor Henry Jones. (Nelson.) 1s. 6d.

Robert Browning will live as a poet, but his attitude as a philosophical thinker was unimpressive. In fact, his intellectual position was simply that of acquiescence with current theology and codified morality. His situation in regard to the thought of his age was paradoxical, if not inconsistent. His admirers counted him as a second Shakespeare, but he sentimentalized where Shakespeare thought; he stammered where Shakespeare sang. Browning was less in touch with the intellectual movements of his own time than Tennyson, Matthew Arnold, or George Meredith. He was content, in his own peculiar fashion, to fight during an exceptionally long life in the ranks of religious conservatism.

Browning was obsessed with theology, and wrote much on theological subjects. His early Nonconformist education, his serious cast of mind, the very character of his genius, all tended to make religious matters interesting to him. In Saul, Christmas Eve and Easter Day, in The Ring and the Book, and many other poems, he has attempted to depict the heart of the Christian superstition. Truly, he had a robust faith. He was as anthropomorphic as any half-lettered tradesman who sat at the feet of the Boanerges of the Newington Tabernacle, whose passport to remembrance is that he was the last of the notable preachers of the doctrine of eternal damnation. Browning was a poet, and Spurgeon was the prosiest of preachers, but they had too much in common. Here, for example, is Browning's poetical way of expressing his childlike belief:—

'Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for! My flesh that I seek In the Godhead! I seek, and I find it! O Saul, it shall be A face like my face that receives thee; a man like to me
Thou shalt love, and be loved by, for ever: a hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See the Christ stand!

Browning was quite certain about immortality. He apostrophises the dead Evelyn Hope:—

So hush! I will give you this leaf to keep:
See, I shut it inside the sweet, cold hand!
There, that is our secret; go to sleep!
You will wake, and remember, and understand.

With blithe, critical assurance Browning expresses the cheap, current ideas regarding Rationalism:—

What can I gain on the denying side?
Ice makes no conflagration.

Browning did not lack critical acumen, but, like Pascal and Newman, he chloroformed his intellect with the supernatural. As Joubert says, wittily, it is so easy to believe in "God" if one never troubles about definitions. In Christmas Eve the poet listens to the theological professor, who, after demolishing the divinity of Christ, tells his audience that the myth thus destroyed still leaves a man. The poet goes on to say, with a plainness which leaves no room for quibbling, that if Christ were not God he was nothing. He cannot even find him a place among the great ethical teachers. The same idea occurs in A Death in the Desert:—

If Christ, as thou affirmest, be of men
Mere man, the first and best, but nothing more—
Account him, for reward of what he was,
Now and forever, wretchedest of all.
. . . . .
Call Christ, then, the illimitable God, or lost!

So often called a profound thinker, Browning's conclusions, which harmonize too well with popular religious prejudice, are dangerously facile and commonplace. The wish is too frequently the father of the thought, and the grandfather of many dogmas. It is this which vitiates his claim to be considered a philosopher in verse. Truth may ring regnant in the lines of Abt Vogler:—

And what is our failure here but a triumph's evidence
For the fulness of the days?

But, unfortunately, the conclusion is in itself illogical. Browning's optimism was as robust and as impertinent as that of Doctor Pangloss, so brilliantly satirized by the great Voltaire. To read Browning in sickness, or in great sorrow or physical suffering, in that dire resort to which men are pushed often, "with close-lipped Patience for their only friend," would be well-nigh impossible. There are moments when the statement, "God's in his heaven," seems very questionable to the staunchest believer. And there are frequent moments when "All's right with the world" is a gratuitous insult to common sense and ordinary eye-sight. Optimism is well; but, pushed too far, it becomes, not optimism, but sheer callousness and insensibility.

It is all of a piece, like the all-embracing faith of the complacent Bishop Blougram;—

I hear you recommend, I might at least
Eliminate, declassify my faith,
Since I adopt it, keeping what I must
And leaving what I can—such points as this:
I won't—that is, I can't—throw one away.
Supposing there's no truth in what I hold
About the need of trial to men's faith,
Still, when you bid me purify the same,
To such a process I discern no end,
Clearing off one excrescence to see two,
There's ever a next in size, now grown as big
That meets the knife: I cut and cut again!
First cut the Liquefaction, what comes last
But Fichte's clever cut at God himself?

Note the lame and impotent conclusion:—

Experimentalise on sacred things!
I trust not hand, nor eye, nor heart, nor brain,
To stop betimes; they all get drunk alike.
The first step I am master not to take.

Christian apologists never tire of speaking of Browning as a typical Christian poet. They are justified in making the most of a man of real genius when they possess one. We do not quarrel with them for that. It is perfectly plain that if Browning were not a Christian, his language is elaborately adapted rather to conceal and misrepresent his mind than to express it. His was a religious temperament. About that, at least, any doubt is impossible to any reader of his poetry, and his letters to his wife show it almost on every page. He always writes as an apologist for the belief in God, in free will, and human immortality, the "three buttresses of superstition," as Haeckel has termed them, happily. In all Browning's voluminous writings there is only one utterance in which he really runs counter to the current views on the Christian superstition. In his powerful lines, "Apparent Failure," describing the tragedy of the old morgue at Paris, he almost forgot his orthodoxy. For a few fleeting minutes he realized that there were more things in heaven and earth than he had dreamt of in his pietistic philosophy.

All his life long Browning went on repeating, with inexhaustible fertility of illustration and ever-changing choice of language, the old shibboleths. The old leaven worked furiously in his veins, the cherished superstitions clung like mandrakes to the soil of his mind. Intellectual timidity runs through his work, bounding his outlook, shortening his hands, cramping the effort of which, had it been backed by more mental courage, such a genius as his might have been capable. Some of his poetry will survive, but his excursions into theology were belated when he wrote them. The orthodoxy of the Victorian era is to-day but a feast of husks, "vacant chaff well-meant for grain." Browning was too near, in his theological standpoint, to the clever, shifty Bishop Blougram. In religious speculation, Browning never launched out into the deep. He hugged the shore, never directing the prow of his ship towards the illimitable ocean, but ever seeking safe shelter under the shadow of the land. It was the safe rather than the heroic course that he exalted. For this reason, Browning, as a philosophical and religious teacher, can never give the full satisfaction to intellectual minds which they can derive from those who have gone forward wherever their intellect may have led.

MIMNERMUS.

A Farewell Sermon.

AND OTHER MATTERS.

MY friend from the city was having a week-end at the coast. Said friend is, mentally and physically, built on large and generous lines—a man, in fact, of astonishing mentality—and a serious, imperturbable cheerfulness radiates from his ample Ingersollian countenance; he is, moreover, a "saintly" person, in the secular sense; a self-made saint, withal, for when very young he scrambled into the light from the most inner crypt of the Catholic Church. His brother, by the way, who was being educated for the Jesuit priesthood, much later in life, learned to laugh, and more derisively, at his sacred Alma Mater.

When I mentioned to my broad and genial visitor that the Rev. Trumbull Stipend would that Sunday preach his farewell sermon, on leaving the pulpit's narrow curve for the arena of Labour politics, he was at once interested. It came to pass that three or four of us drove up in a cab, as became a matter of so much moment; and, being late, we waited by the church plate—carefully emptied—while a lugubrious prayer was being said, and the minister and congregation pretended to abase themselves before the Most High. "Is this the rebel?" said my friend, as his face assumed a troubled expression very unusual to it. We were finally ushered into the very front pew, and literally sat under the pulpit, but with the compensation of being within "kissing distance" of the very pretty young ladies of the choir. They were irresistible. We stood or sat, at hymn or prayer, and patiently awaited the denouement. It never came. My friend seemed sad, but observant, and oh! so thoughtful. It was his first experience in twenty-four years, and he bore it like the stoic philosopher he was. The preacher was young, almost boyish-looking, with fresh, full voice, but only half used, in the subdued, submissive whine of the pulpit—that very language of slavery. There was not one spark of vital fire. Was this the man that was to head the revolt of the oppressed? His face was full and fair, and all unlined—the constant enemy, it would seem, of famine and thought. He spoke prettily and emotionally of Christ washing the disciples' feet to teach them humility. One reflected that "the Master" might have begun at the other end of his disciples, and taught them sense. The preacher, faithfully following his "Master's" example, traded—perhaps quite sincerely—on the emotions and superstitions of his hearers. Young ladies wept outwardly at his final words. The stranger crowd of Atheists, Agnostics, Socialists, Unitarians, Trinitarians, Nothingarians, etc., wept inwardly. (The church will be duly fumigated.) For the matter stood thus: the Rev. Trumbull Stipend was coming out of the Church to do the larger work he was not allowed to do within the Church; and the preacher gave the Church not even a parting rebuke, much less the wholesale condemnation it deserved. So much for the Church. The question now is: Will the politician be any better than the preacher? In Paine's phrase, Will the representative be any better than the man?

A few weeks ago the writer attended a patriotic temperance demonstration in the local town hall. The audience was small. The large platform party was composed of parsons and pious laymen. Prayer opened the proceedings. A benediction closed them. The speaking was of the most mediocre kind. Even the "orator of orators," a certain Dr. Poling, a new great "Ingersoll" from America, spoke only the common press gibberish about the War in crisp epigrammatic nasal phrases. He was refreshing, but not convincing, even of his own sincerity. The whole exhibition was futile, effete, and pathetic; and the platform party inevitably suggested flotsam from an ancient wreck slowly breaking up in the winds and waves of time. For at that very moment Britain's "drunken soldiers" were opposed to the full fury of the German War machine. And these pitiful moralists would dictate to these men their parsonic idea of perfect conduct—men living—and dying—at their country's command, in such a hell as the world has never known before.

They would "reform" us these people. We would reciprocate, and reform them. A journalist, at the local "Literary," commenting on a paper read by the present writer, said he had "put his Foote in it," but was not without hope that essayist would yet return to the fold. "God forbid!" What! Exchange for a mouldy superstition the sublime certainties of a lifetime? Turn my back on the modern spirit, and return to the shadow of the Middle Ages? Come down from the mountains of vision and live a mole's life, blind, underground? No, thanks; and no fear. Besides, it is impossible.

. . . . .

One turns from these puerilities to the battlefield and the question of war itself. In those torturing "night thoughts," when the mind, strained and sensitive, lies awake, and the last big German offensive bulks in the foreground, and the facts have filtered through, and we see all too clearly, with the eye of sympathy and understanding, reason, and humanity, those soldiers disputing every inch of blackened soil, or in confusion firing on one another, perishing in myriads by wounds, poison, hunger, and sheer exhaustion, in the awful exigencies of the great retreat. And then we think of our Christian journalist, suggesting a change of menu, or a return to his muddled piety, and we can only ejaculate: "Good God!" For why, the thing itself is there, staring in the face all who are not blind and idiotic, or merely bestial.

Amang the Lasses O!

There are three leading reasons why the clergy should exercise all their ingenuity to obtain the support of women. Firstly, male church adherents are a dwindling band; secondly, women are more directly in contact with the rising generation at its most impressionable stage than men are; and thirdly, women now have the Parliamentary vote, which enables them to share in the control and direction of the national economy, and incidentally to help in deciding a question that we may be sure will arise in the not distant future, namely, whether the Established Churches are to remain in their present position with relation to the State, or whether that position is to be modified.

In view of these newly acquired rights and responsibilities, we are somewhat surprised to learn that Scottish Suffragettes should have given the clergy a gratuitous and wholly unearned advertisement by assisting at the performance of a farce, in the shape of a "United Thanksgiving Service," which was held in the Synod Hall at Edinburgh on Feb. 16, 1918. The Christian Suffragette has apparently, by the exuberance of her feelings, placed herself in a very invidious position (to say the least) with reference to her unbelieving sisters and brothers. Her participation in a "Service of Thanksgiving" for the Parliamentary vote betrays ignorance or misconception of history, which it is hoped cannot be laid to the charge of the majority of women voters. But, of course, it gave the D.D.'s and a group of clerically minded laymen an opportunity of posing as friends of freedom and reform. Such individuals are always to be found vociferously cheering the winners; and in these trying times the Churches cannot afford to neglect any opportunity of making a bid for popular patronage.

The newspaper report of this "Service," which has just been brought to our notice, states that the Societies represented were the National Union, the Women's Freedom League, the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise (where were the Radical and Socialist women?), the United Suffragists, the Northern Men's Federation, the University Graduates, and the Churches League. We cannot believe that, with all its capacity, the last-mentioned organization managed to gobble up all the rest! Nevertheless, it is an imposing show—on paper—and Freethinkers will do well to recognize that if the Churches can succeed in nobbling the bulk of the Suffrage and Socialist organizations (which is patently their objective) they will be doing extremely good business for themselves. But we reserve our opinion as to the significance of the term "represented" in this connection. One may represent a thousand (to an extent) just as the other 999 or any other one of the 999 may. Freethinkers have ever been consistent advocates of safeguarding the rights of minorities as well as majorities, whatever their opinions. Even one solitary Freethinker who is a member of a society composed of 999 Christians and himself (or herself) is entitled to have his (or her) opinions represented and respected. And we venture with confidence to assert that the proportion of Freethinking members of Suffrage Societies (meaning thereby members who are definitely hostile to Christianity and every other species of supernaturalism) is much larger than one in a thousand. It is impossible to commend the manners of Christian Suffragettes who, ignoring all that has been done by Rationalistic agencies in the teeth of the bitter Christian opposition to secure emancipation for women, are foolish enough to represent organizations of which Freethinkers are members as mouthing thanks to the Christian deity for a boon that his principal and most influential representatives have strenuously striven to have withheld.

The Apostle Paul was very much in the background at this remarkable thanksgiving service. Indeed, his name does not seem to have been mentioned once in the course of the proceedings. A quarter of an hour of his presence would have given some spirit, and, probably, added considerable liveliness to the service, because, besides being an authority on woman's proper sphere, we are given to understand from the report of a conference at Jerusalem that he was remarkably tenacious of his opinions, and was not easily sat on or put down. But the twentieth-century parsons may breathe freely on this score, for the Apostle Paul, like Queen Anne, has gone over to the majority. And the worst that poor Paul can do is to writhe in his grave.

We regret that the newspaper report of the service does not give a sample of any of the "Special Suffrage Hymns" stated to have been rendered. As the service was held on a a week day why were the songs of Robert Burns all excluded? People will be getting the idea that the Scots are progressing—backwards. "Green Grow the Rashes O"!

Ignotus.

Acid Drops.

Says "The Rambler," in the Daily Mirror: "A Frenchman who knows General Foch tells me that he is an ardent believer in the power of prayer. 'We shall yet be saved by it,' he says, 'and it will not be the first time in this deadly struggle.'" There it is! An unknown person tells an anonymous writer that General Foch said something—which he probably never said at all—and some of the public will no doubt take it for "Gospel." We believe it is an offence under D.O.R.A. to do anything that will discredit his Majesty's Allies. Doesn't that apply to making the French Commander appear on the level of an evangelistic idiot straight from some chapel meeting?

We have considerable sympathy with a case of exemption granted at the Southwark Tribunal the other day. The applicant was a maker of padded rooms for lunatic asylums, and it was explained that if he were taken, the work would have to stop. The Tribunal decided that the work must not stop, and granted three months' exemption. With Europe in its present state, we incline to the opinion that the fitting up of lunatic asylums is really an "essential" industry.

A pocket Testament and a watch in his tunic pocket saved the life of Private Crouch, of Rotherham, by intercepting a German bullet. The watch was badly damaged, and some leaves of the book nearly destroyed. It thus appears that the secular watch did more than the sacred volume to save that soldier's life.

Over 350 nurses have fallen in the present War. This is a nobler record than that of the clergy, who have been exempted from military service. There are 50,000 parsons in this country, and the Army Chaplains receive officers' pay and do their work at a safe distance from the fighting fronts.

It looks as if the long-promised revival of religion will not come after all. A Church of England committee, which has been inquiring into the Evangelical work of the Church, reports that "public worship is on the decline," and that attendances at Sunday-schools are in a similar plight. This state of affairs may explain the bishops' anxiety for unity with other Christian bodies. What they are losing on the swings they hope to gain on the roundabouts.

We do not know who edits the Efficiency Magazine, but, judging from a page sent us by a correspondent, it looks as though it were edited by someone qualifying for an idiot asylum. A large type, extra leaded paragraph runs, "Darwin studied earthworms for twenty years, and then wrote a book; but what a pity that no earthworm studied Darwin." Judging by this paragraph, the editor's desire has been realized. A worm has been studying Darwin, and the product is worthy of its origin.

A meeting of the Newport Corporation, several members of which are clergymen, was recently converted into a prayer meeting. Several ministers engaged in prayer and hymns were sung. The Rev. A. A. Mathews moved that a united service of intercession should be held in the town. It was generally felt that we had arrived at a crisis in the War, and that, unless the Almighty was specially, and by a united town, besought to intervene in our favour, the biggest battle in history might go against us.

Driven by the dread of defeat, the Newportians, at two crowded gatherings, bombarded the Throne of Grace with passionate appeals for direct aid from on High. The mayor was present, "in scarlet robe and chain of office," supported by members of the Town Council; and many overflow meetings were held. One disadvantage was that the rules of his Church made it impossible for Father Hickey to be present, much as he desired to be. But the mayor even made a speech which was brimful of valuable information to the Deity. These meetings were held on the Wednesday, and on the Friday and Saturday the War news was much more favourable.

Following the appointment of General Foch as Generalissimo of the Allied Forces, a paragraph has been going the rounds of the press that the distinguished French soldier has given his testimony of the value to prayer. The statement is made on the authority of "a Frenchman." It would be far more interesting to hear the General's own version of the matter.

The clergy are slim! A similar statement to that put into the mouth of General Foch went the round of the papers recently, and was given to General Robertson. Then the Bishop of Birmingham writes to the Daily Post (Birmingham) suggesting that as these two Generals believe in prayer, might it not be well to organize daily prayer from 12 o'clock till 2 o'clock, etc.? Now, we are wondering! Who sent these paragraphs to the press? Did they really suggest the Bishop's advice, or were they intended to prepare the road for it? Decidedly, the clergy are slim!

Mr. Robert Blatchford, writing in the Sunday Chronicle, hits the nail on the head regarding the Irish question. He says that "the Irish difficulty is a religious difficulty," and that "if every man in Ireland were a Roman Catholic, or a Protestant, a Hindoo, or an Agnostic, or a Quaker, the Irish difficulty would be settled as early as daylight-saving or woman's suffrage." Politicians would do well to ponder these shrewd words.

In weak moments even the men of God tell the unvarnished truth about their own cause. The Rev. J. E. Roberts, of Manchester, on being elected President of the Baptist Union, confessed, as reported in the South Wales Daily News for April 24, that the Churches are a lamentable failure; that Tommy's invective about them was "hair-raising in its directness and its shattering simplicity"; and that at last "the men of Britain are ripe for a real religion," the only possible inference being that hitherto they have never had such a religion. What this journal has been saying for over twenty years is thus verified from an unexpected but welcome source.

The Bishop of London says the Christian Church is the "Oldest fighting regiment in Europe." As it has been responsible for many of the wars in Europe, it is only natural it should do some of the fighting. At present the officers of "the oldest fighting regiment" have decided to do their leading from behind, and the Government has acquiesced.

The Bishop says: "the first thing is to appeal to Almighty God. Well, they have been doing that ever since the War commenced, and the result is before the world. It was the Bishop of London who said of the War that there had not been such a day of God for a thousand years. A man who can say that can say anything. And the people who can put up with balderdash deserve anything.

But sometimes even the Bishop blunders into saying something that is sensible, as in the following: "Labour had gradually fought its way from serfdom, with little help from the richer classes, and less than no help from the official Church." The last, certainly, is saying no more than the truth—even if not all the truth.

Every one in the United Kingdom between the ages of eighteen and fifty-one are "deemed" to be in the Army Reserve—except women, the physically unfit, the mentally defective, and the clergy.

Professor Spenser Wilkinson, the famous military critic, has some pertinent remarks on religious ideas concerning the War in a recent issue of the Daily News. Speaking of a lady who had remarked that "if there is a God in heaven we must win," the Professor says "it expresses the instinct of many good women and of some good men, but it involves a view which I cannot make my own. My friend's view implies a miraculous intervention on behalf of righteousness. The nature of things is never modified for the convenience of mankind, still less of any fraction of mankind."

Saint George's Day was observed with becoming solemnity at Windsor and many other places. Is this because "the saint" was a successful army-contractor?

The dear Daily News is supposed to know something of religious matters, but a cryptic utterance appeared in its severe pages recently. Referring to a political rival, the Daily News said that it was "the paper which once used to talk blasphemously about 'Uncle Five Heads.'" Presumably, the reference is to Mr. Asquith, but why call it "blasphemous"? Has this Liberal politician been deified?

Principal Forsyth tells us that Christianity acts on the principle that cure is better than prevention, which is sheer nonsense but sound theology. The Ven. C. A. H. Green, Archdeacon of Monmouth, is equally certain that prevention is better than cure, which is good sense, but bad theology. Dr. Forsyth advocates orthodoxy at the expense of morality, while the Archdeacon sacrifices orthodoxy in order to be loyal to truth. According to Christianity, God allowed sin to enter the world when he could have prevented it, that he might enjoy the luxury of bearing it away himself, which makes an essentially immoral being and the Gospel a wicked farce.

In spite of Government appeals to save money and to find men for work of national utility, there is an obvious waste of clerical time and Church income, particularly in the City of London. A case in point is quoted in the Daily News. The living of St. Mary Woolnoth is now vacant, and the patronage falls to the Crown. The living is stated as £1,100, with a parsonage-house. The resident population is 125, mostly caretakers of offices.

What infinite nonsense is being talked by the clergy just now about the alleged life beyond the tomb. Some of them pretend to know all about it, exclaiming: "Death is naught and love is all." The Rev. A. W. Anderson, B.A., of Newport, Mon., speaks of "a saintly mother who still loves and influences from the unseen world" all those for whom she cared when on earth. Even her minister-son might be unconscious of that continued love, but he is being moulded and helped by it all the same. A widow is mentioned who kept on praying night and day until she gained absolute assurance that her dead husband still lived and loved her in the Unseen Holy. This is what Mr. Anderson calls the "deeper knowledge based on something greater than the intellect." How the ignorant multitudes love to be gulled by spiritual charlatans!

"Here God comes in," dramatically exclaims a well-known divine. We should like to see that spot or that moment; but, unfortunately, our divine is unable to identify it. Like Job of old, he cannot find God anywhere, nor can anybody else. He is, indeed, a God that hideth himself from all alike. They say he is in this awful War, but the Kaiser is the only one who is quite sure of him.

"The War has made me think," cried a layman the other day; "and thinking has caused me to doubt." That is the case with thousands to-day. No wonder the Church thunders out "Believe, only believe," for thought, given free course, kills belief, and puts Monarch Reason on the Throne."

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

May 5, Abertillery.

To Correspondents.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—R. Terroni, 5s.; James Davie, £1 10s.; J. L. Vickery, 10s.

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.—Received with thanks, and shall appear. Glad to hear you are well.

WILL correspondents please note that we cannot undertake to deal with unsigned communications. A pen-name may be used for publication, but the name and address of the writer must be supplied to the Editor.

H. BUSH.—Pleased to have been of use. Glad to see you at any time.

W. J.—No other class of the community is exempted from Military Service as the clergy.

W. ROSCHER.—Buddhism, by Rhys David (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge), will probably give you what you require.

F. C. WYKES.—What you say quite bears out our statement. Selfishness, and want of a sense of personal responsibility towards the rest of the community, are responsible for many of the greatest evils around us.

MR. A. ALDWINCKLE writes from Paris suggesting the reprinting of our notes on "Man Power and the Clergy," and the distribution of the leaflet "by millions." He also offers to contribute towards a special fund to defray expenses. A similar suggestion has reached us from other quarters. Perhaps the better plan would be to write a leaflet dealing with the clergy generally. We will take the first opportunity of doing this, and we think it can be done without any appeal to readers for help—beyond that of their aiding in distribution.

TRUTH-SEEKER.—We cannot publish letters that do not bear the name and address of senders.

A. G. LEWIN.—It is not difficult to deceive "hard-headed" men of business on such a matter as Spiritualism. The subject is out of their line, and your "practical" business man often fails through sheer want of imagination. He is so practical that he cannot see beyond the tip of his nose.

MR. JACK BARTON asks: "Why don't you double the price? We would all pay it, and still have the greatest value for 4d. that the literary world offers." Naturally, we agree; but we are looking ahead, and the larger we can make our circulation now, the better prospect when the War is over. So we stick to our plan in spite of the difficulties, and we do so cheerfully, as we know we have the support of all our readers, including Mr. Barton himself.

R. CHAPMAN.—Please tell your friend we will deal with the subject when occasion offers. Hope to see you in good health by the time of the Conference.

W. MACFARLANE.—Pleased to learn that the Freethinker "helps to cheer the boys in Italy." Shall be pleased to send a parcel of literature for distribution.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—West Ham Branch, 10s.

W. ROWE (Johannesburg).—Sorry, but we are unable to find out anything of the person about whom you enquire.

H. O. BOYER.—We hardly think there is the one per cent. of disagreement between us on the impersonal side of war. With religion we are on different ground. The good which you and others attribute to religion, we should say, resulted from the operation of those social forces with which religion has been associated. Thanks for sending quotation which is interesting, and may be useful.

JOSEPH BRYCE.—Thanks. As early as possible. We appreciate your sympathy with us in what you call our "herculean struggle."

J. FOTHERGILL.—Crowded out of this issue. Shall appear next week.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures in the Tillery Hall, Abertillery, Mon., afternoon and evening. He has been asked to lecture in the afternoon on "Freethought and Economics," and has agreed to do so. A lively discussion is anticipated. In the evening he lectures on "The Savage in Our Midst."

We print this week the Agenda of the N. S. S. Conference, which will be held in the Queen's Hall on Whit-Monday. Some of the resolutions thereon are of far-reaching importance, and there promises to be a larger attendance of delegates from all over the country than has been the case for some years. This speaks well for the revival of interest that has taken place of late. Generally speaking, we can safely say that the Movement is fuller of life and activity than it has been for some time.

From one of our men serving with the British Army in Italy:—

> Very glad to say I have not been bothered yet for Church Parade. Three days after I enlisted a corporal came in our hut and informed me that the officer wanted me to go on Church Parade, but I declined. He asked me what was my religion, to which I replied "None." The corporal left remarking that he would tell the officer, but I have heard nothing of the affair since. The thing that I mostly object to is that when anyone reports sick the ridiculous question is asked, "Your religion?" I had a good mind to answer, lumbago. When will there be an end to such nonsense?

This letter bears out what we have said, that the majority of officers are gentlemanly enough to be without desire to force upon soldiers a duty that has no real connection with their military efficiency.

On the other hand, another soldier writes:—

> When I first enlisted I was accepted and affirmed as an Atheist, and was given [conditional upon my doing some light fatigue] complete exemption from Church Parades by my C. O. For the last seven months I have been on Class W. A. Res., and joined up here a week ago. Last Sunday I tried to get permission [whilst on Church Parade] to "break off," but there seemed to be the usual prejudice, and I was refused permission; the "orderly sergeant" telling me "it was time I b—— went." My only way out was to refuse, and I was arrested. I have been under "open arrest" until to-day. I was tried by the O. C., B. Camp. He commenced by abusing Atheism, and used his authority to prevent my making an adequate reply. Then he gave me a lecture, and told me that he thought I was acting foolishly. His manner was now so conciliatory that when he asked me whether I would take any punishment from him, I said "Yes; conditional upon my being exempt from Church Parades in future." He told me "alright, he would see," and then awarded me six days C. B.—no mean punishment here. Apart from that, I am "up against it" in every sense. Both M. O., S. M., and a host of smaller fry rub it into me.

These two letters make plain two things. First, that compulsory Church Parade is a very real grievance amongst the men; second, that where the officers are at all bigoted, those who make a stand for their opinions are apt to have an unpleasant time. The moral is, that in the Army, as out of it, whether a man attends Church or stays away, should be decided by himself alone.

We are tempted to make one more dip from our lucky bag:—

> You will be gratified to know that the free parcel of literature sent has been the final means of securing two converts to our cause. Religious discussions often take place among the men, and the pamphlets sent have been used with good effect. Religious literature is sometimes sent round also, but it does not seem to have near the same effect on the men; perhaps because it is too well known. We ought to have reserve dumps of literature at the base.

Well, we have a small reserve dump, and we shall be pleased to send free parcels of ammunition so far as we can. And we are careful to send out no "dud" shells.

We are glad to learn that the Swansea Branch, one of those opened by Mr. Cohen last year, has had a highly successful winter season. The lecturers included Messrs. Cohen, Lloyd, Snell, McCabe, "Keridon" (J. Thomas), and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner. Two clergymen were also invited to address meetings, and consented to do so. The Secretary, Mr. B. Dupree, writes that the attendance, interest, enthusiasm, and support have been a source of inspiration to the "saints" responsible for the meetings. The Branch closes its season with a small, very small, balance on the right side. The Secretary properly says that the fact of "so much having been done, with so few, prompts us to speculate as to what might be done if all sympathizers lent a hand." We sincerely hope that these will take the hint.

The Manchester Branch is arranging a series of Sunday "Rambles" during the summer. The first one will take place on Sunday next (May 12). The party will leave the Chorlton-Cum-Hardy tram terminus at 10.30; Sale friends at Jackson's Road 11.30; by river bank to Northenden lunch, 2 o'clock; return by meadows to Didsbury, etc.

East End Freethinkers will please note that the Bethnal Green Branch commences its out-door propaganda in Victoria Park (to-day), May 5. Mr. Storey is the speaker.

A very "straight" letter appears in the Evening Express (Cardiff) of April 22 on the exemption of the clergy, and we are pleased to see that it is leading to a correspondence on the topic. The writer says that a deputation of Welsh Nonconformists went to London specially on the matter, and that the exemption has brought "relief to the distracted." We are pleased to see this discussion in the press, and we hope one day to see full advantage taken of such opportunities by regular press representatives of the N. S. S.

The Mechanism of Man.

IV.

ALTHOUGH the bony framework is bound into a united mass by its ligaments and cartilages, the joints enjoy so much freedom of movement, and the centre of gravity of the erect structure is so highly situated, that the skeleton cannot be made to support itself in the upright posture. The erect position so easy of attainment in living man results from the contraction of various muscles which resist and balance one another. The foot provides the surface of support, and the muscles of the calf contract to prevent the lower limbs and body from falling. This contraction tends to bend the leg, and then the thigh muscles operate to sustain the limb in its upright position. But the action of the thigh muscles inclines to curve the body forward, and if the corporeal structure is to be maintained in the erect position, these muscles must be counterbalanced by the muscular influences of the buttocks and the back.

The muscles are more numerous than the bones, and those muscles that control the movements of the skeletal system number 526. All muscular activity is directed by the nervous system. Muscular contractions are frequently initiated by the conscious animal, but many result from nervous changes which never ascend to the realm of consciousness. Those muscular organs which are usually governed by the will are termed the voluntary muscles, although even these occasionally act automatically. These muscles regulate the movements of the bones, and they are seated in the limbs and trunk. The inferior muscles never respond to the will, and are termed the involuntary muscles. The involuntary muscles are situated in the internal organs, mostly in the cavity of the trunk. Over their activities the superior nervous centres are precluded from exercising any control whatever.

Butcher's meat is composed of fat and lean, and the latter is formed of voluntary muscle. In a piece of stewing steak, the cordlike muscle bundles may be easily identified. With a needle, these muscle structures can be separated into their constituent fibres. Examined under the microscope, these fibres will be seen as delicate strands termed fibrils. These fibrils are muscle-cells, and are characterized by many dark lines. Voluntary muscles such as these are therefore called striated, or striped, muscles. When dissected, muscle is shown to be surrounded and held together by sheets of connective tissue.

The fibrils of involuntary muscle, on the contrary, are spindle shaped, and are devoid of lines. Thus they are known as smooth, or unstriated, muscles. The fibres of the heart, however, provide an exception to this rule, but they are the only involuntary muscles that are striated.

The more active a muscle, the more lavish is its blood supply. The blood-vessels enlarge, and the flow of blood increases. Then the muscles increase and multiply. Owing to the oxidation which occurs, an active muscle has a higher temperature than it possesses when at rest. Constant muscular labour leads to the development of larger, firmer, and healthier muscle, while the absence of exercise causes the muscles to deteriorate in size and to become flabby and pale. Immoderate muscular activity is to be deprecated, particularly in the immature organism, but a fair amount of activity is essential to bodily health.

When taking deliberate aim at an object, nearly every organ in the body co-operates in the action. Our eyes, spine, limbs, lungs, and heart, all become modified. When we decide to perform an energetic action, such as felling a tree or leaping a fence, then nerve impulses travel to all the organs involved, and these are excited to the degree necessary for the accomplishment of the projected deed.

The nerves which direct the muscles are composed of many fibres. On entering a muscle, the fibres of a nerve separate, and ramify in all directions throughout the muscular tissue. Each muscle fibre thus becomes the recipient of its own special nerve fibre. All the fibres peculiar to a muscle possess the property of contractility. When contracting, muscles shorten or widen; but it is well to observe that when a muscle decreases in length, it increases correspondingly in width, so that its volume really remains constant. As a muscle consists of a multitude of fibres, it follows that when its fibres contract the whole muscle contracts. Consequently, it becomes shorter and thicker, and draws its two ends together, and whatever organ is attached to the muscles participates in this change. Thus muscular contraction sets up the motion of the organs to which the muscles are attached, and such motions are the antecedents of locomotion.

The contraction of a muscle fibre through the passage along a nerve fibre of a nervous impulse consists in a modification of nerve matter which is conveyed along the fibre. Hence, such a nerve fibre is termed a motor fibre, because through its action on a muscle it propagates the impulse which induces motion. But the nerve functions as an accessory factor only. It cannot furnish the energy which the muscle expends when it contracts. As a matter of fact, the cells of the muscle itself have previously accumulated energy from the food and oxygen supplied to them by the nutrient materials of the blood, and in reality the process known as oxidation liberates the energy displayed. It is noteworthy in this connection that muscular activity may increase the production of carbon dioxide fivefold, while intellectual labour produces no such result.

Digitized by Google

After contraction has taken place, a muscle immediately relaxes. If the muscle is to be maintained in a state of contraction, a rapid succession of nerve impulses is demanded. But a continued contraction is really the consequence of many contractions, and this is occasionally made manifest by the vibratory movement of the muscle.

Work is for life, not life for work, remarks our great philosopher. Reasonable exercise promotes digestion and sweetens sleep. It assists in the excretion of waste and poisonous matters from the body, and helps to furnish that certain index of fitness, a healthy appetite Moreover, active exercise serves to consume the oxygen and promotes the well being of the lungs, while, above all, every contraction of a muscle helps the circulation of the blood stream. The reason of this is perfectly simple, for when a muscle contracts it exercises pressure upon the blood vessels and lymphatics, and thus propels the vascular and lymphatic fluids onwards.

Many of the chemical phenomena of muscle are still imperfectly understood. Some physiologists hold the view that muscular contraction is explosive in character. The explosive materials appear to be generated within the muscles themselves. We may conveniently regard muscle as the residence of stored explosive material of relatively small amount, while muscle also contains the mechanism and fuel for its development, and the structural materials which form its seat of manufacture. This structural substance is considered to be of the nature of protein, while the other accessories are regarded as non-nitrogenous. As rapidly as the muscular energy is expended, new explosive material is evolved through the active oxidation of other substances of which sugar appears to be the most prominent. The oxidation of the muscles is shown by their consumption of the sugar stored in the blood, and by their absorption of oxygen from the blood, as well as by their excretion of carbonic acid into the blood, and in the muscular evolution of heat.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Queen's Hall, Langham Place, London, W. 1.
Whit-Sunday, May 19, 1918.

Agenda.

1. Minutes of last Conference.
2. Executive's Annual Report.
3. Financial Report.
4. Election of President.

   (a) Motion by Manchester, Glasgow, West Ham, Bethnal Green, Kingsland, and Birmingham Branches:—

   "That Mr. Chapman Cohen be re-elected President."

   (b) Motion by South London Branch:—

   "That Mr. A. D. Howell Smith, B.A., be elected President."

5. Election of Vice-Presidents.

   (a) The following are nominated by the Executive for re-election: Bailey, W.; Baker, W. H.; Bartram, J. G.; Bowman, E.; Chapman, R.; Charbonnel, Victor; Collins, W. W.; Cowell, H.; Davidson, W.; Dobson, J. G.; Dodd, W.; Elstob, T. H.; Fathers, R. G.,; Gorniot, T.; Grange, John; Hammond, J.; Heaford, W.; Hins, Eugene; Hurd, S. L.; Kough, Miss Kathleen B.; Leat, W.; Lloyd, J. T.; McCluskey, G. B. H.; McGlashan, James; Moss, A. B.; Neate, J.; Nelson, Wallace; Nichols, R. T.; Partridge, J.; Pegg, C.; Pitt, W. T.; Quinton, C. G.; Robertson, Thomas; Roger, Victor; Rolf, G.; Rolf, Mrs.; Rosetti, R. H.; Ross, J. T.; Ross, Miss Mary; Samuels, S.; Shore, T.; Silverstein, H.; Stanley, Miss Alma; Terry, J.; Thurlow, T. J.; Turnbull, John H.; Vance, Miss E. M.; White, G.; Whitewell, C. J.; Williams, E. Clifford; Willis, F. E.; Wood, Frederick

6. Election of Auditors.
7. Motion on Reconstruction by Mr. C. Cohen:—

   (a) "That the Executive consists of ten members elected at the Annual Conference. Not more than one member of a Branch to be eligible for election. Anyone not belonging to a Branch must have been a member of the Society for at least three years before being eligible for election on the Executive. The names of all candidates for election, with the Branch—if any—to which they belong, shall appear on the Agenda, which shall be issued one month before the Conference."

   (b) "That the present Conference (1918) nominates and elects the Executive."

   (c) "An Annual Report and Balance Sheet shall be issued to all members of the Society."

   (d) "Each Branch shall appoint a Corresponding Member of the Executive, who shall receive a report of all business done by the Executive, and be advised of any special and important business coming before the Executive."

   (e) "In places where no Branch of the N. S. S. exists the Executive shall have power to appoint a representative who shall keep the Executive informed of all events touching the work and welfare of the N. S. S."

   (f) "Branches to be grouped over given areas and an organizing secretary appointed as early as possible."

   (g) "There shall also be appointed, as early as possible, an organizer for the whole of the country, with such duties and on such terms as shall be afterwards decided."

   (h) "Either in conjunction with, or separate from, other officials there shall be appointed local press representatives, and a general Press Representative at headquarters, his duties to consist in watching all matters connected with Freethought work which may arise in the public press."

   (i) "That it shall be an instruction to the Executive to appoint a Finance Committee and a Propagandist Committee."

   (j) "That in place of the Interim Conference ordered by the Conference of 1917, the Executive be authorized to call an annual meeting of members and unattached Freethinkers for the discussion of such subjects as are of general interest and importance."

   (k) "That the place of the Annual Conferences shall be determined by a vote of the Branches, the Executive having first ascertained what places are prepared to receive the Conference, and that the Conference shall not be held in the same town more than once in four years."

   (l) "That whenever possible the Executive shall require a prospective member to be proposed and seconded by two members of the Society."

8. Motions by South London Branch:—

   (a) "That the first duty of a Society being to furnish rules for the acceptance and guidance of its members, this Conference instructs the Executive to print and circulate forthwith the Revised Rules which were approved and adopted by the Annual Conferences of 1916 and 1917."

   (b) "That this Conference desires to enter its protest against the publication of the President's Scheme of Reconstruction without the knowledge or consent of the Executive, and feels that in these circumstances the scheme as published in the Freethinker should be referred to the Executive."

   (c) "That this Conference is of opinion that an Executive consisting wholly of members elected at the Conference, and not removable by the Branches, is practically an irresponsible body; and that a body consisting of ten members only would mean an average attendance so small that it would become an autocracy, and therefore totally opposed to the spirit and traditions of the N. S. S."

Digitized by Google

(d) "That the decision of the House of Lords in the Bowman case having made it clearly legal for the N.S.S., in its present unincorporated state, to receive gifts and bequests for the furtherance of its objects, there is neither use nor sense in its becoming an incorporated body."

9. Motion by Mr. Victor Roger:—

"All Delegates to the Executive residing more than twenty miles from the place of meeting of the Executive shall be termed Corresponding Members, and all business of which notice has been given shall be printed and sent to the Corresponding Members, who shall be allowed to vote on it by letter."

10. Motion by North London Branch:—

"That this Conference instructs the Executive to prepare a revision of the 'Immediate Practical Objects of the Society,' and that a sub-committee be formed from the Executive to secure this end. Further, that the recommendations of the sub-committee be submitted to the forthcoming interim conference."

11. Motion by Mr. C. Cohen:—

"That at an early date steps be taken to (a) combine the N. S. S. and the Secular Society, Limited, under the general title of the National Secular Society, Limited, or (b) convert the N. S. S. into an incorporated body."

12. Motion by Manchester Branch:—

(a) "This Conference strongly supports the suggestions for reorganizing the N. S. S. as outlined by Mr. C. Cohen in the Freethinker of April 14, 1918."

(b) "This Conference regrets the absence of all reference in the Government Education Bill to the position of religion in the schools, and is strongly of opinion that adequate educational progress is impossible until the education given in State-supported schools is confined to secular subjects, leaving the inculcation of religion to parents and ministers of religion."

(c) "That arrangements be made by which the N. S. S. may take a more active and prominent part in the promotion of such social reforms as are outlined in its 'Immediate Practical Objects.'"

13. Motions by Birmingham Branch:—

(a) "That the Chairman at all Public Freethought Lectures of Branches be instructed to read 'Our Immediate Objects,' and then press for membership."

(b) "That the time is now ripe for presenting in definite form the constructive side of our work, and that the Executive be instructed to prepare a statement of our position and its various aspects as embodied in 'Our Immediate Practical Objects.'"

14. Motion by Glasgow Branch:—

"That in order to promote a complete representation of Branches at the Annual Conference, all railway fares be pooled."

15. Motion by Swansea Branch:—

"That steps be taken to open shops in various parts of the country in connection with Branches of the N.S.S. for the sale of Freethought literature."

16. Motion by West Ham Branch:—

"That this Conference affirms the justice of equal pay for equal work regardless of sex, and sympathises with all organizations throughout the country that are endeavouring to establish this principle."

17. Motion by Kingsland Branch:—

"That an annual balance-sheet be sent by each Branch to the Executive each year, giving an account of work done, with income and expenditure, so that the Executive may issue a complete statement of the Society's work; and that the sending of such a report shall be a condition of granting any financial aid."

18. Motion by Manchester and Birmingham Branches:—

"That this Conference protests against the practice of compelling freethinking soldiers and sailors to attend religious services, and is of opinion that, in the interests of justice and freedom, members of the Army and Navy should enjoy the same freedom of conscience as obtains in civil life; it therefore urges upon the War Office the necessity of abolishing compulsory Church Parade as adding nothing to military efficiency, while inflicting a serious injustice upon those who place a real value upon mental freedom."

19. Motion by Birmingham Branch:—

"That this Conference protests in the strongest possible manner against the action of the Government in exempting the clergy from the operation of the Military Service Acts (1916-18) as being entirely without justification."

This Conference will sit in Queen's Hall, Langham Place, W. 1. Morning session, 10.30 to 12.30; afternoon session, 2.30 to 4.30. Both are purely business meetings, and are open to members only. A public meeting will be held in the evening at 6.30 o'clock.

CONSCIOUS VILLAINY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I thank Mr. W. O. Parker and Mr. Chester Keith for their letters in the Freethinker for April 14. Possibly what I had in view was a kind of villainy lower, more cowardly, and more despicable than villainy, generally speaking, appears to them to be, e.g., the secret taker of backsheesh who becks and bows and grins and winks and leers behind his unconscious victim's back. I was thinking, perhaps, of the most sordid kind of villainy, which has no adventurous vein in it at all; which contains no redeeming, romantic streak, which cannot claim the slightest merit of courage—of piracy, whose flag, whatever other adjectival adjunct may be suitable to describe it, is at any rate emphatically not the "Jolly Roger." I have been engrossed, probably, too much in studying the psychology of the Fagins.

And yet your correspondents will have it that I am more generous than they to the social plunderers of our day! But am I? On this point I am not just sure that Mr. Parker and Mr. Keith are at one. They are, however, at one in this: that what I claim to be conscious villainy they hold, in the main, to be self-deception. Let us see.

I must remind your correspondents that even I have only contended that it is a small minority in the community who practise conscious and deliberate villainy. But it is the power of that minority that perpetuates the unconscious folly of the mass which allows them that power. Villainy I am unable to imagine as ever having a moral basis. After all, the test is whether a thing advances or impedes Truth. Applying that test to the powerful minority of conscious villains, can it be maintained that these narcotic manufacturers and dispensers are the "lesser evil"?

Maybe I should not have written "legal" penalties. What my object was, was to show that the villain conscious of his villainy may also be a very recreant. If he knows that he need not apprehend any evil results to himself from practising his villainy, he will practise it; otherwise, in 99 cases out of 100, he will avoid personal risks by refraining or (playing the parasite) he will hang on to the coat-tails of some more powerful villain or coterie of villains, who can afford protection even should disaster ensue. But, then, disaster is so very remote and unlikely when you have the huge majority effectually narcotized!

Unconscious villainy may have as a basis moral courage, conscious villainy, I hold, never. The heroes of Freethought were not always right; but they always had courage of that high order that personal consequences did not enter their calculations. On the contrary, the prospect of persecution was often a spur—not the fashionable kind of persecution that involves a brief incarceration in comfort and a place in the limelight and the picture papers. No!

After all, I may be more generous to the minority of social tyrants than your correspondents. Still "I hae ma doots." I may concede the clever cunning of that minority, but I fear that is only at the same time proposing their gross abuse of their mental enlightenment! May I suggest to Mr. Keith that it is quite possible for a villain to find justification for his villainy without himself believing it to be justification? It is the easiest thing in the world to cite with effect to the unthinking mass traditional authorities well established by time, custom, and usage, though, to the Freethinker, these authorities are worthless and, perhaps, worse. And I might not be so sceptical about the conscious virtue of the unconscious villainy of many of the villains who burned men and women for a difference of opinion if it could be shown that their villainy involved them in personal danger. Such extremes of brutality are not possible to-day, because Secularism has provided restraints. If, in face of the opposing humanistic forces of the twentieth century a committee of Churchmen kidnapped a few heretics and burned them on Ben Nevis, I might almost be persuaded to concede a measure of "moral courage" and "conscious virtue" in that committee. But though such a thing be impossible now, we know perfectly well that religionists have several other shots in their lockers for the hated heretic. And it is "all-my-eye and Betty Martin" to tell me that the great majority of religionists who have had the advantage of a first-class, all-round Secular education do not clearly perceive and are not conscious of the villainy—ay, cowardly villainy if you will—implicit in the employment of vindictive and socially-protected indignities against unbelievers.

In conclusion, I wish to say to Mr. Parker that I do not appreciate the existence of a moral "sense" apart from the reason. "Sense" is the sole guide of primitive man. Sense governed by reason is the guide of civilized man.

IGNOTUS.

THE LEICESTER SECULAR SOCIETY.

SIR,—I would like to thank "Mimnermus" for his very friendly and appreciative article on the Leicester Secular Society.

In one statement there is a possibility of misunderstanding. We recently celebrated the thirty-seventh (by an error in our announcement we said thirty-sixth) anniversary of the opening of our Secular Hall, not of the birth of the Society itself. We are much older than that. Since Mr. Gould wrote his little History of the Society, we have found the original Minute-book, showing that the Society was formed as the "Leicester Secular Society" in 1851 or 1852 (I have not the book by me as I write), so we are now at least sixty-six years old. Quite aristocratic! In the early days there were breaks in the continuous existence of the Society, but there has been no break since 1867. It would be interesting to see the story of other Societies in the Freethinker. I believe the Failsworth Secular Sunday-school has a particularly interesting history, which ought to be recorded.

If "Mimnermus" will visit Leicester, and will look me up, or any member of the Society, we shall be delighted to show him around, and talk over the stories of the past and hopes for the future.

MINUTES OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON APRIL 25.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Brandes, Braddock, Eager, Gorniot, Leat, Lazarnick, Neate, Neary, Palmer, Roger, Samuels, Silverstein, Spence, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed.

New members (twelve in all) received for Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle, and South London.

The Executive's Annual Report to the Conference was discussed and adopted, and the various notices of motion for the Conference Agenda also discussed and remitted to the Agenda Committee for preparation and insertion, in accordance with the usual custom, in the current issue of the Freethinker.

The Secretary received instructions on minor matters connected with the Conference, and thus the final business of this year's Executive closed.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Society News.

Our London out-door work, which commences to-day, is hampered, unfortunately, by the absence of so many of our speakers, who are engaged either at home or abroad in the present unhappy struggle. But we hope to "muddle through," and keep our flag flying as heretofore.

The Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham Branches report good meetings. Manchester is in a flourishing financial position, and well equipped for carrying on future work. The Branch has decided to hold a series of monthly Sunday rambles during the summer, commencing in May, and asks members to watch the columns of the Freethinker for further announcements.

The provinces generally are preparing to reap the harvest we see maturing before us.

The arrangements for our Annual Conference are now complete, and a full list of speakers will appear in next week's issue.

Delegates from the provinces who desire information and assistance as to accommodation during their stay should write to me at once, mentioning the class of accommodation they require, and for how long.

The food question gives one to think, but some provision, though probably not an ideal one, will be made for "a snack" during the luncheon-hour for delegates only. Those who wish to partake of this must please let me know.

All who are attending the business meetings please note that admission is by production of the card of membership, for the current year only, at the door. Those who have not yet renewed their subscriptions for 1918 should remit to me at once. Branch members obtain their cards from their respective secretaries. Delegates are admitted on their credentials.—E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Views and Opinions.

Design in Nature.

A correspondent who was present at one of my recent lectures asks whether I will be good enough to explain precisely what I meant by saying that the argument for and against what is known as "Design in Nature," usually moves along the wrong lines. It is not possible to deal adequately with such a request in a few sentences in "Answers to Correspondents," and, in addition, the subject itself is of quite sufficient importance to warrant a fuller and more careful treatment—fuller than it is possible for me to give even in this place. But I believe that the argument from design in nature is not only the most popular of the arguments for belief in God, it is also the strongest. Other pleas, such as that of causation, of consciousness, etc., are not really arguments at all. They are excuses that have been evolved by theological philosophers and metaphysicians from their own inner consciousness. If there is a God this world is his handiwork, it is in this world that proofs of his existence and character must be found. If the argument from design is not so universal as it once was, it is because reflection and criticism have shown how weak it is. But it remains the strongest argument, and yet it not only fails in its purpose, it is simply impossible for it to succeed. It is not that the argument is inconclusive, it is absolutely irrelevant. It does not prove design, for the simple reason that it cannot. It is not, as Mill thought, that the evidence is not strong enough, but that it is the wrong kind of evidence altogether.

"Directivity."

What is the argument from design? The Paleyan form is simple, but there are other forms which, while having no greater logical value, are more impressive to many because less clear in their outlines. Prominent among these is the argument, so beloved by Sir Oliver Lodge, of "Directivity." "We have overwhelming proof," says Professor Fleming, the eminent electrician, "that in the manufacture of the infinite number of substances made in Nature's laboratory there must be at all stages some directivity." Now this is a new name for an old thing; but, unfortunately for Professor Fleming, to call an onion a rose has not the slightest effect on the perfume. When Kepler, having determined the laws of planetary motion, tried to account for the existence of the planets keeping to their orbits, he fell back on "angelic intelligences" as the cause. The true explanation came with the physics of Galileo and Newton, and, then, good-bye to the angelic "directivity." But taking away separate supernatural beings, each having charge of his own department, like so many government committees, and substituting a single controlling mind, makes no substantial difference. It is the same thing revised, and it is essentially an argument of ignorance. The only reason for Kepler's angels was his ignorance of the causes of planetary motion. When Professor Fleming says that the atoms "have to be guided into certain positions to build up the complex molecules," he is like a modern Kepler faced with something, the cause of which he doesn't know, and lugging "God" in to save further trouble. "God" is always what Spinoza called it—the asylum of ignorance. The gods rule over the regions where knowledge holds no sway.

A Suicidal Argument.

But the weakness, if not the absurdity of the whole argument is, that it is simply suicidal—it destroys itself. In the act of proving that "God" is essential to natural combinations, it is forced to admit that these combinations are possible of themselves. "Directivity" adds nothing to the qualities or capacities of the materials employed. When a man puts a lighted match to a train of gunpowder, he adds nothing to the qualities of the match or the powder; he merely places them in juxtaposition. And unless heat was capable of exploding powder, all the direction in the world would not do it. Thus, alcohol is composed of one atom of oxygen, two of carbon, and six of hydrogen. Alcohol is the product of these elements in combination; but unless the power to produce the result was inherent in the quality of the constituents, no amount of "Directivity" could produce it. Directivity cannot alter the qualities of things in the slightest degree. If it could, there would be no certainty in Nature. H_2O might form water to-day, and whisky to-morrow, and something else the day after. Thus the argument from "Directivity" is bound to admit that all Nature is assumed to do with God, it is able to do without him. It concedes all that Atheism has ever asked for—namely, that Nature is capable of producing all its phenomena without the help of any extraneous agency. As Laplace said, God isn't necessary to the hypothesis. He is pushed on to the stage, and paraded before the audience, only to be dismissed a few minutes later with the assurance that he isn't at all necessary to the performance.

The Order of Nature.

Sir Oliver Lodge and his followers see proofs of design in "Directivity." Others find proof, not in the "direction" of certain special combinations, but in the maintenance of a balance of forces which emerge in a given result. Thus, they say, we have a balance of forces which preserve life; we have another which preserves a structure such as a crystal, another which preserves a chemical compound, etc. There is an orderly adaptation of means to ends, of processes to results, which argue a controlling intelligence. This argument proves on analysis to be really no more impressive than that of the preacher who saw design in the fact of death coming at the end of life instead of in the middle of it. The "adaptation of means to ends" is not a singular, but a universal, fact in Nature. And the quality of adaptation remains the same throughout. The relation of means to ends is the same in quality in the case of life as death. It is the same in the case of a child born a marvel of grace and beauty, and one born deformed and diseased. The end must be related to the means, the result to the process, because the one is the expression of the other. Twice two equal four; but no one dreams of praising God because they don't sometimes make four and a half. The sum is the expression of the factors. That is not only true of arithmetic; it is a universal truth. There is nothing else than "adaptation of means to ends" in Nature, however displeasing some of these ends may be to us. Beauty and ugliness, order and disorder, perfection and imperfection, perfect adaptation and imperfect adaptation, are not things that we find in Nature—all that is there are processes and results, consequents and antecedents—they are conceptions introduced by us, because we create ideals, and then measure Nature by them.

Order and Necessity.

Regularity in Nature is not proof of the control of Nature by a Divine intelligence; it is rather the reverse. If something—call it matter, or ether, or x—exists, it must operate in accordance with its innate qualities; and so long as this x remains uncontrolled, its manifestations will continue unchanged—in other words, there will be "order." The same causes, the same effects; the same processes, the same results. That is the manifest signs of a natural "order" that knows nothing of God. But if the "order varied," if Nature only functioned, D.V., then we should have variations, and these would indicate the presence of a controlling mind in the same way that the human mind controls forces to its purpose. So, when Pope asks the sceptic, "Shall gravitation cease when you pass by?" the sceptic might reply, "Certainly." If there is a God, he ought to show that he exists by occasionally doing something; and to arrest the local operation of gravitation, say, when a rock is falling on an innocent person's head, would not be at all a bad manifestation of "Providence." The existence of a natural "order" proves nothing. It is only another way of saying things exist. The existence of a natural disorder, a state of things in which the same processes did not always issue in the same results, would prove a deal—for the Godite. The Nature we know is such a nature as one would expect without God. And a Nature with God would be anything but an unmixed blessing.

* * *

Next week we will deal with the more popular presentation of the Design Argument.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Among those who attempt to exist without human sympathy, the pure and tender-hearted perish through the intensity and passion of their search after its communities, when the vacancy of their spirit suddenly makes itself felt. All else, selfish, blind, and torpid, are those unforeseeing multitudes who constitute, together with their own, the lasting misery and loneliness of the world. Those who love not their fellow-beings, live unfruitful lives, and prepare for their old age a miserable grave.—Shelley.

The Defeat of the Cross.

II.

IT is an undeniable fact that theologically the Cross has always served as the appropriate symbol of the way of salvation through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The late Dr. Dale, of Birmingham, in his once famous work on the Atonement, described it as the external condition of acceptance with God and full forgiveness of sins. This is the view expressed in all the great creeds of the Church, both Catholic and Protestant, and it is a view for which there is abundant Scriptural warrant, especially in the Epistles of Paul and Peter. Christians are said to be people who "by grace have been saved through faith, and that not of themselves: it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." Even their character is theirs only by imputation, not as the reward of successful struggle. Paul says: "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith" (Phil. iii. 8, 9). The Apostles were ambassadors for Christ, whose message was this: "We pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God, for he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (2 Cor. v. 20, 21). The New Testament summary of the doctrine of the Cross is as follows:—

> For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.....He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him (John iii. 16-18, 36).

Primarily, then, the death of Christ, rendered effectual by his resurrection, is the sacrifice, or propitiation, which satisfies the demands of Divine justice, and makes it possible for God to accept and forgive all who repent and believe. In other words, Christianity is a religion which enables lost and guilty sinners to get into harmonious relations with God, and so escape the wrath to come. It is only secondarily that it undertakes the task of doing anything for the life that now is. Indeed, the reorganization of society is not, strictly speaking, one of its aims at all, society in this world being practically of no consequence. Here we are to regard ourselves as but strangers and pilgrims, whose destination is the world to come. On this point Paul is most emphatic. Believers are in Christ, united with him both in his death and resurrection, and this is how the Apostle addresses them:—

> If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory (Col. iii. 1-4).

It is only those whose ambition is to be known as social reformers who even dream of representing Christianity as a religion for this world. Our point, however, is that in the latter capacity the Cross is the most gigantic and tragic failure in all history, while its alleged power to deliver believers from the wrath to come is absolutely outside the sphere of practical verification, the deliverance being as purely imaginary as the wrath itself. Realizing the truth of this statement, the Rev. Dr. Fort Newton, in a sermon preached in the City Temple on Good Friday, and published in the Christian Commonwealth for April 24, ignores the orthodox doctrine of the Atonement altogether, and speaks of Jesus, not as Redeemer, Deliverer, Saviour, or Lord, but as partaker of the human struggle, with all its ghastly horrors and moral atrocities, sharing it without ridding us of it. He says:—

> To-day we read the stately stanzas of the 53rd Chapter of Isaiah with a new vision, a new wonder; and the Figure that moves through those lines—gentle, heroic, silent, haunting, despised and rejected of men, smitten of God and afflicted—seems a living Presence by our side, looking at us with all-pitying, touching us with hands of healing. Truly he is the Suffering Servant of God, revealing the redeeming truth that, as there is a law of the survival of the fittest, so there is a law of the sacrifice of the best. To-day is this truth fulfilled before our eyes, and we realize as never before that not only the death of Jesus, but his life, was one long atonement, just because his love made him one with humanity in its sin, its woe, and its destiny..... Outwardly the Cross was an utter defeat; inwardly it was the ultimate victory.

What the reverend gentleman means by the outward failure and inward triumph of the Cross the present discourse does not help us to discover. For systematic theology he has nothing but withering contempt, but strangely enough he has a theological system of his own, the chief characteristic of which is looseness, vagueness, or ambiguity, and in defence of which he waxes absurdly dogmatic. His laudation of Jesus is grotesquely extravagant, particularly as he treats him as a member of the human category, saying: "God eternal, God paternal, in that faith Jesus lived, in that faith he died, testing it to the utmost. Father! that was his own word, his key to life, his first truth and his last; it was his religion." Jesus was a man specially commissioned to make God known to the world; not a Saviour who became the propitiation for our sins by dying on Calvary, but a real Brother or Champion who came to sympathize with and inspire us in our desperate conflict with malign forces by revealing a Heavenly Father who shares our sufferings and sorrows, and so heartens us for our never-ceasing warfare. We agree with Dr. Fort Newton when he says that "outwardly the Cross was an utter defeat"; but we are equally convinced that even inwardly it was by no means a victory. That is to say, Jesus neither said nor did anything that might legitimately be looked upon as in any sense or degree a revelation of a Friend behind phenomena, who is yet a partaker of our multifarious combats with the evils of life. Nothing can be more certain than the futility of the Cross from whatever point we may view it, while the Church founded upon it has done incalculably more harm than good in the world. Where is the Fatherhood of an Almighty and all-merciful Deity to be seen shining forth in all its glory? Can we honestly face the fact of the present War and believe that a God of love sitteth as king for ever? Has it never occurred to Dr. Newton seriously to consider how what is outwardly an utter defeat can be inwardly an ultimate victory? We unhesitatingly declare that in every intelligible sense, save one, the Christian Cross has been and is a fantastic fiasco. The Church, professedly its instrument, has been a stupendous success ever since its establishment as a department of the State under Constantine the Great; but its success has been due exclusively to the fact that it has always ingeniously played upon the ignorance and superstitious credulity of the masses of the people. In other words, the Church has prospered alone by pretending to be what it is not and cannot be, or by sailing under false colours. As a moralizer of life's great problems, as a factor in the establishment of just and fair conditions in the social organism, as a friend of the weak rescuing them from under the heels of the strong, it has been an absolute failure; and the failure of the Church signifies, not the ultimate victory, but the continuous defeat of the Cross. There is no possibility of separating the one from the other. Supernaturalism is a discredited dream, and all interpretations of existence based upon it necessarily fall to the ground. Is it not high time to let Humanism have its innings?

Mary Wollstonecraft.

A Brave Woman and a Broken Career.

> We shall never enfranchise the world without touching people's superstitions.—G. W. Foote.

Some innocents imagine that men and women of letters exert little or no influence in politics and upon politicians, in statesmanship and upon statesmen. It is a fond illusion. What far-reaching influence did not Jean Jacques Rousseau exert in world-politics? Instead of being a mere voice crying in the wilderness, his was the most potent voice in Europe of his day. Who heeded Thomas Paine? Yet his was the hand that first wrote the arresting words, "The United States of America," and the great Republic owed as much to Paine's live pen as to Washington's sharp sword. These questions are suggested by reading Mr. G. R. Stirling Taylor's excellent book on Mary Wollstonecraft. It is a handsome book, finely illustrated with photogravure portraits, and should adorn every Freethinker's bookshelf. For Mary Wollstonecraft may be fairly described as the chief founder of the modern Woman Movement, and she has many other claims on the attention of reformers and lovers of literature.

It is impossible to deny that the prevailing impression left by the records of Mary Wollstonecraft's life is one of pathos, the pathos of a brilliant and beneficent career, frustrated, at the height of its power, by an untimely end. And the emotion aroused by the record is accentuated, rather than shared, by the frank and open fashion in which Mr. Stirling Taylor has told the romantic story of her life. The book reveals a story of inevitable disappointment, of exceptional abilities heavily handicapped by a woman's physique, and, by way of compensating contrast, the pages bear witness to the determination of a brave woman using broken opportunities to the best advantage. The very courage of such an effort is touched to pathetic issues, and the partial success with which it was crowned is a tribute to the recuperative power of an eager and indefatigable temperament.

The triumph of the modern Woman's Movement is a victory for Rationalism, and the belated recognition of the rights of women is a tribute to the pioneers from Mary Wollstonecraft to John Stuart Mill. Mary Wollstonecraft was, if not actually the first advocate of women's rights, at any rate the first of her sex to give public expression of her views, and to have the courage to live up to her convictions. Sharing the usual fate of pioneers, she was reviled as "a hyena in petticoats" and a "philosophizing serpent." Her book, The Vindication of the Rights of Women, was mainly a plea for the universal education of both sexes, and from the seed she sowed sprang the goodly fruit of a free national education for boys and girls, and a larger and broader freedom for her sex.

It is not alone her message that now interests us, but the woman herself, her desires, her aspirations, her struggles, and her love. Pathetic and lonely, she stands out in the faint mists of the past, a woman who will continue to arouse sympathy when her books are no longer read, except by students in the bye-paths of literature. And of the woman no more complete revelation could be desired than the pathetic letters she wrote to Captain Imlay, who used her so harshly. Other writers have been unhappy, and have known the anguish and terrors of unrequited affection; but Mary Wollstonecraft addressed these letters with a breaking heart to the man whom she adored—the most touching and tragic love-letters in our literature.

Later in life Mary Wollstonecraft was united to William Godwin; and their daughter, Mary, married the poet Shelley. This largely intensifies the interest of Mary Wollstonecraft's association with English literature. For Shelley was a disciple of William Godwin, and the great poet adopted his philosophic ideas from Godwin. So much is this the case that it may even be said that Godwin explains Shelley, and it is equally true that Shelley is the indispensable commentary to Godwin. It is no paradox to add that Godwin formed Shelley's mind, and that the Prometheus Unbound and Hellas were the greatest of Godwin's works.

Nor is Godwin's daughter undeserving of notice. Although overshadowed by the greatness of her husband, Mary Shelley had literary gifts of her own which commanded attention. It was while staying at Byron's villa on the lovely lake of Geneva that she conceived the idea of her famous novel, Frankenstein, a grim and powerful work, which made an immense and deserved sensation. None of her other novels, including The Last Man and Lodore, had the same success. She contributed brilliant biographical sketches of foreign authors and artists to Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, and edited her famous husband's poems. She survived Shelley nearly thirty years, and latterly made her home with her son, Sir Percy Florence Shelley, at Boscombe Manor, Bournemouth. There William Godwin, and Mary Wollstonecraft, and their daughter, Mary Shelley, are buried. It was the intention of Sir Percy to erect a monument to his illustrious father in the adjoining church, but the then vicar, a Mr. Bennett, refused his permission on account of the poet's Freethought, and the splendid memorial had to find refuge at the more hospitable Christchurch church, where it is regarded as one of the literary shrines of England.

It will be seen that Mr. Stirling Taylor's book is full of interest, and turns the handles of many doors. There is not a dull page in it from the start to the finish. We began by saying that Mary Wollstonecraft's career was one of pathos, and so, to a certain extent, it unquestionably was. And yet, perhaps, the last word is one, not of pathos, but of strong human encouragement. For the woman who can in large measure live down disaster and shipwreck of hope, and rise triumphant over the fell clutch of circumstance, may justly be acclaimed as the victorious mistress of her fate.

I have every possible reverence for the much talked-of world beyond the grave, and I wish that which piety believes, and virtue deserves, may be all matter of fact. But in things belonging to, and terminating in this present scene of existence, man has serious and interesting business on hand.

The Mechanism of Man.

V.

THE cells of the living body are bathed by a fluid. This fluid is the lymph. Unlike a unicellular creature, such as the amœba, which is compelled to search for its food, the cells which form the multicellular animals are nourished by the nutrient materials contained in the blood. These exude through the vascular vessels into the lymph channels adjacent to the cells. The amœba excretes its waste substances into the water in which it dwells, whereas the higher mammalian cells expel theirs into the lymph to be whirled away by the circulation. The blood fulfils two offices. It conveys nourishment to the tissues, and removes waste matters from them. Or, as Professor Bayliss puts it in his elaborate Principles of General Physiology, 1915: "The object of the circulation of a fluid through the larger organisms is to supply food, especially oxygen, to the tissues, and to bring about effective interchange of chemical products."

The organs of circulation in vertebrate animals are the heart, which drives the blood into the arteries, and the capillary vessels which restore the blood to the veins. The human heart is about the size of a man's closed fist, and is placed diagonally behind the breast-bone, with its pointed end projecting towards the left. The smaller termination of the organ beats against the wall of the chest between the fifth and sixth ribs. The heart is safeguarded from external injury by the breast bone and ribs, and its encircling membrane—the pericardium—secretes a fluid, and eases the friction arising from the heart-beat.

In the superior backboned animals the heart is formed of two pumps in series. One of these pumps functions to propel the impure blood towards the lungs to obtain oxygen from the air, while the other pump operates to return the aerated and therefore purified blood from the lungs to the body. The heart contains two great cavities which are divided by a partition which separates one from the other. Each of these chambers is again divided by a movable partition. The upper chambers or cavities are the right and left auricles, and the two lower the right and left ventricles.

The heart, then, is composed of two pumps united together which pulsate in succession. The beating of the heart is caused by the contraction of the walls of its two auricles, which is immediately followed by a simultaneous contraction of the walls of the two ventricles. As Huxley said: "The contraction of the heart is rhythmical, two short contractions of its upper and lower halves respectively being followed by a pause of the whole, which occupies nearly as much time as the two contractions."

The blood's movements may be traced by observing the fluid flowing in its vessels of smallest calibre—the capillaries. From the capillaries of the skin or muscles the blood stream widens out into ever larger channels as its approaches the heart. From the capillaries small veins emerge which eventually unite into two great veins which conduct the blood to the right auricle. The blood then passes through the tricuspid valve into the right ventricle, and then travels through a valve into the pulmonary artery which proceeds towards the lungs. The lungs are abundantly furnished with capillaries, and while coursing through these channels the blood becomes purified, and it then resumes its journey through the pulmonary veins to the left auricle, and from thence through the mitral valve of the heart to the left ventricle. Then the blood is driven through a semi-lunar valve into the great artery of the body, the aorta, and from this vessel it proceeds to the lesser arteries, and onward to the capillaries distributed throughout the tissues, thus completing its circuit round the body.

Veins and arteries are composed of three layers of tissue. One of these layers serves to lessen friction; the second, formed of connective tissue, renders the vessels elastic, while their middle layer of muscular tissue permits them to expand or contract. All the structures function mechanically as agents in that constant circulation of the vascular fluid which maintains the organism as a living entity.

The capillaries into which the larger vessels break up are finer than a delicate hair, and are formed of a single layer. This is the inner lining of smooth cells which promotes the easy passage of the vascular fluid. The minuteness of the capillaries enables them to pass among the cells of the tissues, while the delicacy of their walls allows their nutrient liquids to enter the tissues, and readily absorb their exhausted materials into the blood. Through these microscopic capillaries the blood flows very slowly. But, minute as the capillaries are—and they vary in diameter from 1-2,000th to 1-1,500th of an inch—their multitude is so vast that their total volume is hundreds of times larger than that of the arteries which feed them, or that of the veins which arise from them. In reality all the great blood-vessels, including the heart, act as instruments of pressure to compel the blood to circulate through the capillaries. The blood is renewed and the tissues are renovated through the agencies of the capillaries alone.

The red corpuscles give the blood its ruddy appearance. Examined under the microscope, however, the blood liquid is nearly transparent. This vascular fluid is known as the plasma. But suspended in this plasma are immense numbers of blood-discs containing a pigment—the hæmoglobin—and this pigment colours the blood. Larger white corpuscles also inhabit the blood. But the red corpuscles never leave the blood-stream, and are carried by the circulation to all parts of the body. The white corpuscles, on the other hand, are not restricted to the vascular vessels, but pass through their walls into the neighbouring tissues.

The plasma sustains the blood in its liquid state, and as it flows the plasma carries with it nutrient particles supplied by the digestive system. It also conveys carbon-dioxide to the lungs, and various waste body-products to the kidneys.

When the blood issues from the heart, some of it proceeds to the stomach and intestines through arterial vessels which branch off into capillaries. These capillaries take up all the food-stuffs from the intestinal system, the fats alone excepted, and then they combine to form the portal vein which pours the absorbed nutrient substances into the liver. This important organ burns up a part of these blood impurities, and transforms them into bile. The blood, thus purified, and freighted with food, is then conveyed from the liver to the heart, and is again restored to the general circulation. The foregoing phenomena constitute the portal circulation.

Arterial blood is carried to the kidneys, in which organs the waste matters are eliminated, and then the renovated blood returns along a vein which runs to the heart. This is known as the renal circulation. There is also the circulation through the lungs, during which the blood is purified and renewed. This forms the pulmonary circulation.

When we compare the arteries and veins of the body, we discover that the former possess thick, tough, muscular walls, while the latter are provided with thin, soft walls. Like a river that is fed by springs and brooks, the veins derive their blood from the countless capillaries distributed throughout the human organism. Small veins arise from the capillaries, and these vessels grow larger and larger as they journey to the heart, where they discharge their contents into the auricles. The arterial vessels commence at the ventricles of the heart, and pour their blood into the capillaries, and from these small channels the blood returns by way of the veins to the heart. The veins, therefore, lead to the heart, whereas the arteries proceed from the heart. When the venous blood, which is charged with impurities and is dark purple in colour, passes along a large blood-vessel to the lungs, it there undergoes a remarkable transformation. While in the lungs, the venous fluid gives up its carbon-dioxide, and replenishes itself with oxygen. Its colour then changes to a bright scarlet. Thus is venous blood transformed into arterial blood, and it now flows towards and through the heart, and recommences its journey along the channels of circulation.

In 1628, Harvey published his small work of 76 pages, announcing his discovery of the circulation of the blood. As Gregory says in his Discovery; or, The Spirit and Service of Science: "In this treatise Harvey established absolutely the fact of the circulation of the blood, and the fact that the muscular action of the heart causes this movement."

This War has shed many a searchlight on matters religious, and, among other things, the question of the Pope's infallibility. The Pope is in a tight corner, for the Allies include four Catholic nations: France, Italy, Belgium, and Portugal, and there are millions of Catholics in America. The only Catholic power on the other side is Austria, but she is regarded as "the eldest daughter of the Church." There are also very large numbers of Catholics in Germany. Hence, Papa has to use many voices. The attitude of the Catholic Cardinals in England is patriotic, but the Irish priests are "agin the Government." In Italy, the Vatican has never protested against conscription of the clergy, but France has protested against their employment as combatants. The poor Pope must feel like Blondin when he crossed the Niagara Falls on a tight-rope.

Close students of history and of the Irish Question will not be surprised at the action of the Irish priests. Home Rule always represented a threat to their supremacy. It is the identification of the Nationalist aspiration with religious belief, brought about by English rule, which has given the priest his sustained power. Once that union is broken, and the divorce of the secular from the religious interest effected, there would be seen in Ireland what is seen elsewhere, that is, the growing restriction of the priest to the sphere of religion. That is the tendency of things elsewhere, and there is no ground for anticipating a different consequence with the Irish people. The moral is that while the Irish priesthood dare not oppose Home Rule, they do not desire it. And if the present agitation were to wreck it they would not mourn.

The Irish Catholic bishops advise resisting Conscription "by all the means that are consonant with the law of God." Not many generations ago burning people alive was thought to be "consonant with the law of God."

Lord Bryce's Committee has issued its report on the reform of the House of Lords, and its publication has caused some caustic comments in the press. Reynolds' Newspaper says "the history of the House of Lords has been one long tale of resistance to the will of the people." As the Church of England Bishops sit in the House of Lords, this is not a compliment to the Black Army.

Christianity runs in double harness with commercialism, and it is not surprising to read that "merchandise now goes direct by rail from Cairo to Jerusalem." Those enterprising tradesmen will sing presently, "Jerusalem the Golden."

A special service for War-workers was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, which the obsequious press described as a "Labour service." Among the distinguished "Labour leaders" present were Mr. Winston Churchill and Sir Francis Lloyd. The address was delivered by that quick-change artist, the Bishop of London.

Expensive advertisements have appeared in the London press stating that the Church Army has 800 recreation huts for the soldiers, and asking for subscriptions for their maintenance. It would be more to the purpose if the Church authorities forced the able-bodied clergy to take their proper places alongside the other soldiers.

For ten hours without cessation prayer and intercession was conducted recently by the Wesleyans at Central Hall, Westminster. We suggest that Oriental praying-barrels be used in future, and, if necessary, they could be worked with a motor.

Christians are very fond of annexing men of genius. The Moderator of the Church of Scotland, the Right Rev. James Cooper, preached the sermon at a special service arranged by the London Burns Club in the Caledonian Church, Holloway. Do these professional admirers of Burns ever read his works, or only talk of him? What sort of Christian was the author of the defiant lines: "The Church and State may go to hell, but I'll go to my Anna"?

The Bishop of London declares that Londoners can "do with fewer sermons." The people in the pews will echo Shakespeare: "For this relief much thanks."

It is quite all right. We have received a four-page leaflet, issued from North London, proving that the British really are the chosen people. And it is all backed up by exact references to Biblical texts. Whatever we do, or don't do, proves the writer's theses. Above all, we note that God promised Abraham the gates of the world, and the British possess these in Aden, Malta, Gibraltar, etc. There is no more to be said.

And then we turned to a report of the Rhodesia Land case, now before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. And we find that when Dr. Jameson led his men into Matabeleland, it was with the arrangement that each one was to be allowed "3,000 morgen" of land belonging to the Matabele—the British Government retaining the right to purchase at £3 per morgen. "The loot" was also to be divided between the British South African Company and the officers and men. We daresay there is Biblical warranty for this, if only "Ye shall spoil the Egyptians."

The late Rev. Arthur Gamble, of Bradbourne Vicarage, near Ashbourne, Derbyshire, left estate to the value of £59,056; and Canon Pepys, of Torquay, died worth £20,062. "Blessed be ye poor."

The Church Army advertises for a hundred "keen young Churchwomen," over twenty-one years of age, to take the place of evangelists gone to the Front. The proviso is made that they need not be experienced or highly educated. We should imagine that not being educated would be a distinct advantage.

"The Passer By" of the Birmingham Gazette is responsible for the following:—

> In a certain town there were two prominent men of the same name. One died and the other is with the Army in the Holy Land. The latter sent a telegram to his wife. It is said that it was delivered to the widow of the other man.
> The contents of the wire were: "Having a hot time; absolutely fit."

The fatherly attentions of Providence are not entirely absorbed by the World-War. Earthquake shocks have been felt at Milan and Bergamo, and Mount Stromboli has been in violent eruption.

The St. Mark's, Noel Park, Parish Magazine cites an unnamed Birmingham business man as saying: "On reflection it will be found natural for the business community to afford support (to missions). The circulation of the Scriptures transforms savage tribes into civilized nations, with resulting commercial needs." On which the writer of the article comments: "It is doubtless due to the influence of Christianity that honest trading among the infant nations of Africa and elsewhere has been rendered easy." Well, we have pointed out that the missionary is the agent in advance of the merchant, and we are pleased to see it frankly recognized. As to honest trading, it would be interesting to get the opinion of some intelligent members of these "infant nations" on some of the trading that goes on here—particularly on the numerous fortunes made during the War. And a little attention to the plunder of the poor Matabele by the whites, some particulars of which are now being made public before the Privy Council, are also enlightening on the "honest trading" introduced among the "infant nations."

The Star asks, "Is the Kaiser mad?" because it is alleged he believes himself to be an envoy of God. Personally, we believe the Kaiser is suffering from religious mania; but the evidence of the Star is not conclusive. Look at the clergy in this country who believe themselves to be envoys of God. Look, too, at the people who believe that Great Britain is picked out by God to do this or that. Being an envoy of God—in the case of individuals or nations—is too common a form of stupidity for it to be classed as insanity.

Mr. Hall Caine asks, in the Sunday Herald, "Why does God allow the War to go on?" And, after an avalanche of commonplaces, replies: "I do not know; I do not see; only God knows and sees; and before his awful Will I bow and wait." In that case it would have been more sensible to wait in silence. To believe it will be all right when one's reason tells one it is all wrong, is as near the ridiculous as one can get.

"I should have been better pleased if clergymen had been made liable for combatant service," declares Lady Eden. The dear clergy will not like this voice from Eden.

"I would rather live in the next ten years than in any time I have ever read of," says Dr. J. R. Mott, of the North American Young Men's Christian Association. Many thousands of Christian soldiers will echo the sentiment.

A provincial paper asks its readers for suggestions for cutting down the gas-bill. We suggest that the dear clergy be placed on half-pay.

The clergy have rare noses for business in spite of their professions of indifference to mundane affairs. The Evening Standard prints a spirited protest against charging for admission to parts of Westminster Abbey, and adds that the clergy have "no shame, no compunction." The remarks would apply with equal force to St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Irish Catholic Bishops would resist Conscription "by all the means that are consonant with the law of God." That is precisely how the Kaiser wages war.

The dear Daily News considers that the poet Swinburne was a "violent-mouthed Republican." The poet was not so "violent-mouthed" as some of the Free Church evangelists who are so admired by our contemporary.

The National Free Church Council is arranging for a special united intercession service on Whit-Monday. Pity the sorrows of a poor old deity!

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 26, Maesteg.

M. R. Hunter.—There is a prepared form of Burial Service, which could be obtained of the N. S. S. Secretary. We believe Mr. F. J. Gould has also prepared forms suitable for other ceremonies.

"Beatrice."—Pleased to hear from you. Will publish as early as possible.

A. E. Maddock.—Received. Thanks.

H. Dawson.—Thanks. Owing to the position of affairs in the printing trade, and over which we have no control, the paper is a few hours later in being published than it used to be. When the War ends that delay will be removed.

T. M.—Rather too technical for our columns although highly interesting. The only criticism we care to pass at the moment is that you appear to have overlooked the consideration as that natural selection must be chiefly—if not entirely—operative during the period of procreation.

C. Murray.—Go ahead and write us again when it possible to fix something definite.

H. Motte.—We appreciate your remark that our great fault is that we do not write more. But as we are already at it all day and every day, we do not see our way to remedy it. Glad to know of your interest in the "best of all causes."

D. Keir.—Shall be pleased to see you when you have time to call.

W. H. Hunt.—Mr. Manson's book was published originally at 6s. Subsequently a sixpenny edition was issued. But we cannot say if either are still in print.

R. Mitchell.—Thanks. Shall be able to use one, if not both.

G. E. Fussell.—Your MS. is in type. Pressure on our space has hitherto prevented its appearance.

J. W. White.—Glad to hear there is a resolve to form a new Branch at West Stanley. Let us know if we can be of any assistance?

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen brought his lecturing season to a close with two addresses at Abertillery on Sunday last. The afternoon meeting was a good one, and very animated. In the evening the hall was crowded. A number of friends had come in from surrounding districts, and we were pleased to learn that endeavours are being made to commence work at Pontypool. Next autumn, if not earlier, we hope to have work going on in Aberdare, Pontypool, Pontypridd, and Cardiff. These, in addition to the places now active, will give South Wales a good place in our Movement.

Since last September, Mr. Cohen has spent few week-ends in London, and he will not be sorry for three or four months free from provincial lecturing. Travelling nowadays is costly and uncomfortable, and as provincial lecturing means about three days out of London, this, with running a weekly paper single-handed, looking after business details, attending to correspondence, etc., a promised slackening becomes attractive. The compensation for all the work is that meetings during the winter have been invariably successful. They have been good—sometimes better than good, and all witness to a real revival of interest in Freethought.

We publish this week a new pamphlet by Mr. Cohen, God and Man: an Essay on Common Sense and Natural Morality. The pamphlet has been written with an eye to the questions that are under discussion between Freethinkers and Christians, and will, we feel sure, prove useful. The price of the pamphlet is 3d., postage ½d.

There are several other things by Mr. Cohen in the press which we hope to issue shortly. Among others, there are two of a series of four-page pamphlets, which we think will be ready in a few days. They will be sold at as low a price as possible, in order to secure a large circulation.

The Freethinker was first issued, as a monthly, in May, 1881, so that we celebrate this month our thirty-seventh anniversary. No other Freethought journal in this country, or, we believe, in Europe, has ever existed for so long a period. And it is pleasing to record that this thirty-seventh anniversary finds the paper in perfect health. In spite of the War, the circulation is better than ever. We believe its influence is increasing, and, thanks to its many friends, there are few papers in the country that have undergone less change during this very trying war period, and we think we may safely say that without the Freethinker our Movement would not be to-day where it is. On the death of G. W. Foote, we assured everybody concerned that the Freethinker would weather the storm. So far, at least, that assurance has been justified. Many things we should have done have remained undone owing to the War, but these plans are delayed, not abandoned. We are dreaming big dreams, and, with the help of our friends, we hope to see them one day materialize.

We see that a regulation is to be issued forbidding the return of unsold copies of papers. Until that is the case we shall continue to send out the Freethinker on the old conditions. When the regulation is issued we shall be compelled to rely upon our readers for all help in improving our circulation. Perhaps it will then be advisable to revise the Freethinker League which worked so well in the earlier period of the War. We allowed that to lapse because we were so full of work in other directions, but it was a fruitful plan, and contained great possibilities.

Mrs. E. Palmer will lecture to-day (May 12) for the Southampton Branch of the N. S. S. at the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road, on "The Endowment of Motherhood." The lecture commences at 7 o'clock. We hope there will be a good attendance.

The New York Truthseeker reprints from these columns, with suitable acknowledgment, a recent article by Mr. A. B. Moss, in its "Children's Corner." Editor Macdonald has a keen eye for a good thing when he sees it.

All Things to All Men.

How cunningly are Christian teachings planned
By him above,
For if I gain I praise thy bounteous hand,
O God of Love!

And if perchance stands still my natal star,
Or downwards moves,
I recollect how strictly chastened are Those whom God loves.

And though with God to jest I do not choose
— 'Twere grievous sin,
'Tis surely like the vulgar "Tails, you lose
And heads, I win"!

The N.S.S. Conference.

THE National Secular Society's Annual Conference meets in London on May 19 (Whit-Sunday), and this is practically the last opportunity of calling attention to the fact.

The Conference promises to be well attended, and I personally hope that every Branch of the Society will see that it is represented. Being democratic, in fact, as well as in words, I believe in settling a Society's affairs by an appeal to all concerned, and by seeing that all express an opinion on the conduct of affairs.

The published Agenda shows that matters are to be decided which will vitally affect the Society and its work. I refer specially to the motions on re-organization which stand in my name. These have not been drawn up without careful consideration, and I am gratified to know that they have commanded general approval. While this is gratifying, it is not surprising. My twenty-eight years' experience in the N.S.S., as speaker and writer, has given me a wide and intimate knowledge of the opinions of Freethinkers all over the country, and I knew that in setting down those resolutions I was only putting into words what was a general feeling.

The great thing to be done was to give members all over the country as direct a voice as present circumstances permit over the Society's affairs. As will be seen by reference to the Agenda, I propose doing this by asking the Conference to elect an Executive of ten members direct, and, which all business people will agree, is quite large enough for effective work. The present method of an Executive formed of perpetual vice-presidents—is itself a practical negation of democracy—and delegates from Branches means, in practice, delegates from London Branches only. And when, as is actually the case, there may be five or six vice-presidents belonging to one London Branch, with a delegate added, it will be realized that government by Branch delegation becomes pure sham. In such circumstances it is small wonder that provincial Branches have complained for years that the Executive's view of affairs became parochial, that the operations were conducted with too great an eye to London alone, that the provincial Branches lost interest, and that many have died out in consequence.

Direct election will, I feel sure, create a greater sense of responsibility on the one side and increased interest on the other. I do not claim anything new for this. The Secular Society, Limited, Committee is elected by the Annual Meeting. The Annual Meeting elects the Executive of the Malthusian League, of the Secular Education League, and of the R.P.A. So large an organization as the National Union of Teachers, with its 100,000 members and its control of very large funds, elects its Executive by direct appeal to the members. Many other Societies adopt the same policy. It is the only genuine democratic plan. It will be observed that in my suggestions all Branches, London and provincial, are placed upon an equality. Any Branch may nominate one of its members for election on the Executive, and it will be possible to elect any member or members of the old Executive; but when he is elected he will represent the Conference—that is, the whole of the Society whose affairs he is helping to conduct. It need hardly be said that if my proposal is adopted care will be taken by the Conference to elect only such delegates as are certain to attend; there will thus be guaranteed a regular and full attendance at all meetings of the Executive. To prevent misapprehension, I may as well say that, as President, I should abstain from nominating any candidates. The choice should come from the Society itself.

I am aiming not only at making progress, but in seeing that the progress made is conserved. The inadequacy of the old plan is shown by the shrinkage of the Society year after year. The number of Freethinkers was growing, but the N.S.S. was not reaping the fruits of the growth.

Since I threw myself, at the end of 1915, with extra energy into the work of reviving the Movement, I think it may be fairly said considerable progress has been achieved. The work has been re-established in Manchester and Liverpool —where it was in a state of suspended animation; and new Branches have been opened at Nuneaton, Southampton, Portsmouth, Falkirk, Swansea, and Goldthorpe, with two new Branches in London. Application is also being made for new Branches at Coventry and Maesteg (S. Wales); and there are other Branches in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and South Wales in course of formation.

I have only one desire in this matter, and that is to see a Society built up that is worthy of our Cause. I think my long services—freely and ungrudgingly given to the Society—is evidence that I am no self-seeker in any direction. Seeking office or distinction is not in my line. The office of President of the N. S. S. brings me nothing but work and responsibilities. It carries no salary, and I have not charged, nor do I intend to accept, the value of a postage stamp from its funds for any expense which the office involves. But having taken the office of President, I should be unworthy of the post did I not act as I think best for the interests of the Society. It might have been easier to have sat still, said nothing, done nothing, and just let things drift. But that is not my conception of a President's duty, and I have the best reasons for thinking that I have the appreciation of all real friends of the N. S. S. for what I have done, and their confidence and good wishes in what I am now proposing in order to place affairs on a really business-like footing.

CHAPMAN COHEN, President, N. S. S.

Materialism.

MATERIALISM is the philosophy which recognizes and insists that, in the light of human experience, all emotions, feelings, and thoughts are nothing more than the products of the functioning of a material organism. It denies that there is any truth in the supposition that human beings possess a soul which is considered to be a spiritual entity, distinct from the body.

As a world-philosophy, it reduces everything to matter in motion, and claims that everything is a product of matter in motion. It recognizes that, so far as science is concerned, matter has always existed, and has always been in motion. Consequently, it refuses to acknowledge any necessity for postulating the existence of a being called "God," in order to account for or interpret the existence of the universe.

To the Materialist there is no need to postulate a creative mind, either external to, or immanent in, the universe, in order to bring about a unification of human knowledge. The unification of knowledge, if it is ever to be accomplished, will have to be brought about by the gathering together of all the available facts of the universe. These facts will have to be honestly acknowledged, and from them we shall have to make our deductions, if knowledge is to be made more and more reliable. That we shall some day fully understand the universe is not a claim put forward by Materialists. Materialism is not a philosophy which professes to explain everything. It is an attempt to describe the various processes which can be observed as taking place in the universe; and it is an endeavour to give accurate expression, so far as possible, to our conception of the relativity of those processes to each other, and more particularly to human life. With regard to the unification of knowledge, Materialists only hope to bring about that unification in the sense of eliminatiug from our ever-increasing stock of knowledge all false theories and all contradictions. Human knowledge will, no doubt, always be incomplete; but, even so, that is no reason why it should not become more unified, or more harmoniously wrought together, so far as it goes. But we must be ever on our guard against filling up the gaps with false theories, even when we find that such theories may be very pleasing.

Modern Materialism is essentially evolutionary. It recognizes that the various entities which we see around us have been formed by the perpetual rearrangements of the elements of Nature, which take place everywhere. There is no such thing as perfect rest, or a perfect static state; all rest is relative. Consequently, as all matter, so far as we know, is in a state of perpetual motion, new combinations of the various atoms of matter are bound to take place, and produce entities in unnumbered varieties. Hence, we may conceive of the universe as consisting of matter manifesting itself in its various states of motion, from the motions which take place in a nebula to the movements which are known to occur in the highest forms of life.

The origin of the universe is a question that has vexed the mind of man in almost every age. One theory or another has been put forward in order to explain to us how the universe came into existence. But the Materialist is unable to discover that the universe ever had an origin, so far as matter in motion is concerned. Matter in motion being the fundamental reality of the universe, it is correct to speak of the origin of the various parts of the universe, such as the sun, the moon, the stars, the earth, or any particular entity with which we are familiar. But it must be remembered that it is an origin with regard to form, or structure, and not of the matter which manifests itself in certain forms or structures. For instance, the earth, as such, was at one time non-existent, but the matter of which it is composed has always been in existence; consequently, when speaking of the origin of the earth, we should mean the origin of the earth's form, and not the origin of the matter in motion out of which the earth has evolved.

Perhaps we had better take a more simple illustration of how we may speak of the origin of a particular entity, and yet admit that the matter out of which that entity has been formed has always been in existence.

We are justified in speaking of the origin of a table, because we know that men do make tables. But the wood out of which the table has been made existed before the table came into existence. Before being cut, and carved, and put together in the form of a table, the wood was to be seen as planks and logs, of certain shapes and sizes, which had their origin at the saw-mill. Yet these planks and logs previously existed as the trunks and branches of trees; and the trees had their origin, not in newly created matter, but in matter which already existed in the forms of various chemical and physical elements, which combine together in order to produce trees. The elements from which our trees have evolved can be traced to the soil in which the seeds have been nourished; to the rain that has watered the soil; to the atmosphere surrounding the trees; and to the rays of the sun, which have given their light and heat. Thus we are able to strengthen the evidence that matter has always existed, but is ever manifesting itself in new forms, owing to its being in perpetual motion, and we are forced to the conclusion that the idea of a divine origin of the universe is a myth.

So far as we know, every process that has contributed to the evolution of the inorganic parts of the universe has taken place in a purely natural way. But, interesting as a review of the evolution of inorganic processes would be, it is not necessary to enter into such detail for the purpose of the present essay. The anti-Materialist is usually more concerned about the questions of the origin of life and consciousness. He considers that the views which he holds regarding these questions form the bulwarks of his position as taken up in opposition to the Materialist. We must, therefore, discuss the position of the philosophy of Materialism concerning life and consciousness.

From the standpoint of science, there is no strict line of demarcation between the inorganic and organic. Matter in the inorganic state seems to imperceptibly merge into matter in its organic state. The same elements are to be found in inorganic as in organic nature; but, in the latter, certain processes can be observed to take place which cannot be observed in the former. These processes are bound up with the fact that living matter is more highly evolved than non-living matter; and the combinations of the elements are more complex in the former than in the latter. In view of this, and in absence of proof of the special creation of living matter, we are lead as a logical necessity to conclude that it has evolved, by natural processes, out of inorganic matter.

Knowing that microscopic particles of matter are capable of effecting continual recombinations, the difficulty of grasping the idea of the development of the living from the non-living should be greatly minimized.

It must be remembered that the earliest forms of life were not so complex as the highly developed forms of life which we see around us to-day. The simplest living entities would, comparatively speaking, be only a step or two in advance of inorganic matter so far as the combination of their elements is concerned. It is, therefore, a mistake to argue against the idea of the evolution of the organic from the inorganic, as if it implied the immediate development of even a lowly multi-cellular animal from non-living matter. Yet this idea seems to be at the back of many minds.

The formation of life-substance, or protoplasm, was, we are informed by scientists, dependent upon the combination of carbon with such elements as oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, and sulphur. All these elements are found in inorganic matter; and, as metabolism, or the rearrangement of the elements of nature, is one of nature's essential processes, it is reasonable to expect that such a combination of these elements, as would produce living matter, should occur. That such elements, as are required to make possible the evolution of life, did happen to come together, at a time when the earth had cooled sufficiently to allow water to form on its surface, is matter of fact. And, the conclusion that this took place, without the influence of a designer operating upon nature, is supported by the fact that no elements, apart from those found in the inorganic world, are to be discovered in living matter. While the various processes—such as response to external stimuli, respiration, digestion, etc.—which occur in living matter, bear the mark, as it were, of having been evolved by a series of improvements, often tediously and painfully brought about, which give no evidence that they are the products of an all-wise being. But, if life started as protoplasm, unconsciously produced by nature, we can to some extent understand the imperfections of organic evolution; as, indeed, they are what might be expected in the circumstances. To assume the existence of a perfect, divine being, as the creator of living beings is to make the problem of the origin of life more difficult of solution; as we have then to reconcile the existence of a perfect being with that of his imperfect creations.

The Blank Wall.

XII.

The complexity of human life, its infinite paradoxes and bewildering inconsistencies, must impede and divert the Rationalist stream of thought and criticism. It is, indeed, debatable whether life is anything more than a deliberately organized evolution of mistakes, errors, and tragedies—domestic, commercial, racial, national, and even international. As Freethinkers, we may be quite certain that there is no "All-powerful," "Almighty God," or "Devil"; that these conceptions are primitive in origin; but, at the same time, we must acknowledge the very real and material existence of a universal ignorance which works "evil" miracles of misery, insanity, and stupidity beyond the most extravagant dreams of "Gods" or nightmares of "Devils."

"God" quite obviously does nothing, because there is no such creature. The "Devil" does nothing, because he, too, is a myth. It is Man who is "God"; it is Man who is "Devil." It is man who does a little good when he can if he is so disposed; it is Man who makes manifest the stupidity which devastates Humanity as a whole. We have removed from our brains the primitive offal of anthropomorphic conceptions of "God" and "Devil," but we have to acknowledge the reality of Man; and this is the first positive step towards our hope of Progress; it fixes the focus of sanity upon the central and fundamental fact about human life. It is better to shame a bad man than to "shame the Devil"; it is more beautiful to praise a good man than to praise "God." Religion "passes things on." Religion creates a vacuum in the common sense of man; it throws the onus upon the alleged reality of "something" outside the normal life of man; it befuddles the intellect and drugs the consciousness with illusion. Religion, like all superstitious elements in the primitive mind, side-tracks the seeker after truth; Man is decoyed from the realization that he, and he alone, can alter his life and make it exactly what he desires it to be. Do men want Peace? Do men desire the destruction of brute force and War?....."Pray," says the Church. "God can do all things. God is Almighty." But Man is slowly learning better than this; he is learning that "God" does not exist, and that man is greater and lesser (as he chooses) than "God" or "Devil." This is the death of Religion, and the birth of Light.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

The Sinner.

SHE came into the cafe three days of every week. And always about the same time. Her mien, contrary to that inaction so perceptible in the average cafe patron, was aloof and decisive. With marked persistency she went direct to one table, whenever vacant, not far from where we, a small coterie of business fellows, usually sat.

For almost twelve months her consistent appearance had gone on, until the regularity of her habit gradually evolved a certain pleasure for us. We eagerly anticipated her arrival, and looked forward to her stately deportment as a relief from the daily worry of business exactitudes.

She was stately, and superbly reserved. The continuous curves that gave shape to her wonderful form; the delicate lines of her distinctive features; the simple taste and rare quality of her apparel, all went to make up the fine commanding air that coerced a clamorous, yet distant, praise from all. One of the fairest flowers in nature's glorious garden, she was sent to gladden the heart of man.

It was grand how she kept the baseness of men at bay; kept them from wantonly crushing the delicate petals that formed the beauty of her being. We watched, and rejoiced when she cut dead the intended advances of would-be philanderers. And yet how strange! It was a discreet commonplace with us that her association with a certain city merchant could be "explained." In the ordinary course of things this information would have left us unmoved, such affairs were merely items "en passant." But this girl's position seemed anomalous, and it was difficult to reconcile our idealistic appreciation with the somewhat ugly fact. Yet we never dragged her down to vulgar censure. We wanted to think she was different from the coarser vassals of her class. She was different. She possessed a dignity that kept her freedom out of the mud-rucks of lust, and we often wondered what casuistry could be at work. But our speculations met a blank wall, so we accepted facts with a gracious leniency.

Our jurisdiction was influenced by the philosopher who, in spite of a strenuous business career, had been able to fortify his intelligence by an extensive field of reading. We reaped the benefit from controversial combats he had with another member of our party—a Churchman.

The girl figured prominently, many times, in these debates. From them, our hereditary ideas of morality slowly became obsolete, and our admiration for the girl rather increased than lessened. For she had a champion in the philosopher. This was why the Churchman called him a Positivist; which, in our limited opinion, seemed an honour to Positivism.

Perhaps we were not competent judges, for we were not initiated in the mysteries of theological paradoxes. But the philosopher's creed appealed to our world-worn experience; an experience untrammelled by the vagaries of artificial premises. To submit ourselves to feminine admonitions, we were certainly "shamefully" materialistic in our conclusions; yet they were healthier, and more natural, than the absolute moralizings of the Churchman. And so the Colossus, Sin, dwarfed before our analysis. The girl was just a child of Nature, and a victim of an emaciated society.

One day a wounded sergeant limped his way into her reserve, and we watched, and wondered. Weeks dragged into months, till at last the sergeant came, shorn of the hospital blue, looking magnificent in a perfect civilian cut. And well it fitted his splendid frame; perhaps just a little spoiled by the familiar limp; and there was a refinement, somehow overlooked before, which glowed from his face.

Who was he? What was he? We were not prompted by petty inquisitiveness; but this man had trespassed upon our preserve, and, with a sense of egotistical proprietory, our mental interrogations demanded satisfactory credentials. That he was respectable in worldly possessions seemed certain, for one of us had seen him drive up in a neat two-seater, a car that had many times of late been seen standing at the cafe door.

But our curiosity was never satisfied, for they both suddenly ceased to keep their rendezvous. We did elicit certain information (which was as startling as it was meagre) from the waitress who had generally served them. They had married, and left the town!

And so jurisprudence was overtaxed. The Churchman gasped, pitied the man, and reviled the girl. Poor atom! That she should have dared to make a bid for happiness; dared to stretch forth and pluck the solitary flower by the wayside, to grasp it eagerly, ravenously inhaling its glorious fragrance. It was the one cheering emblem along the barren road—and she stole it. Still sinning? What alchemy is this? Is happiness distilled only in the crucible of prudery?

The philosopher quietly said:—

"Nature, in her wondrous way,
The laws of man derides;
Herself the arbiter of sin,
A sense supreme provides."

WHAT WILL YOU PUT IN ITS PLACE?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—With your kind permission, I would like to offer a word or two anent your "Views and Opinions" of April 28. At the outset, I beg leave to differ as to "Nothing" being the best answer to the above question. I would prefer to answer the question by submitting that an appreciation of life in accordance with the explanations given by human knowledge rather than dogmatic assertions. In place of Christianity, I would offer a discovery of the world and its wonders. This seems to be rather more than weeding; it is rather, I would say, reconstruction. In "Our Aim" you say: "Of course, if a man believes that you cannot have a sound science, a healthy morality, or a progressive sociology without supernaturalism, he is warranted in asking for something equally effective in its place." Is this not giving your whole case away? Doesn't this apply to Christians generally? You say that the Christian blunders when he asks the Freethinker to account for the existence of evil. You say that is his own concern. In my humble sphere, I am glad when Christians ask me such a question, because it gives me an opportunity to try to disabuse their inherited barbaric conceptions. At the same time, I admit that the question of evil is important. We point to the evil in the world as a disproof of a ruling benevolent intelligence, but we must remember that the meaning of evil is entirely different to the Freethinker and the Christian. The Christian accounts for evil by assuming a wilful personality. The Freethought conception is more in accordance with the facts of life; the chief trouble being the want of congruity or agreement among mankind. While Freethinkers do not see in Nature any specially favourably disposed intelligence, neither do they see any specially evilly disposed intelligence apart from this world. In making my little effort, I might say that I have never been satisfied with the answer that Freethinkers in the past have given to this question. The answer is best given in the work of Freethinkers; and in this respect, Mr. Editor, I hold you second to none. Our storehouse is so richly endowed that it is not at all necessary to give such abrupt answers as "Nothing" and "Common sense." I hold this to be the most important question of all. It is a real revolution for anyone to view life without God rather than with God. I have Christian friends with whom I have discussed this question for very many years; and although they may continue in the Christian fold to the end, still I believe they are better humans for our fraternizing. But if they should change their persuasion, I would suggest that they should be helped to feel that the great bosom of Humanity is ever ready to welcome them. If they ask for bread, we should not offer them a stone and say, "Nothing."

Digitized by Google

J. Fothergill.

[We do not see in Mr. Fothergill's letter any point of vital disagreement. Our whole case was that all that is valuable and makes for good in life is already here, and more or less active, apart from Christianity. Consequently, the removal of Christianity is no more than the dissipation of an illusion.—Editor.]

A WARNING TO FREETHINKERS.

Sir,—May I support your advice, given in the last issue of the Freethinker, for Secularists everywhere to take instant action to resist further encroachments upon civil liberties by those who want their religion taught in the public schools at other peoples' expense? They may take my word for it that the danger is real, and that, like the prophet Habbakuk, the present Government is "capable de tout." Any day may give us a rude surprise, and if we are unprepared some secret, wretched compact will be embodied into an "agreed" Bill and rushed through the House of Commons before any action can be taken. The matter is, therefore, urgent; and it should be remembered that when once a measure is on the Statute Book, it is the Devil's own business to get it taken off again. Once let the ecclesiastics gain the strategic initiative and dig themselves in and the difficulty of dislodging them will be increased ten-fold.

Secular Education will not be won without an organized fight for it, and every Secularist should feel it a matter of personal honour to take his part in the struggle. How can he do this? By speeches, by papers before literary and debating societies, by constant correspondence in the newspapers, by organizing special meetings in its support, and perhaps, best of all, by becoming a member of the Secular Education League, which badly needs new friends at the present time. Its membership should be doubled within the next few months, and I hope that hundreds of Freethinkers will apply for membership without delay. I shall be glad to send information to anyone desiring it.

Sir,—Thanks for last week's article on the new Education Bill. Acting upon your suggestion, I have posted a copy to the M.P. for North Salford, and the object of this letter is to appeal to all friends of the Freethinker to do the same to their Parliamentary representative. An organized action of this kind will have far-reaching effect, but it should be done at once. I will also see that a resolution in support of the Secular Solution is sent to the Education Minister from our Branch without delay.

Obituary.

North and West London Freethinkers will hear with much regret of the death, on April 26, of Mrs. Theresa Cottrell, the wife of Mr. E. Cottrell, at the age of sixty-five. Mr. and Mrs. Cottrell have both been intimately associated with our Society for over forty years, and for more than half this period were regular attendants at all Freethought meetings, and were among the founders of the old Paddington Branch. Mrs. Cottrell was a most zealous supporter of the late Charles Bradlaugh, and a reader of the Freethinker from its inception. She was buried at East Finchley on May 1, and a Secular Service was held. We sympathize deeply with Mr. Cottrell in his sad bereavement.—E. M. Vance.

Deity and Design.

Last week we dealt with the more metaphysical aspects of the design argument. This week we purpose dealing with the more popular form—the one that is associated with the name of Paley, chiefly on account of his having popularized an argument that belonged to his predecessors. Paley's statement has all the merit of simplicity. We see objects which we know proceed from the work of man. We infer a maker from the thing made. In nature we see objects presenting similar marks of design or adaptation. And, again, we are equally warranted in arguing back from the thing made to the maker. So many parts are brought together in the case of a humanly produced object that it would be folly to ascribe such a combination to chance. Must it not be equal folly to ascribe to chance the bringing together all the parts that go to make up an animal or an organism? That is the argument reduced to its simplest terms, and, under one form or another, it is still the most widely used of all theistic defences.

A False Analogy.

The weaknesses of this are manifest and manifold, and these have been often pointed out, although the fundamental flaw appears to have generally escaped notice. It is not a true analogy at all. The inference that a watch or a machine is made is not based upon an examination of the parts. It is based upon previous knowledge that such things are made. Without that knowledge a watch would carry no more marks of design than a caterpillar. The steps are from the known maker to the known manufactured article, and then from a known-made article back to an assumed maker. In the case of the world or an animal the only likeness between that and the machine is that both exist. But we have no previous knowledge of world-makers upon which to build. Or it is pointed out by Mill that this does not give a creator of the universe, only a moulder of the material. That is true, but the believer might reply, all I require at present is an intelligence that creates animal forms and cosmical structures. We can settle the larger question of creation later. As Freethinkers have pointed out that the contrivances for evil in the world are at least as elaborate as those for good, and while both may show wisdom they cannot both show goodness. Or, again, if animals are designed to live, their imperfections are so many evidences against even the wisdom of their alleged maker. And to all of this the Theist might reply: "Granted, I am not arguing, at present for a wise or a good creator. I am only arguing for the existence of a God. And for that purpose a God who is not wholly good, or not wholly wise, or not wholly powerful, will serve. My case is simply that a God exists. Yours is, there is no evidence for any such existence. It is enough for me to establish his existence."

A Fatal Flaw.

The fundamental flaw in the design argument goes deeper than this attack and defence. Its fault is not that it is inconclusive, or that it does not prove enough, or that the evidence is weak, the real fault is that it is absolutely irrelevant to the question at issue. The argument has no bearing on the issue, the evidence has no relation to the case. To prove this let us give the Theist all for which he asks, remembering that his task is to prove that this world is the product of design. Take any animal structure: How does he know God designed that? "Oh," he replies, "look at the way in which the parts are brought together." But, admitting that the parts have really been brought together by someone, still, how does he know the product was designed? Let us illustrate. We remember once trying to make a pudding. All the parts of that pudding were brought together by us. There was no doubt of that. No one else had a hand in it. So an observer might have argued that the pudding was the result of design. But it really wasn't. It was altogether different from the pudding we designed. The pudding we designed was a gastronomic joy. It was all that a pudding should be. The pudding that resulted from our handiwork was in no way the pudding we designed. It was an entirely different thing. It came through our activity, but it was not the one we designed. Now, granting a God who stands to the world in the same relation as we did to the pudding, how can anyone tell that, although this world may have been made, this was the world designed? He simply cannot do it. There might be a God who manipulates the material of the universe; the world as it is might be the consequence of his manipulation; and yet the world might be an altogether different thing to the one designed.

What is Design?

Design, in fact, is not a physical thing at all, and you cannot, by examining physical processes and results, reach design. You cannot start with a material fact and reach intention. You must begin with intention, and end with a comparison of it and the physical fact. Things may be just the same whether there is design or not. If an enemy aeroplane drops a bomb on our house, we cannot logically say that this was the result of a designed act because it was the result of human agency. The airman may have designed to hit St. Paul's or Woolwich Arsenal. The bomb may have broken loose, and dropped sooner than it was intended to drop. But whether it was dropped by accident, or deliberately aimed at our house and reached its mark, or was intended for the Arsenal and reached us through bad marksmanship, the relation between the means—the bomb—and the end—the explosion—is the same. And we cannot, by examining the material chain of causes, reach design. To do this, we must compare the intention in the mind of the airman with the actual result. If the two agree, there is design; if not, design is absent. But the psychic fact must be first. You may start with mind as a datum; you cannot by any possibility reach it as a logical inference.

Digitized by Google

The Impossibility of Proof.

To warrant a logical belief in design in Nature, three things are necessary. First, one must assume that a God exists. Second, it must be granted that one is acquainted with the intention in the mind of the Deity before creating. Finally, one must be able to compare the intention with the result, and demonstrate their agreement. But the impossibility of knowing the first two things is patent. And without them the third is of no value whatever. The fundamental fault of the Design Argument, therefore, is, as we have said, not its weakness, but its irrelevancy. No amount of examination of Nature can lead back to design. All the volumes that have been written, and all the sermons that have been preached, depicting the varied and cunning structures of Nature, are so much waste of paper and breath. They are no more than dust thrown in the eyes of people. They prove nothing, and can prove nothing. They assume at the beginning all they require at the end. Their God is not something reached by way of inference; it is something assumed at the very outset. And its root is not in civilized reason at all. God, in civilized society, is a mere hereditary appanage. It was born, not of the reason of civilized man, but of the fears and guesses of the savage. To the sane intelligence, the existence of God is not even a question for discussion. There is only a discussion of the history of the belief, and in that is found its strongest and clearest condemnation.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

A Popular Delusion.

THE more we study the methods pursued by the pulpit the more evident it becomes that they are at once irresponsible and dishonest, and that their dishonesty is the natural outcome of their irresponsibleness. In the overwhelming majority of cases the pulpit is either a coward's castle, or a safety valve for fools. A tradition still survives that the preacher is Christ's ambassador, entrusted with a message from another world with which he dare not tamper; his one business being to deliver it in the exact form in which he receives it from his Master. But in as much as his Master is both invisible and silent, and never interferes in any way, he naturally grows careless, and falls into the habit of attributing to his Lord opinions and prejudices which are exclusively his own. In the prayer before the sermon he implores God to supply him with a special message, or to speak himself to the hearts and consciences of the people, well knowing that the discourse about to be delivered is in his pocket, fully written out, or carefully committed to memory, and that in answer to his prayer not a single syllable will be altered or suppressed. Generally speaking, prayer is an insincere, hypocritical exercise, and the same is essentially true of preaching. One of Browning's characters pities a certain preacher's "immense stupidity"; but, as a rule, much more noticeable than the stupidity is the criminal play-acting, the wicked pretending to speak in the name and by the authority of an absent Deity who never charges the speaker with his misrepresentation. Unfortunately, the hearers continue, to some extent, to take the preacher at his own valuation long after he himself has realized his true position; and as he is never formally called to account, either by the Lord or by the Lord's people, he waxes bolder and bolder, and utilizes the pulpit entirely for the expression of his own idiosyncrasies, eccentricities of temperament, and narrowness as well as shallowness of intellectual view. His theology becomes an endless repetition of meaningless shibboleths, and his messages degenerate into so many self-advertisements. Consequently, he naturally loses all real sense of responsibility, and utters only what he believes will be most acceptable to his audience, or least costly to himself. The other Sunday morning, in a provincial town less than two hundred miles from London, a preacher, occupying for the day the pulpit of a Congregational Tabernacle, took for his text Matthew xvi. 24: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." The sermon began with the lying assertion that Jesus was the most attractive and popular personality of his own day. Even assuming the historicity of the Gospels the popularity of Jesus was extremely limited, confined to a few localities in an out-of-the-way part of the country, and lasting only for a short time. The tide soon turned against him, and his brief public career ended in humiliating disaster. It is only fair to add that the preacher admitted his ultimate unpopularity, or that he repelled as well as attracted people; but the repulsion was explained as the natural reward of his indomitable fidelity to truth.

But the preacher, undeterred by stubborn facts, declared that Jesus has proved the most attractive personality of the ages, neither Confucius nor the Buddha being in the running at all. Amazing is the audacity of a man who can so utterly ignore the facts as to indulge in such a false declaration without a blush. The people who heard and seemed to enjoy the lie belonged almost exclusively to the so-called middle class, the workers being conspicuous only by their absence, although the streets were crowded while the service was going on. Very probably the statement was one the congregation had heard so often that they took its truth for granted. It was simply one of a host of pulpit platitudes which tickled their vanity and made no demand whatever upon their thinking faculties. The preacher was eminently Scriptural throughout, his discourse from beginning to end bristling with quotations from the Bible; but he was also wholly destitute of the slightest tinge of originality in either exegis or application. Christianity is defined by the Bishop of Oxford as "a certain kind of personal belief and a certain kind of personal life," but in the sermon under consideration it was reduced to mere imitation of the life of Jesus. To deny self signifies to root it clean out of our nature; to take up the Cross is to face suffering and sorrow cheerfully, and to follow Christ, to shirk no duty, however disagreeable, and welcome death itself in the service of the truth. This, we repeat, was loyalty to the written word, but it lacked the feeblest grip on reality. It was Christianity without Christ, or the old Paganism draped with Christian phraseology. With certain words left out, the discourse might have been given in a Confucian or Buddhist temple. It was Christianity minus its fundamental doctrines that the preacher presented to us. Curiously enough, in the evening of the same day we attended a Unitarian place of worship and listened to practically the same views, but presented with such a vast and vital difference. The Jesus of the morning address rested upon a supernatural basis, while the Jesus of the evening discourse was a human teacher come from God, whose words should be done by all his professing followers. In the background of the mind each of those two preachers entertained a radically different conception of Christianity from that held by the other. And yet both preached substantially the same Gospel, and both equally had the lie direct given them by the facts of life.

To the Unitarian, the orthodox Church was guilty of betraying the Christian religion with a kiss. During the dark period of the regnancy of ecclesiasticism, Christianity was a dead letter; the beautiful and deeply true sayings of Jesus were as totally neglected as if they had never been spoken. Creed and ritual were treated with supreme respect, while conduct, which Matthew Arnold regarded as three-fourths of life, received but slight attention. And yet, the preacher assured us, the humble-minded, sweet-tempered, beautifully spirited teacher of Nazareth is destined to win the world's heart and bring all life into loving subjection to himself. But here again we are face to face with the irresponsible extravagance of the Christian pulpit. The supernatural Jesus is much more popular even to-day than the merely human one. The Congregational minister faced a congregation that more than half filled a moderately large church, while the Unitarian's audience numbered less than twenty. It is a vain delusion to speak of the popularity of any of the hundred different versions of the Gospel Jesus now extant. Superstition dies hard, but its death-knell has sounded and its grave is already dug. The day of Jesus is past, and Man's day is dawning. Even God himself is almost gone. As Swinburne says:—

> Thou art judged, O Judge, and the sentence is gone forth against thee, O God.
> Thy slave that slept is awake; thy slave but slept for a span;
> Yea, man thy slave shall unmake thee, who made thee lord over man.
> For his face is set to the East, his feet on the past and its dead.

The very divines are to-day rapidly manufacturing Atheists.

> —Matthew Arnold, "Lines on Harriet Martineau."

The life of Harriet Martineau is the simple record of a quiet and eminently useful existence devoted to the service of her fellows. It will be of interest to those who never read the literary works of this great and noble woman. So far back as 1832 Lucy Aikin wrote to Dr. Channing: "You must know that a great, new light has risen among Englishwomen." Lord Brougham, a still better authority, remarked to a friend about the same time: "There is at Norwich a deaf girl, who is doing more good than any man in the country."

It was in that quiet cathedral city that Harriet Martineau was born. She has given us a picture of life in the town; of its clerical exclusiveness and intellectual stagnation, only slightly modified by the social gatherings of a few cultured families, and by an infusion of French blood, the result of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Martineaus themselves were among the "aliens" whom that intolerant measure drove to our then hospitable shores. At Norwich they had flourished for about a century, part of the family devoting itself to silk-weaving, while others were in the medical profession. Harriet's father died young, leaving a family of eight children, of whom Harriet and her brother James, the distinguished theologian, are both famous.

Harriet was barely of age when she published her first book, Devotional Exercises for Young Persons, a modest religious publication of the Unitarian School, in which she had been brought up. It is a work of very little consequence, but it was the harbinger of a splendid series of productions which were destined to raise her to the pinnacle of fame and influence.

Her mind ripened rapidly, and there was soon a marked improvement in her choice of subjects. Works of fiction, travel, folk-lore, biography, and sociology, followed in rapid succession. Her fertile and versatile pen even attempted a series of stories illustrating the working of the principles of Political Economy, which had been laid down in an abstract manner by Adam Smith, Bentham, and Romilly. These stories had a wide circulation, and were translated into several Continental languages. She found time for travel, visiting the United States, and meeting with a most cordial reception. On her return to this country, she associated herself with Charles Knight, the famous publisher, and contributed a number of useful books to the popular series which earned for him a well-deserved and enduring reputation.

With the object of lightening her literary labours by variety, she next employed her busy pen on a series of tales for children, of which The Settlers at Home and Feats on the Fiord are still read. At the same time she produced two novels of a very marked and distinguished character, called Deerbrook and The Hour and the Man, the latter dealing with the unhappy Toussant L'Ouverture and the Haytian Rebellion. This latter work passed through many editions, and remains, perhaps, her most popular work.

About this time her health failed, and Lord Melbourne pressed upon her acceptance a Government pension, but she was too high-minded and conscientious to accept it. In declining this pension, she pointed out that she could not share in the proceeds of a system of taxation which she had criticized adversely. Her illness lasted several years; but she, characteristically, turned her misfortune to account by writing Life in a Sick Room, a work which alike proves her rare courage and serenity under the iron hand of affliction. Soon after her restoration to health, she varied the monotony of a laborious life by a visit to the Orient, and recorded her impressions in Eastern Life, a work which is still full of interest, for in it she declared her Freethought opinions.

During all these years her mind had been irresistibly growing, and the result of her mature thought was embodied in Letters on the Laws of Man's Nature and Development, written conjointly with Henry George Atkinson, who was afterwards a frequent contributor to the National Reformer and other Secular journals. This volume revealed to all the world that Harriet Martineau was an Atheist. Nor was this her most notable contribution to Freethought literature, for three years later she introduced to the English-speaking world a version of Auguste Comte's Positive Philosophy, a work destined to have an enormous effect on contemporary thought. While thus employed, she yet found time to write her History of England During the Thirty Years' Peace, which is characterized by its extreme clarity and fine impartiality, and is, perhaps, the finest historical work written by a woman in our language.

From this time it was mainly as a leader-writer in the Daily News and as a contributor to Once a Week that her literary ability manifested itself. To the last, in spite of the drawback of bad health, she took the greatest interest in every movement for the bettering of humanity. She lived through a long, happy, useful, irreproachable life, and sank, calmly, full of years, into the grave, regretted and esteemed by all.

Because Harriet Martineau taught the vital truths of Liberty and Fraternity, of good deeds to others, of kindly tolerance, she is worthy of warm and genuine approval. Popularity, applause, and friends were rightly hers. Who knows, when the final result is weighed, who will have done the most good in the world—the artist who adds masterpieces to our literature, or the warm-hearted woman who does her best to alleviate "the weariness, the fever, and the fret" of life? If Freethinkers, still true to the long line of their illustrious dead, keep her memory green, holding her, as she was, the embodiment of true womanhood, then better than in effigy or epitaph will her life be written and her tomb be built in the hearts of her fellow-soldiers in the Army of Human Liberation.

Materialism.

II.

AFTER protoplasm, or the fundamental life-substance, had made its appearance on the earth, there was evolved the cell from which all living beings, that develop in the ordinary way, take their start. The development of this cell-unit was secondary. That is, it was preceded by the formation of un-nucleated, and almost structureless, living matter. The cell-unit is of definite structure, and has a nucleus. It has, therefore, quite a history behind it, which precludes the idea that even so small a form of living matter was specially created.

Here it is not possible to enter into the details of the evolution of sex, or discuss important subjects relating to the biological question of reproduction. Suffice it to say that man does not form an exception to the fact that all higher animals develop from a single cell which is brought into being by the coalescence of a male and a female cell.

From the single cell man evolves, stage by stage, in the same way in which the dog and the horse evolves; and at no time in his development does he show any signs of being under the especial care of a divine creator. Just as in the dog and the horse, cell is added to cell, until the whole body becomes a vast cell state, so it is in man. The various organs of the body are formed by a natural process of evolution; and, as occasion demands, they begin to function, unless from some cause or other the new being is defective. From beginning to end, so far as the development of the bodily structure is concerned, the whole process is a materialistic one. Yet the theologically minded have informed us that man has been made in the image of a divine being, in the sense that he is a spiritual soul, with a specially created body in which he dwells.

We must now deal with the materialistic evolution of the psychic life of man. And, in doing so, we shall find that there is no evidence for the theory that man's consciousness, or his mind, is of divine origin.

The pyschic life of man includes the whole of the activity of the nervous system and the brain, whether that activity be conscious or unconscious. Reflex actions, and automatic acts are as much part of our psychic life as mind, or consciousness, is. And every process which takes place in man's psychic life is a manifestation of matter in motion.

Consciousness, which I take to be the same as mind, is a mode of motion that is quite natural to the delicate and highly sensitive matter of which the brain is composed. The purely natural development of mind-life can be traced, from the unconscious sensitivity of the lower forms of animal life, to the brain of the higher animals, including man. Not only so; we can observe it in the evolution of the child into the adult.

The physical basis of mental life has been termed psychoplasm. It consists of protoplasm, which is capable of psychic activity. In the earliest forms of animal life practically the whole of the protoplasm reacts, in an indiscriminate manner, when under the influence of stimuli from without. That is, no specific sense-organs have been developed. Later on, the formation of rather vague sense-organs, which are considered to be the forerunners of the nerves of touch and sight, takes place. Then, in still higher forms of animals, specific organs of sense appear. They are the chemical instruments of smell and taste; and, also, the physical organs of touch, temperament, hearing, and sight. This is followed by another stage in the evolution of the psychic life of animals, in which an approach to consciousness is made. The nervous system becomes more centralized, and impressions made upon the sense-organs by the outside world are, to some extent, unconsciously associated.

Lastly, we have the highest stage of development, in which we find the psychic function of conscious perception, as in the higher vertebrates and in man.

For a fuller statement of the gradual development of consciousness, from the sensitiveness of the protoplasm of the lowest animals, I refer to Haeckel's chapter on "Psychic Gradations," in the Riddle of the Universe. To a large extent I have followed that chapter in making my brief statement of psychic evolution.

It must be remembered that the evolution of psychic life has been very slow, and that a long series of minute developments forms the chain of evolution, by which the simple response to stimuli in the lowest animals is linked to the consciousness of the external world, which manifests itself in the brain of man. Then the fact that the development of mind-life is dependent upon the evolution of psychoplasm into nerve-system and brain will be more easily grasped.

I shall not attempt to give a detailed description of the brain, but will content myself with stating one or two facts in connection with it.

The psychic life of man, both conscious and unconscious, is dependent upon a nervous system, which makes its ramifications into various parts of the body; and upon the groups of nerve-centres situated in the spinal cord and the brain. The nerves consist of bundles of fine white fibres, and are divided into two important classes. We have the sensory nerves, which are subject to nervous action on their end-organs being stimulated. Their end-organs are attached to the skin, and the membrane of the stomach, etc., while the other ends of the sensory nerves are connected with the nerve-centres of the spinal cord and the brain. The sensory nerves are the in-going nerves, as they transmit to the brain and spinal cord impressions made upon their end-organs by the outer world.

Then we have the motor nerves, which are stimulated to nervous action from the nerve-centres. These nerves are, at their outer terminations, mainly attached to the muscles. They are the out-going nerves, and may be set in motion as the result of thought or nerve reflex action. The nerve-centres, both in the spinal cord and the brain, consist of nerve-cells formed of a greyish kind of matter.

In the spinal cord the grey nerve-cells are to be found in the centre, and the white nerve-fibres on the exterior.

On the other hand, the grey nerve-cells of the brain are on the outer side, while the white nerve-fibres spread themselves inside.

Acid Drops.

If only the Government would rise to a plain statement, we should dearly like to know who was responsible for the exemption of the clergy from the Military Service Act. Nonconformists avow their indignation at being excluded; so do the Anglicans. And if we credit these protests, it seems that the Government alone was responsible. First it put the clergy in, and then it took the clergy out. And if we believe the protests of the clergy to be genuine, the Government was acting "on its own." Can it be that it thought the "spiritual" value of the clergy as an aid to winning the War too great to be lost? Looking at the Government, one would hardly think so. And so the matter stands. Everyone from eighteen to fifty-one is in the Army, except the women (who may yet be conscripted), the physically defective, and the clergy.

The Chief Rabbi has followed the Christian Bishops in declaring that the Jewish clergy are anxious to join the Army, and had no wish to be exempt from the operations of the Military Service Act. We quite believe that they are just as anxious as are the Christian clergy to join the Army. But if they are so desirous of joining, why the deuce don't they do so? The Act doesn't force them to stay at home. It only declines to force them to go.

A humorous incident took place at the Baptist Union meeting. An address was given by an Army Chaplain on the relations of the Baptist Church to the soldiers. At the conclusion, the President announced a hymn, "Souls of men! Why will ye scatter like a crowd of frightened sheep?"

"The ordinary clergy," says an evening paper, "have, on the whole, played their part as Christian ministers and as English patriots." Indeed! "On the whole" the clergy have stayed at home, and left the defence of the nation to other men.

The members of the Stratford-on-Avon Shakespeare Club attended church on April 28 as part of the annual observance. Apparently, the pious members of the Club do not realize that the poet himself did not often trouble the pew-openers.

Since the famous proclamation of the three tailors of Tooley Street, beginning, "We, the people of London," there has been nothing to compare with "a message from the Christian people of Great Britain to the Christian people of Russia," published in the English press. This document is signed by fifty-two persons who presume to speak for the millions of British people who profess and call themselves Christian. Among the signatories are three members of Parliament, two directors of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, one lady inspector of factories, a cocoa manufacturer, and a real bishop. The message has, we are assured, been "cabled to Russia to be read in the Churches." We wonder what the authorities of the Greek Church will think of this scratch-team of fancy religionists? Perhaps it will be like the cocoa-manufacturer's boast, "Grateful and comforting."

"A Man of Kent," in the British Weekly for May 2, says that George Meredith "must have been in a gloomy humour" when he remarked, during an interview with Desmond McCarthy: "Nature cares not a pin for the individual. I am content to be shovelled into the ditch." But "A Man of Kent," who is no other than Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, is certainly wrong. Nature's persistent indifference to the individual was a cardinal article in Meredith's creed, and in both prose and poetry his treatment of it is characterized by anything but "a gloomy humour." Christianity bestows its supreme care upon the individual, and as an inevitable result it has been guilty of gross neglect towards society. Meredith, on the contrary, loved the race, and insisted upon the service of it as our chief duty. Individuals come and go without ceasing, but the race endures through all generations.

Newspaper editors often have to sit on the fence, but it is not often they do it so openly as the editor of the Times, who said in one issue: "We have made no attempt as yet to assess the direct responsibility of the Vatican for the action of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland," and a few days later stated: "The Vatican has not inspired the action of the Roman Church in Ireland."

An editor, trying to explain the Man-Power Bill, pointed out that "men in B2 are still in Grade 3." It is almost as puzzling as the tangle of the Trinity.

We are sorry to learn that the Rev. Rhondda Williams, of Brighton, has lost a gallant son in the War; but it was scarcely playing the game to exploit the sad event to serve a religious purpose, as the reverend gentleman is reported to have done. "He confessed that if he had been an Atheist the experiences of the past four weeks would have been enough to convert him." Not being an Atheist, it is sheer nonsense of Mr. Williams's even to pretend to know what effect such a bereavement would have had upon him had he been one. Atheists have lost sons in this War, and they are Atheists still, the mournful experience through which they have passed having only confirmed them in their Atheism.

There is to be erected a huge War museum which is to contain relics of "the Great War." We would suggest the following as worthy of a place: (1) Mr. Bottomley's Virgin of Albert, which was held up by the interposition of God—until the Germans cut the fastenings with which the British engineers had secured it; (2) Some feathers from the wings of the angels that saved our Army at Mons; (3) the Kaiser ordering his Army to pray to God for victory; (4) King George ordering the nation ditto; (5) plaister group of the Bishop of London on his visit to the Front surrounded by hordes of British soldiers begging him to send out more chaplains; (6) group representing the indignation of the clergy on being left out of the Military Service Acts; (7) statue of the Bishop of London uttering his famous "Thank God for the Zeppelins!"; (8) group representing Father Bernard Vaughan discussing with Jesus Christ the ethics of non-resistance; (9) Bible which saved a soldier's life by intercepting a bullet; (10) pack of playing-cards which did the same; (11) expression on the face of a soldier who, on opening a parcel from home, found it to contain nothing but a Bible and a number of religious tracts.

Connecticut recently repealed her old "blue sky laws" and for the first time in 300 years milkmen, druggists, ice cream stores, and similar mercantile establishments did a flourishing business on Sunday. It argues unusual endurance for a people to have stood such ridiculous laws for so long. Perhaps the change is part of the religious revival due to the War.

A newspaper paragraph states that the Bishop of Norwich has placed his palace and grounds at the disposal of the Red Cross Society. The Founder of the Christian religion was not so fortunate; he had no palaces and servants.

A "Rural Dean," writing in the Church Times, sharply criticizes the loose talk about the revival of religion at the Front. He says that "if there is any sort of revival of religion in the trenches, we find practically no trace of it among the men to whom it is our privilege to minister at home." Of course, the reason is that it exists neither at home nor abroad. Indeed, the fact that parsons write and speak as they do about the revival of religion at the Front makes one wonder at the stupidity of their audiences. For everyone knows the soldiers, more or less. We knew them before they went out; we hear from them while they are out; and we meet them when they come home. How much religion do we hear or see? And if we can see this kind of bare-faced lie planted on the people, need we wonder that the greater lie of Christianity was forced on the world at a less critical period than ours?

Commenting on May 5 on one of our "Acid Drops," Mr. J. McKenna writes dissenting from the conclusion that the Irish Question is a religious question. He says:—

> I contend, and have always contended, that religion has absolutely nothing to do with the Irish Question. But it has been exploited to side-track what is essentially the Irish Question which is, was, and will be. Robbery, yes, sir, had the Irish been Hindoos, Agnostics, or anything else, you would have the Irish Question as you have the Indian Question. Irishmen are beginning to understand a foreign Government dominating politically and a foreign Church spiritually, and sooner or later they will shake themselves free from both and settle the Irish Question themselves.

We do not think it can be gathered from the paragraph in question that there is nothing but religion in the Irish Question. There are, of course, other factors involved. But we do not think it can be doubted that the two religions in Ireland—one identified with English rule and the other with Irish national aspirations is the factor that makes settlement so difficult. Without this the situation would present only such difficulties as have been or are being overcome elsewhere.

Commercialism and Christianity often run in double harness. At the Sunday-school Union's Book Department, Ludgate Hill, London, the centre of one of the large windows is taken up with a display of Jerome K. Jerome's book, Three Men in a Boat. One would have imagined that a Sunday-school Union would be more concerned with eight persons in the ark.

The Church militant, after four years of War, is at length waking up. Here are some headlines from a newspaper: "Dean Inge Attacks Labour Party"; "Bishop Attacks Bishop." The clergy are leaving their vicarage entrenchments at last.

A half-column announcement in the press is headed "Y.M.C.A. Needs Money." We never remember the time when these young Christians were not in a state of impecuniosity.

Speaking at the Lower House of Convocation, Dean Inge said that men had no right to mix up politics and Christianity. Yet the dear bishops do "mix up politics and Christianity" in the House of Lords, as Democrats have real reasons for remembering.

The China Inland Mission acknowledges the receipt of over £115,000 this year, being an increase of £20,000. The Annual in answering the question: "Why has God given the mission this increase?" replies: "it is because he knew how serious the loss by exchange would be." Now, that really is considerate. And the picture of God Almighty studying current tables of exchange in order to see that the China Inland Mission doesn't lose anything is quite fascinating. And we are quite sure that when the Chinese look at the present state of Europe they will quite appreciate God's desire to make them more like unto us.

A new work of reference is being advertised in the daily press as "the greatest book in the world." Won't the dear clergy be pleased?

The clergy are still using the fiction of the angels at Mons. At the Central Hall, Westminster, a Wesleyan minister expressed belief that the enemy was checked in a supernatural way at Mons, and prayed for the intervention of more angel hosts to-day.

Sir J. J. Thomson's Education Committee has recommended that natural science should be included in the general course of education of all children. If this course is adopted the dear clergy will not find the children so gullible concerning the fairy tales of the Bible.

The London City Mission speaks very dolefully of the outlook in the Metropolis. In its Annual Report the public is told, concerning "unbelief," that "never has the enemy been so aggressive, so seemingly powerful, as to-day," and no "peace offensive," to use the graceful language of Lord Robert Cecil, is likely to be made. Again: "The working classes are largely outside the reach of normal Christianity, and the clergy are handicapped in dealing with them." So much for the religious revival in London. And we wonder what the Bishop of London, with his fantastical yarns about religion in East London, thinks of the above?

Dr. Henson, Bishop of Hereford, wants to get rid of the "insensate folly of denominational divisions" in Christendom. He has our sympathy, but he has his work cut out to reconcile Christadelphians, Unitarians, Swedenborgians, and other fancy religionists, with the Government Church.

The Rev. S. M. Watts, the new superintendent at Whitefield's Tabernacle, says that present-day Christians have a "delicate spiritual digestion." This looks as if he had found out that they cannot swallow the story of "Jonah and the Whale."

The Rev. William Henry Robert, of Philadelphia, says there never was a time in the history of the world when more faith in God was needed than right now. And there never was a time when so many people were seeing what a hollow fraud faith in God is.

Following the "toning down" of the more barbaric expressions in the Psalms, the Lower House of Convocation has been engaged in revising the New Testament. The clergy have been searching for a substitute for the word "Damnation," and have decided to use the word "Judgment." Presumably, Hell will still remain at the usual temperature.

Three hundred people, mostly women, took part in a procession from Newgate to Tyburn in memory of the martyrs of Tyburn. Why did they dissemble their love for the martyrs of Smithfield?

Some of the newspaper editors are waking up to the fact that the Irish question is mainly a religious one. The Evening Standard deplores the attempt of the Catholic clergy "to restore the theological temperature of the days of Titus Oates." If not wisely handled, the political situation will be raised to the temperature of the place so often mentioned in sermons.

The Daily News recently printed a bright description of some Yellow Press publications as "the ill-looking Sunday papers, with pictures of murderers and people who are still alive because they took the right pills."

At the Royal Academy Exhibition a sensational picture depicts a ballet-girl in her war-paint, prone on the ground and clutching at the feet of Christ. It would serve as an excellent advertisement of the Church and Stage Guild.

In a leading article, the Evening Standard (London) states that "The Prussian system is simply the negation of God." How is it that the German soldiers bear the words "God with us" on their uniforms?

Of a woman who was sentenced to six months' hard labour at Sheffield for false pretences, it was stated that she had belonged at different times to every religious sect in Sheffield, and had exploited each one in turn. Evidently, she knew where to look for credulous folk.

Private Charles Ernest Elmes, A.S.C., has been committed for trial for marrying three wives. His Old Testament ideals of marriage are not appreciated in a Christian country.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 26, Maesteg.

T. C. Riglin.—Mr. Cohen has written you. Nothing more is needed to withdraw your child from religious instruction in any school receiving a Government grant than a simple intimation to the effect that such is your desire. No explanation or reasons for the request need be given.

S. Hall.—Sorry we can't explain why God doesn't stop the War. We suggest an application to the local parson, whoever he may be.

R. F.—Go ahead. We can do with all the new readers you may find. And our motto, based on experience, is, "You find readers; we keep them." Before we are done, we hope to see the Freethinker with a circulation really worthy of it.

N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—"Ernest," £1; W. Francis, 2s. 6d.

N. S. S. General Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—W. Francis, 2s. 6d.

F. Kenyon.—We are sending you out the Freethinker, with a few pamphlets.—This correspondent, at present in Mesopotamia, would be glad to hear of any Freethinker with whom he could correspond regularly. Address should be sent to this office.

H. Truckell (Barrow-in-Furness).—We are obliged to you, and have written to the address given. Will prove very useful.

V. H. Smith.—We are not, as you will see, dealing with that aspect of the argument in discussing design in Nature. It is dealt with in our new pamphlet, God and Man. Pleased you are so interested in the "Views."

A. T. Edwards.—Pleased to have your congratulations. Papers have been sent.

W. Mawson (Edinburgh) and C. Kerr (Eastbourne).—Certainly, call at the office. You will see we are keeping the Freethinker office open later on Saturday, the 18th, on purpose to meet visitors.

D. Keir.—The office will not be open on Monday—Bank holiday. Shall be pleased to see you any other day if you will drop a card.

C. F. Simpson.—Received with thanks. Will do as you request. Change of address noted.

G. H. Murphy.—We shall be pleased to avail ourselves of your offer of service, and will write you later on the matter.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings and collection of epitaphs.

C. F. Dixon.—We are greatly encouraged by your interest in the Freethinker and its work. Many thanks.

W. K. Smith.—Received, and shall be pleased to use as early as possible.

E. Lane.—The ground rents of London amount to over twenty million annually. The Dukes of Westminster, Bedford, Norfolk, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (in whose hands rest the revenues of the Church of England) are among the largest owners.

A. J. Marriott.—Sorry we are unable to find space for your letter, but we quite sympathise with your protest against gratuitous interference with public liberty.

C. W. Goulder.—Pleased to have your approval. We have every sympathy for those who have lost relatives in the War, and also for the sufferings of those who have them still engaged in the conflict.

H. Thurlow.—We greatly appreciate your remarks, and think you will be pleased with the result.

S. E. Brandall.—Papers are being sent. We are under no anxiety as to our "ability to carry on." A stiff struggle makes it the more interesting.

T. James.—Tithe was originally paid the Church on condition that one-fourth should be distributed among the poor. In process of time the parson grabbed the lot.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There seems likely to be a number of provincial Freethinkers in London over Whitsuntide, and not all in connection with the N.S.S. Conference. Several have written to say they intend calling at the Freethinker office in the hopes of meeting the editor, so we have decided to keep the office open until 6 o'clock instead of closing at mid-day as usual. The N. S. S. Offices at 62 Farringdon Street (next door) will be open until the same hour, and Miss Vance will be in attendance.

London Freethinkers will, we hope, do their best to see that the evening meeting at the Queen's Hall is a good one As will be seen by reference to our back page, the platform is an attractive one, and the hall should be crowded. Admission is free, and every Freethinker would do well to make it a point of bringing an inquiring friend with him. The doors open at 6 o'clock, and the chair will be taken at 6.30.

London members will, we trust, not forget the business meetings of the Conference, at 10.30 and 2.30. Not much can be done this year in the way of providing refreshments for delegates, but enough will be provided to ward off starvation. Only members are admitted to the morning and afternoon meetings, and admission will be by exhibition of membership card, which must be produced at the door.

A friend who is interested in increasing the circulation of the Freethinker has placed at our disposal the sum of £2 16s. as payment for twenty-one quarterly subscriptions to this paper. He suggests that the recipients be soldiers at the Front, as a likely way of getting the Freethinker well read. We think this is excellent, and it will serve to supplement what we are already doing in that direction. So we shall be pleased to receive from our readers the names and addresses of soldiers to whom a weekly copy of the Freethinker would be acceptable. We should also like to add to the paper itself a few pamphlets which will, we hope, prove equally useful.

One of our friends at West Ham was, we are pleased to see, successful in getting a Labour Conference in that district to unanimously pass a resolution "That all State education, from kindergarten to university, should be purely secular." This is good work, and we hope other Trade and Labour organizations will follow suit.

We publish this week two four-page tracts by Mr. Cohen on What is the Use of the Clergy? and What Will You Put in its Place? We feel certain that they will prove useful, and we should like them to be widely distributed. As they are not published for profit, we are offering them at about cost price. This is an opportunity for all our friends to do a little useful propaganda for a very moderate outlay. The price of these tracts is 1s. 6d. per 100, postage 3d.; so that for 15s. anyone may put a thousand of these into circulation. We have printed a large supply of each, and we venture to ask the help of our friends to see that they are put into circulation quickly. They will be followed by others.

Next week (May 26) Mr. J. T. Lloyd visits Maesteg, and will deliver two lectures. This is the first meeting held by the new Branch which is being formed, and we hope that Freethinkers in the locality will make a point of being present. We have not yet been informed of the times and place of meetings, but that will probably come along in time for next issue.

The Southampton Branch reports a well-attended meeting on Sunday last to listen to Mrs. Palmer's address on "The Endowment of Motherhood," followed by a good discussion. We are glad to learn that things are promising in this new Branch.

The Mechanism of Man.

VI.

ALL the multitudinous activities of life are ultimately dependent upon respiration. The cells would perish, the blood would be poisoned, and the heart soon cease to beat, were the oxygen of the atmosphere denied access to the body. In the earthworm, amœba, and other lowly creatures, the surface of the body functions as a breathing structure. And precisely the same principle obtains for all the higher animals and plants. In fact, respiration is universal throughout the entire realm of organic Nature. So, to furnish the internal cells with their essential oxygen, the great multicellular animals need a respiratory surface much larger than that afforded by the skin surfaces. This requirement is met by the presence of a complex arrangement of internal organs which function as oxygen-absorbing surfaces. So exceedingly complicated are the human lungs, that were these organs unfolded, and all their tubes and cavities spread out in a flat sheet, that, according to the estimate of Professor Leonard Hill, they would cover a surface of twenty-seven square feet.

The air, unless the mouth is open, passes in at the nose, and returns through that organ. Each nostril leads to a cavity from which the nasal duct proceeds. The nasal passages open into the throat region or pharynx, and from the pharynx two tubes are directed below. One of these is the windpipe (trachea), and the other is the gullet or esophagus. The air now travels through the larynx or voice-box, which is really the enlarged upper end of the trachea. Beneath the larynx lies the trachea or windpipe, which is the largest air-tube in the body. It runs down in front of the neck into the thorax, while the gullet proceeds downwards at its back. At the upper region of the thorax or chest cavity, the trachea divides into two main branches, termed the right and left bronchus. Each leading bronchus proceeds to the lung situated on its own side, and enters that organ at its root. Having reached the lung, the bronchus speedily breaks up into branches—the bronchial tubes.

The main breathing organs, the two lungs, together with the heart and its great vessels, occupy the greater part of the thorax. Between the two lungs are placed the heart and its appendages. The right lung possesses three lobes, while the left has two only. That the lungs function as filters is evidenced by the fact that in the young these organs are pale pink in appearance, but they darken in later life, and this change is most pronounced in those who breathe the dust-strewn atmosphere of crowded and busy cities.

The chief respiratory muscles are the diaphragm, a muscle which divides the thorax or chest from the abdomen or belly; the muscles which form the walls of the abdomen; and two muscular structures situated between the ribs. These last consist of two sets of short muscles, and are termed the intercostals. When air is breathed in or inspired, the ribs ascend, and the diaphragm descends; while during expiration, when air is breathed out, the ribs descend, the abdominal walls contract, and the transmitted pressure serves to raise the relaxed diaphragm. Dr. Meachen thus describes the respiratory process:—

> Inspiration is produced by the external intercostal muscles and the diaphragm; expiration by the internal intercostal muscles, aided by the natural elastic recoil of the chest-wall and lungs. The diaphragm descends in inspiration and rises in expiration. In both these movements the lungs follow the chest, inflating when it expands, and shrinking when it falls in again.

The lungs are non-muscular, but are composed of tissue containing a vast number of cavities—the pulmonary alveoli or air-cells. Lobules or clusters of air-cells are most abundant near the surface of the lungs. These alveoli are elastic, and enlarge as the chest expands. The air cavities are coated with an exceedingly delicate membrane of epithelial cells, through which oxygen easily enters and the poisonous carbon dioxide as easily escapes. The red blood corpuscles are the body's oxygen-carriers and distributors, and these discs derive their oxygen from the outer air during the act of breathing. Deprivation of oxygen proves fatal in a few minutes. An animal denied access to this life-sustaining gas quickly succumbs to asphyxia. Death by drowning, strangulation, or smothering is always due to the absence of oxygen.

All the vital active cells of the organism are constantly forming waste material, and carbon dioxide is one of the most noxious of these. Carbon dioxide or carbonic acid gas (CO_2) is composed of one part carbon and two parts oxygen in a state of chemical combination. If this gas be permitted to remain in the tissues the gas, or in any case the organic particles contained in it, soon poison the body. This baleful product of cell activity must be expelled from the system if life is to persist. Therefore, it is absorbed by the blood and passed on to the lungs, where it escapes from the pulmonary capillary vessels into the air cavities. It is then expired by the respiratory process.

Respiration is essentially an interchange of gases. The blood which is carried to the lungs for purification arrives as dark red venous blood, but having expelled its carbon dioxide and absorbed oxygen, the fluid is restored to that bright red tint which constitutes the natural colour of healthy arterial blood. It is interesting to observe that "venous blood is changed in this way out of the body, for if some of the fluid be shaken up in a test-tube with air it will change its colour and become brighter; or, in other words, it will be turned into arterial blood."

The average rate of respiration, the acts of inspiration and expiration combining to form a complete respiration, is normally about eighteen per minute in the healthy adult. During heavy labour or vigorous exercise this rate may rise to twenty-four or even thirty-five per minute. In a state of great mental or emotional excitement the rate of breathing is also increased. In pathological conditions, such as those of fever or lung diseases, it is no uncommon medical experience to observe a rate of respiration ascending to forty, fifty, or even sixty per minute. On the other hand, the respiratory rate declines in sleep; while, when subjected to the influences of opium, and when we become intensely absorbed in intellectual work, or even when witnessing a play, or listening to music or singing, the act of breathing is prolonged. In fact all forms of sustained interest tend to lower the respiration rate.

In a healthy organism breathing is an automatic and almost unconscious act. In truth, unless the painful and laboured respiration of dejected health, or the rapid breathing which results from unusual exertion compel our attention, we are rarely conscious that we are respiring at all. Nevertheless, the function is regulated by nervous influences. Respiration is largely a reflex phenomenon of rhythmical character. But in that part of the brain termed the medulla there exists a special nerve centre which controls respiration. Nervous impulses are constantly travelling to and fro between the muscles of respiration, the lungs, and the brain.

The respiratory structures are highly susceptible to derangement. A cold or catarrh is suffered when an organ becomes inflamed. An inflammation in the nasal passages is called a cold in the head, and an inflamed pharynx is termed a sore throat. Bronchitis arises from inflamed bronchial tubes, while pneumonia, asthma, pleurisy, and other ailments are due to the disease of one or another of the breathing organs. Vitiated air is one of the most malignant enemies of mental and bodily health. The whole art of ventilation exists for the purpose of banishing impure air and its microbic population, and for the provision of a plentiful supply of that oxygen so indispensable to organic vigour.

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer

At the Vicarage.

Someone has said that many a jovial hour is spent inside a mourning-coach. And, strange as it may seem, two of the happiest years of my experience were spent—at a vicarage. I was visiting-governess to the vicar's two young children, who never tired of assuring me that I was the sweetest and nicest of teachers. The vicar and his wife, too, were exceedingly kind and considerate, and spared no effort to make me feel at home. Mrs. Johnston was of a meek and gentle disposition—in striking contrast to the vigorous and breezy personality of the vicar. It was the vicar who played the leading role in domestic as well as in parochial matters; who was, so to speak, the Punch of the show, the hero of the tale, the principal humourist in the comedy.

I have often thought that the vicar, if he had chosen the stage as a profession instead of the Church, would have had a distinguished career. The way he used to mimic the doleful drawl and sanctimonious phraseology of his clerical brethren after attending some evangelical or ecclesiastical meeting would have brought loud applause from a theatrical audience. His mental attitude towards the dignitaries of the Church, who were over him in the Lord, may be judged from the following. One night the bishop was coming to take the evening service, and a little before the time of his arrival the vicar got leisurely up from his chair: "I suppose," he said, "I will have to go to the station and meet that damned, silly, old ass?"

I had only been at the vicarage a short while when the vicar was offered a better living in a neighbouring town. He accepted it; but so soon as it became known there was a storm of disapproval. The vicar was very popular not only with his parishioners but also with the general public of the district, and they had the sense to know when they had a good vicar. Accordingly, they got up a huge petition praying the bishop that he might be allowed to remain in order that they might have the benefit, as heretofore, of his wise counsels and spiritual ministrations. And so the vicar stayed.

A few days after he came home in the afternoon, and, rolling himself on the couch, fairly shook the room with his laughter. He had been walking along the main street, when he was hailed by an old man who followed a very humble occupation. After an exchange of greetings, the old man, in a reproachful tone, said: "Here, vicar, what the hell did you want to go away and leave us for?" Whether the vicar piously admonished the old man for his irreverence I cannot say, but at the vicarage he considered it a capital joke.

One morning when I arrived by the usual train, I found the place in a state of great commotion. There had been an air-raid during the night, and a considerable amount of damage had been done. The inmates of the vicarage were greatly perturbed, and the household arrangements all in disorder. They were breakfasting late, and I was invited into the dining-room to listen to their tale of woe. During the meal Mrs. Johnston looked along the table with a penitent sort of look: "Oh, Henry," she said, "we haven't had prayers this morning." The vicar sprang from his chair as if another bomb had been dropped, exclaiming: "Damn the prayers after a night like last night!"

It never seemed to occur to the Vicar how these little incidents might strike a young lady who was supposed to possess all the religious qualifications necessary for the instruction of his children. But I admired him all the more for his candour and straightforwardness. As Mrs. Johnston said to me one day: "You know, Beatrice, there is one good thing about the Vicar; he is honest." And being perfectly happy in their home, criticism was the last thing I would have thought of. There was a touch of humour in everything he said or did, which at the time was the very salt of life to me. I have seen a phrase somewhere about the dulness of a vicarage, but I often smile to myself at the ignorance of the person who penned it. Dulness was a thing I never knew during the whole of my stay; there was always something happening to amuse one, and add a zest to life. Even in the vacations, if Mrs. Johnson had occasion to send me a card, there was always the little pencilled note appended by the Vicar before dropping it into the post, reminding me that I was missed. The dear old Vicar!

I shall never forget the evening of my departure, on which occasion I stayed to supper. Remembering all their kindness to me, I felt somewhat sorrowful at the thought of leaving them, and going out into the world afresh. But the humour of the Vicar came to the rescue. When he took his seat at the head of the table, looking at me as if I were the twelve Apostles rolled into one, he spread out his arms, and, with deep solemnity, said: "The Last Supper." I could have screamed; it was so funny. It was just as if Aaron's beard, the simple uncouthness of all the Biblical characters, and the hoary traditions of religion were embodied in the simulated gravity of the Vicar's tone.

But if the Vicar played the leading role, the children fulfilled their parts of the comedy with amusing success. One day Minnie came in, and assured us with childish positiveness that she had seen a bear in the garden; and no arguments or suggestion that it might possibly have been a dog would make her admit that she might have been mistaken. When she was ready for bed at night, her mother said she had better ask God's forgiveness for telling such a falsehood. When she came downstairs in the morning, and was asked if she had confessed the lie, with a jubilant and triumphant look she exclaimed: "Yes, I did; but God said, 'O, don't apologize, Miss Johnston. I thought it was a bear myself.'"

But perhaps the greatest surprise came from the Vicar's little son. He was a delicate child, and endeared himself to me in many ways. One day, when we were alone, he had a seizure, which naturally frightened me very much. As he lay in my arms, and I tried to bring him back to consciousness, his face was deathly white, and tears of genuine grief stood in my eyes. I could not help thinking of the possibility that the angels of God were hovering round, ready to bear his little soul away to the mansions of the blest. By-and-bye, he opened his eyes and stared at me. At last he spoke; and the reader may perhaps imagine something of my conflicting emotions when he said: "I—I felt the —— thing coming on." At first I could scarcely credit my hearing; but when the humour of the situation was fully realized, my tears of sorrow were swept away by the flood of tears of laughter at the comical ending of the painful episode.

If it should appear to some conventional people that the Vicarage was lacking in the religious atmosphere usual to such an establishment, I can only say that it had its compensations. The feeling of confidence, and of kindness and good fellowship with which I was always treated, was one of them. The position of a governess is not often an enviable one; but the Vicar it was a pleasure to serve. And at the risk of being considered worldly and irreligious, I will deign to say that, with all his faults, I loved him still. BEATRICE.

Christian Modes and Morals.

IN the evolutionary process there are two forces constantly opposed to each other, namely, the natural development with increased knowledge and an advancing civilization of a more perfect system of morals, and the artificial inculcation and imposition of a moral law derived from the teachings of the Holy Bible. The demoralizing effects of war always act as deterrents to natural development and, temporarily, with more ignorant people, enhance the opportunities of traditional authorities.

Put briefly, in other words, the perennial struggle is between knowledge and belief. Now, a thorough knowledge of any subject is not to be assimilated by anyone unless the knowledge is communicated at a comparatively early stage in life, that is to say, if the knowledge is to be personally and socially serviceable. On the most vital matter of the care of the human body the Churches unanimously protest against the communication by competent authorities of knowledge on the subject, particularly that affecting the procreative functions. On this topic the Churches prefer methods anarchic that would simply leave the ideas of the majority of people in a state of deplorable chaos. The Grundys of both sexes hold up their hands in pious horror when thinkers, like Edward Carpenter, hint at the advisability of informing children when they have attained puberty of the reproductive processes in mammals. Their plan would be to let the children acquire their information from the offensive garbage of pornography. They have no objection to young people reading, marking, learning, and inwardly digesting the "purple patches" of Holy Writ.

Another point in our indictment of Christian teaching is, that such communication of knowledge as it allows is limited by the restrictions imposed by Christian methods to a small minority. "Knowledge is power"; and it is certainly not in the interests of the class that benefits most by the continuance of religion that a rich measure of knowledge should be obtainable by the majority. The more knowledge rules the nearer is brought the doom of the supernatural and the unnatural. Ignorance and credulity are the most dangerous foes of natural development.

The helplessness and hopelessness of Christianity—notwithstanding all the rhetorical bombast of its representatives to the contrary—are demonstrated by the Christian attitude in great national changes and crises. Are the ancient sanctions appealed to to-day with the same effect that was produced by such appeals, say, fifty years since? We trow not. The object of such appeals (fortified by the most extravagant emotionalism) is ever to prove to the great mass of the people that religion is essential to man, and that the Churches have a supernatural mission. Mendacity—a weapon which can only be employed with the ignorant—is freely indulged in, chiefly to convince people that without religion an effective ethical system is impossible, and inferentially that any man who has not religious belief has no moral standard, and is bound by no ethical obligations. The Christian slanders of Paine, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, and Foote stand to illustrate to an admiring world the glory of Christian morality!

In England, it seems that there is on foot a movement for a change in the marriage laws, and this has set the black-coated boys by the ears. Organizations have been formed to oppose any change, and these bear the usual marks of the clerical monopolist. Is it so very much, after all, that the Law of England should be brought into line with the Law of Scotland on this matter? In England, marriage remains a sacrament of the Established Church; in Scotland it is a purely civil contract. And he would be a bold man who should contend that because of this there is a higher moral standard in England than there is in Scotland.

Nowhere has the fumbling feebleness of religionists been more apparent than in the case of the unmarried mother. There is no more grotesque picture than that of a tribunal of censorious Holy Willies passing solemn judgment upon her. But the Holy Willies are mildness itself compared with the Holy Jeans; and it is the latter who are most "edified" when they are listening with rapt attention to the thundering voice from the pulpit that denounces their younger and, likely, more attractive sister!

IGNOTUS.

What Is Nature?

JEAN JACQUES ROSSEAU wanted us to "get back to nature," and you hear lots of people saying that now, and I want to know what it means. Let's run a string of talk through it and see whether we understand it. What is Nature, with a capital N, or without it? Nature is the sum-total of things—the processes of the world. Nature is what brings the flowers in the spring-time, and the rain, and the fruits, and all the sweet things of life.

If man, in the beginning of the ages, had been content to remain in obedience and sinlessness, without the interference of naughty Eve in the Garden of Eden, the world would have been an unpleasant place in which to live. The average age of man would have been 1,000 years, and the only consolation for such a length of life would have been the absence of doctors, life-insurance agents, parsons, publicans, burglars, and picture shows, all of which are parasites caused by the development of micro-organisms in the human system.

There cannot be a doubt
For us, and us alone, the whole creation came about:

Do you know what "the laws of Nature" are? There are none! "Law of Nature" is only a phrase. It is like "Free-will" and "Predestination," it means nothing at all. It is a human phrase and no more. "Nature" and "Nature's Laws" are phrases with contents that differ according to the intellectual status of the people who use them. To one of our blackfellows "Nature" simply means "Debil, Debil." That's all. Nature, to an educated man, means the observed order of things. But there is no law! Do you remember the story of the Lord Buddh of India? I never grow weary of it, for it is the story of "Nature." He saw how lovely "Nature" was, and how kind and fair and mystical. He saw the beautiful colours on the birds, and he heard the tinkle of the falling water, and he heard the laughing nesting-songs of the birds, and he was glad that life was so lovely:—

But looking deep, he saw,
The thorns which grow upon this rose of life:
How the swath peasant sweated for his wage,
Toiling for leave to live; and how he urged
The great-eyed oxen through the flaring hours,
Goading their velvet flanks, them marked he, too,
How lizard fed on ant, and snake on him,
And kite on both, and how the fish-hawk robbed,
The fish-tiger of that which it had seized;
The strike chasing the bulbul, which did hunt,
The jewelled butterflies, till everywhere,
Each, slew a slayer, and in turn was slain,
Life living upon death, so the fair show,
Veiled one vast, savage, grim conspiracy,
Of mutual murder, from the worm to man,
Who himself kills his fellow.

Then you have the story of "Nature." There you have "the laws of Nature," and there you have the reason why I don't want to have to "follow nature." Nature is horribly cruel, and I'm not going to "follow nature"; and what can I do? Nature provides the poison glands of the snake, and she sends droughts, and kills off the helpless and innocent things. Nature "is red in tooth and claw," life preys on life, and the law appears to "eat or be eaten," and the things that can't make a living die out. Nature has no blind asylums or benevolent institutions. There is no sort of namby-pambyism about Nature. She's a real dandy! You must be the mark with her every time, or it's you for the scrap-heap! Then what do we mean when we say that you ought to follow Nature?

"THE DEFEAT OF THE CROSS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In your issue of May 5, Mr. J. T. Lloyd busies himself in proving, evidently to his own entire satisfaction, that "in conflict with the world's forces the Cross has been totally defeated." For this modest conclusion it is somewhat difficult to find any adequate basis set out in his article. I certainly cannot find it in Mr. Lloyd's self-contradictory criticism of the Times writer on religion, whom in one sentence he charges with "tantalizing vagueness," and a little lower down with being "blindly dogmatic."

Moreover, Mr. Lloyd is clearly determined not to be outmatched in respect of dogmatism. His assertion that the truth and the life of Christianity have "produced, on the one hand, cruel tyranny, and, on the other, abject slavery," compels admiration—using "admiration" in its original Latin sense. Reasoners of Mr. Lloyd's stamp may well be regarded as the un-apostolic successors of the philosopher who maintained the thesis that snow is black.

Naturally, Mr. Lloyd makes great play with the shortcomings of the Churches. Of course, the Churches have "failed." Had they succeeded, it would have been a bigger miracle than any recorded in the New Testament. Every endeavour to realize or live up to an ideal is a failure. Even the noblest-minded Freethinker cannot live fully up to his ideal, constricted though that ideal be by the refusal to take account of eternal righteousness.

As to the statement that "in all sections of society..... unbelievers in their tens of thousands are to be found," one can only say that these cohorts of unbelief, if existent, are not working very hard at it, seeing (to take a rough test) that Christians denominations publish large and well-edited journals, while anti-Christian periodicals have to appeal persistently for more subscribers and subsidizing funds.

No doubt Mr. Lloyd will find that such remissness is due to the selfishness of human nature and preoccupations of human life. Will he be willing to admit the same plea in mitigation of judgment on the "failure" of Christianity?

REFORM IN LEICESTER.

SIR,—As the town of Leicester has been very much before your readers recently on account of its splendid pioneer work in connection with "the best of causes," I should like to be allowed to point out that, apart from its signal services in the realm of Freethought (which alone will secure for it a permanent niche in the temple of fame), that remarkable town has other claims to the gratitude of mankind; notably, for its enduring services in exposing the fallacies of that other privileged class, and twin sister to the theological priesthood—the medical hierarchy. This Mecca of the anti-vaccinist will always be remembered in history for the part it has played in respect of that alleged prophylactic; for by its control experiment, Leicester has shivered to pieces the claims of vaccination, and knocked the bottom out of a grotesque superstition.

Leicester stands incomparably higher than any other town of its size in regard to sanitation and hygiene, and to this is due its fine health record, which ranks higher, indeed, than that of many other large towns whose topographical situation would appear to be more advantageous.

To what is due the pre-eminent position which Leicester now occupies in the civic and social life of the nation? I submit that it is primarily because it is more richly endowed than other towns with administrators whose minds are less trammelled by conventional shibboleths, and who possess in a superlative degree that wide-viewing Freethought to which Mr. Gould refers. Thus we have in Leicester, if not a control case, certainly an indication of the lines on which civic and social life would be conducted if our legislators, and those responsible for the moulding of public opinion, had their minds cleared of the incubus of dead cults, superstitions, and unscientific formulæ, and allowed their reasoning and intellectual factors to have full play.

A RATIONALIST "GREAT ADVANCE."

WILL YOU HELP?

IN view of the organized efforts now being made on the part of the Churches to awaken a "Religious Revival" on a colossal scale (vide Cardinal Bourne's Manifesto and similar pronouncements), it has been decided to make a counter effort by circulating Rationalist books in tens of thousands, if not indeed hundreds of thousands, throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The four following books have been chosen for the inauguration of the campaign, and others will be drawn upon later:—

1. THE AGE OF REASON. By THOMAS PAINE. 128 pp.; 3d. net, by post 4d.
2. THE CHURCHES AND MODERN THOUGHT: By P. VIVIAN. 432 pp.; 9d. net, by post 1s.
3. THE CHRISTIAN HELL, from the First to the Twentieth Century. By HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. 160 pp., with 28 illustrations; 6d. net, by post 7½d.
4. THE RELIGION OF THE OPEN MIND. By ADAM GOWANS WHYTE, author of "The World's Wonder Stories," etc. 160 pp.; 9d. net, by post 10½d.

The above four books contain a reasoned and searching criticism of the teachings of the Churches, and also an effective presentment of the constructive case for Rationalism. No impartial person can read them without having his mind broadened, if not transformed.

It is no exaggeration to say that "THE CHURCHES AND MODERN THOUGHT" has already brought many thousands into the ranks of Rationalism; while it is certain that "THE AGE OF REASON" has, during its eventful history, shattered the convictions of hundreds of thousands who previously had belonged to some religious denomination. "THE CHRISTIAN HELL" is a thorough exposure of probably the most repellent teachings of Orthodoxy, aided by striking photographs reproduced from religious publications. Mr. Whyte, in his "RELIGION OF THE OPEN MIND," writes persuasively and with a master hand, at one and the same time entrancing the reader by his captivating style and compelling acceptance of the scientific truths which he sets forth. It is, in short, doubtful whether any other four books are better suited for the inquiring mind, or more likely to arouse interest in the Gospel of Reason.

Readers of "THE FREETHINKER" are earnestly invited to assist in launching "THE BIG PUSH" which Messrs. Watts are planning with all the resources at their command. Without co-operation little can be accomplished; with it, wonderful results may follow. Every Freethinker is asked to order at least one copy of each of the above four books for distribution among his friends or in his immediate district; and those who are in a position to help more generously are requested to order six or a dozen copies. Those friends who prefer to send a donation in aid of the work may do so with every confidence that it will be used to the fullest advantage, especially in regard to the circulation of free copies to soldiers in the camps at home and in the trenches abroad.

One copy of each of the four books will be forwarded, carriage paid, to any inland address for 2s. 9d.; six copies of each for 14s.; or twelve of each for 26s. The Trade will be supplied with quantities on very liberal terms.

Advertising the Gospel.

One would have thought that the last thing the Churches needed advice upon was the subject of advertising. For they seem to have been always at it, and to be past-masters at the art. If a clergyman happens to be killed during an air-raid, there is a special paragraph in all the papers. If a chaplain is killed in France, extensive advertisement of the fact is assured. If a man who belongs to some dissenting sect is appointed to a Government office, the Nonconformists secure a paragraph in the public press giving full prominence to so important a fact. In the case of the Salvation Army, the advertising is more elaborate than with any other religious body. A favourite method here is to secure some obliging journalist and tell him all the good the Army does, and then reprint the supplied copy as independent testimony to the value of the Army's work. And the public reads without the slightest notion that what they are really getting is the Army's own puffing of its own activities. Nothing, in fact, is so well advertised as Christianity; and, as with many other shoddy things, to cease to advertise is to cease to live.

The Clergy at Work.

We were, consequently, surprised to see the appearance of a volume on Church Advertising, published by Lippincott & Co., made up of nine articles by clergymen, and the remainder of the contributors being advertising agents, with one or two laymen thrown in. All the writers emphasize the value of advertising, and advocate that it shall be more effective. The newspaper men, naturally, emphasize the value of advertising—of course, quite disinterestedly. But parsons are wary birds, and one, the Rev. R. C. Keary, explains that the right way is to wait upon the editors and explain to them the number of members represented by the Church. The connection between this and newspaper sales is left unspoken, but it will be understood. The Rev. Christian F. Reisner explains that good audiences may be secured by some such methods as the following: A man had had seven acres of dahlias that were being ruined by the frost. He gave 800 to the Church, and one was given to each attendant. There was a very much advertised apple, and the agent agreed to give one to every person who attended. A Chicago baker was persuaded to give a loaf of bread to everyone who came to Church, and this was given with the text: "I am the bread of life." Rev. P. B. Jenkins, Milwaukee, explains that among other advertising methods they adopt the plan of giving "Go to Church Sunday" buttons for men, and pins for women. Blotters for hotel writing-rooms with suitable advertisements. Ditto for school childrens' desks. Lead pencils for school children bearing the name of a Church, etc. We do not think that when it comes to advertising—particularly advertising on the cheap—that parsons have much to learn from newspaper men.

Some Hints for the Churches.

Altogether, though, this volume is a little disappointing. Considering that it hails from America it ought to have shown more enterprise. We really think that better and more effective titles might have been given them: "Preparedness in Religion," "Submarine Sins," "Short Cuts to Hell," and similar ones might have been suggested. In these days of War loans, meat scarcity, and food shortage, why not "Chops From the Lamb of God, Every Evening at 8, Free"? or "The Marriage Feast of Cana: Every Man His Own Brewer"? or "Jesus in the Wilderness: a Lesson in Economy, and a Tip to Those who Wish to Invest in War Loans"? or "The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes: Every Man His Own Food Controller"? What is needed is a manual for the use of preachers with a selection of titles. There are already manuals which supply them with quotations, and "experiences" (which become their own by purchase), and texts. Why not titles? For Christianity really lives by and on advertisement. It is as constantly puffed as soaps or medicines, and the methods are strikingly similar. The familiar notice that the Gospel alone makes life endurable is identical in kind with that which declares the value of Carter's Liver Pills or Kutnow's Powder. The testimonials from pale people who have benefited from pink pills are substantially one with those affirming the good done by regular doses of the Gospel taken immediately after supper.

Pills and Piety.

Such an announcement as the following, for instance, may be read as a testimonial to a pill maker or a mission, just as one reads or omits the words enclosed in brackets: "Until I became acquainted with (the glorious Gospel of Christ) Blank's pills I did not know what an hour's peace meant. Life was dull, and without enjoyment. I was irritable and unkind to all around me. One day a friend gave me (an invitation to a mission service conducted by the converted Pentonville Pet) some of your pills. Without much faith I (attended the service) took them as directed. I had not (been long in the room) taken more than three doses before I was aware of a (change of heart) marked improvement. My (feeling of despair) pains disappeared. I felt a new man. Instead of a (taste for evil associations) distaste for food, I (sought for better companions) took my meals regularly, and did my work without fatigue. I would not now be without (the Gospel) your pills for worlds. (It has) They have made a new man of me, and I (am now an earnest worker for Christ) have recommended them to all my friends."

* * *

"Spoof."

The sober truth is that the position of Christianity to-day is almost entirely due to advertising. We have heard men, whose sole literary provender appeared to be the Daily Mail, talk about the literary beauties of the Bible. Others talk glibly about the immense benefits conferred upon the world by Christianity, or the superiority of Jesus to all other world-teachers. Quite clearly, they know nothing whatever about these matters. They are simply repeating the advertisement distributed so lavishly by the Churches. Every business man knows that in advertising the whole thing is repetition. Keep on saying the same thing often enough, and suggestion does its work. And this advertising of Christianity has been carried on for centuries. It has been worked into school-books and nursery rhymes. Advertisements of Christianity have been cunningly inserted into sober works on history and solemn essays on philosophy. And, unlike the ordinary business man, the Churches have had the inestimable benefit of being able to suppress advertisements of would-be competitors. They have had the monopoly of the finest hoardings in the country—Parliament, the Law Courts, Local Councils, etc. No business in the world has ever been so advertised as Christianity has been. A mere fraction of it would have made a multi-millionaire of the greatest quack that ever lived. And the public has been compelled to find the money for all the "puffing."

The Limits of Advertising.

But in spite of this extensive puffing, the business is to-day anything but flourishing. New business can no longer be completely suppressed, and old customers are wandering into rival establishments. New tastes are developing, and the clergy are in the awkward position that, while they can vary the advertisement, they cannot secure a new class of goods. And that makes the situation more awkward still. For the difficulty with a quack article is that, while you may build up a big business by extensive advertising, you cannot maintain it with old customers. New ones must be continually found. As Abraham Lincoln said, while some people may be fooled all the time, all the people can't be fooled all the time. For generations the clergy overcame this difficulty—and still do so to a considerable extent—by breeding customers for their wares. Children were brought up with a carefully cultivated taste for the goods supplied by religious houses. But now this source of supply is beginning to fail. The close market can no longer be maintained. Competitors are coming along, and they affect the young as well as the old. And really free competition is finally fatal to all impostures. Place the clergy and their wares in an open market, and their occupation will soon be a thing of the past.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

A New-Old Argument for Atheism.

PRINCIPAL P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D., states in his exceptionally clever book, entitled The Justification of God, that "the only vindication of God is God." It must be admitted, at the outset, that if the Almighty does not defend his character, no one else can do it for him. In the Preface, Dr. Forsyth makes the fundamental concession that God does not at any time demonstrate the truth of his justice, but contents himself with saving man from doubting it. Now, the existence of evil is a fact which cannot be denied. Its malign power is to be felt at every turn. The theologians call it sin, and Dr. Forsyth speaks of the victory over it "as costing God his life." It stands to reason, of course, that "if God could be abolished there could have been no real God." There is, therefore, an issue between evil and God which we have no choice but to characterize as the sharpest, in fact the absolute, issue of the Universe. This crucial issue the author describes in the following forcible language:—

> Sin is the death of God. Die, sin must, or God. Its nature is to go on from indifference to absolute hostility and malignity to the holy; and one must go down. There is no compromise between the holy and the sinful when the issue is seen from the height of heaven to the depth of hell, and followed into the uttermost parts of the soul. And that is the nature of the issue as it is set in the Cross of Christ. It is the eternal holiness in conflict for its life. In the Son of God the whole being of God is staked upon this issue, and his whole campaign with the world; it is not one battle alone; nor is the sin he met but one of many foes. In the conflict the righteousness of God is either secured or lost to the world for ever. It is a question of a final salvation both for man and for God. God there must "save his word," which is his kingdom, which is his Godhead; else the realm of Satan takes its place in control of the world (pp. 151-2).

After all, that is not a fair statement of the all-important issue. The sentence, "Die, sin must, or God," conveys an entirely erroneous impression. Our contention is that the existence of evil disproves that of God, for, as the Principal says, "sin is the death of God," or, rather, of the belief in God. Evil and God cannot possibly co-exist even for a moment. Not only "die, sin must, or God," but the very fact of sin shows clearly that there is no God to die. Like all the smaller men, Dr. Forsyth evades the real problem at issue by an act of moral as well as logical cowardice. He pictures God as the author of two creations, the first and the second. The first, on its moral side, was so constructed that it was liable at any minute to go wrong. As the author says: "There was never such a fateful experiment as when God trusted man with freedom." The Creator ran a tremendous risk when he endowed man with a faulty nature, in possession of which he could choose either good or evil; but, according to the Principal, it was a risk well worth running:—

> Our Christian faith is that he well knew what he was about. He did not do that as a mere adventure, not without knowing that he had the power to remedy any abuse of it that might occur, and to do this by a new creation more mighty, marvellous, and mysterious than the first. He had means to emancipate even freedom, to convert moral freedom, even in its ruin, into spiritual. If the first creation drew on his might, the second taxed his all- might. It revealed his power as moral majesty, as holy omnipotence, most chiefly shown in the mercy that redeems and reconciles. To redeem creation is a more creative act than it was to create it. It is the last thing omnipotence could do.....It is no slack knot that the Saviour has to undo. All the energy of a perverse world in its created freedom pulled on the tangle to tighten it. And its undoing has given the supreme form to all God's dealing with the world. But at the same time the snarl is not beyond being untied. Man is born to be redeemed. The final key to the first creation is the second; and the first was done with the second in view. If moral freedom is the crown of the first creation, spiritual, holy freedom is the goal of moral; and it is the gift in the second creation. The first creation was the prophecy of the second; the second was the first tragically "arrived" (pp. 125-6).

Such is the God worshipped and preached by Dr. Forsyth, a being who culpably trifles with himself and his universe, whom to know is to despise. He created man in the foreknowledge that man so made would inevitably degenerate into a disgraceful wreck—into a howling reproach to his Maker; but he did so on purpose, designedly, and fully aware that he was thereby casting a dark cloud upon his name. By itself the first creation was highly discreditable to him, in face of which no justification of him would be possible. As a matter of fact, every philosophical theodicy ever attempted must be pronounced a logical failure. God's complete justification is to be found only in the fulfilment of the first creation in the second. In other words, the Cross of Christ represents the powers of the second creation retrieving, or more than making up for, all the losses incurred in consequence of the first. The moral resource inherent in the Creator was "put forth in Christ—in his overcoming of the world on the Cross, and his new creation of it in the Spirit." "The great goal is not the mere fruitage of the first creation, but another creation more creative still." Thus, by the Cross, are saved both God's reputation and man's immortal soul. "Man is only saved by God's holiness, by the tragic action of a holy God, by the honour done by God in Christ to his own holy name and purpose.....His justification of man is only possible by a practical justification of himself."

Such is Principal Forsyth's theory; but it completely breaks down when confronted by the facts of life. Instead of justifying God it annihilates him. If "die, sin must, or God," it follows that, sin being still very much alive, God must have died; but, on the author's own showing, "if God could be abolished there could have been no real God." Dr. Forsyth has thus furnished us with the most cogent of all arguments for the non-existence of a Supreme Being. With evil rampant everywhere, especially just now in the heart of Christendom, who has the hardihood to declare that an all-good and all-loving Deity sitteth as king for ever? It is doubtless true that the War, "the present cataclysm, is an acute condensation of what has been going on in Nature, human and other, for millenniums"; and it may be pertinent for a divine to ask, "if faith could survive that, need it succumb to this?" But the real point is that the faith of multitudes for generations could not survive that, and that to-day thousands more are by this brought, for the first time, to realize the true significance of that, with the result that faith vanishes never to return. The War is acting simply as a marvellous eye-opener to myriads, who either have lost or are surely losing their belief in God. The Cross, like Providence, is fast becoming a thing of the past.

J. T. Lloyd.

Charles Lamb: Humanist.

His graceful and lovely nature can hardly find expression in any form without giving pleasure to others.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The most delightful, the most provoking, the most witty and sensible of men. He always made the best pun and the best remark in the course of the evening.—William Hazlitt.

Charles Lamb is the most lovable of writers, and, despite his own quaint jest that he wrote for antiquity, he becomes every year a more popular author with posterity. "A fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy," it could hardly be otherwise, for much that he writes awakens a sense of personal affection in the reader. Writing of youth, of death, of familiar faces, of homely things, he keeps marvellously close to life. It was, we feel, just so with us in childhood, at school, in this sad or glad experience. This power, together with the humanist temperament of getting at the heart of things, makes him keenly alive to life.

As a man, Charles Lamb was well worth knowing. What would it not be worth to have had a few hours of his company? In his buoyant humour, or in his more serious vein, it was all one. Suppose we could have dined with him that day when the dish was the sucking-pig that Farmer Collier sent him, and heard the good wishes wafted to the giver:—

> May your granaries be full, and your rats empty, and your chickens plump, and your envious neighbours lean, and your labourers busy, and you as idle and as happy as the days are long.

Or imagine we had been present when the stately and eloquent Coleridge asked him, "Charles, did you ever hear me preach?" and he replied in his amusing way, "I never heard you do anything else." Or what if we had taken a hand at whist when Martin Burney was his partner, and he called out, "Martin, if dirt were trumps, what a hand you'd have." Or, better still, had we been with him that Saturday night when he brought home the folio volume of Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays that he had coveted for weeks, while he had saved the price of it, and he could not think of going to bed till the loose leaves had been pasted in, and he had read his favourite passages. Or, best of all, had we been among those to whom his door was open on the famous Wednesday evenings in the Inner Temple Lane. Wordsworth was one of the number when he was in town, and Coleridge, Haydon, Hazlitt, Barry Cornwall, and Talfourd. Surrounded by such a galaxy of genius, it must have been a rich memory, an abiding delight, to have been with Lamb at times like these. It must have been a festal evening such as those ever-memorable nights at Frederick the Great's palace, when the nimble wit of Voltaire challenged the best brains of Europe, or those suppers at the "Mermaid," when rare Ben Jonson exchanged quips and cranks with the smiling Shakespeare, and the brilliant Elizabethan wits made the night merry with their jests.

The austere Thomas Carlyle was one of the very few men of note who misunderstood Lamb. Carlyle's seriousness, his want of humour, his dogmatism, shut the doors of sympathy. When they met the atmosphere was electric. On one occasion, while they were waiting for their host, Carlyle looked out of the window, watching the flight of some pigeons. Lamb, hurt, perhaps, at his silence, went up to him, and asked: "Mr. Carlyle, are you a poulterer?" Another time, as they were together in the hall, preparing to leave a party after the sage had monopolized the conversation, Lamb handed Carlyle his wide-awake hat with the remark: "Is this your turban?" Accordingly, we find the philosopher writing in his journal: "Charles Lamb I sincerely believe to be in some considerable degree insane! A more pitiful, rickety, gasping, staggering, stammering tomfool I do not know." Carlyle was as completely wrong with regard to Lamb as he was in error concerning Henri Heine, Voltaire, and Herbert Spencer. Lamb's jests often contained shrewd observation, as in his ironic expression of regret that the Royalists did not hang John Milton, for then we might have laughed at them.

Other men of genius who knew Lamb realized his real worth. They saw the good nature under the uncouth exterior. Lamb earned his own living, paid his own way, was the helper, not the helped; a man who was beholden to no one, a shrewd man, capable of advice, strong in counsel. He was ever ready both with sympathy and help, generous and unselfish. He had pensioners on his bounty, among whom were an old teacher of his own, and a cripple whose only claim was that he was recommended by his friend, Southey. Barry Cornwall tells a characteristic story. He was in Lamb's company one day, in low spirits, which Lamb thought due to want of money. Turning suddenly, Lamb said: "My dear boy, I have a quantity of useless things, including a hundred pounds in my desk, that I don't know what to do with. Take it."

Lamb was a hero, modest, and unobtrusive. There was a taint of insanity in the family, and Lamb never married. What this meant to him may be guessed from the pathetic pages of his essay—Dream Children. His sister, Mary, killed her mother in a fit of frenzy. A few weeks' restraint restored her to her right mind, but the disease recurred at intervals ever afterwards, and a retreat was provided in a private asylum. There was warning of their coming, and a friend has related how he met the brother and sister at such a time, walking hand-in-hand across the fields to the asylum, both in tears.

If Charles Lamb waged an unequal war against fate, he was, at least, a happy soldier. When his turn came he yielded up his broken, but not dishonoured, sword to fate, the conqueror, with a brave and a humble heart:—

> What good is like to this,
> To do worthy the writing, and to write
> Worthy the reading and the world's delight?

Materialism.

III.

(Concluded from p. 281.)

THE nerve-cells of the brain, at least so far as those of the cerebrum are concerned, which are arranged in a convulated structure of grey matter, constitute the organs of consciousness. They are connected with each other by numerous nerve-fibres, and thus, under normal circumstances, is made possible the harmonious working of sensory and motor centres.

We have no evidence that it is possible for consciousness—including thought, feeling, volition—to take place in the absence of a nervous system of some kind; while there is evidence in support of the conclusion that consciousness is a mode of motion, which becomes manifest when a material brain functions. In support of this, we may mention that the stimulation of an end-organ must be transmitted to the brain, in order that we may become conscious of it. As a result of mental activity, there is an increase in the circulation of the blood within the brain, which means that material elements are being used up while we are thinking. Along with this, there goes on an increase in the wasting of nerve-cells. And our consciousness may be interrupted, or destroyed, when the brain is injured, or when the supply of blood to the brain becomes greatly increased or decreased. In fact, imperfect development of the brain, with regard to what we might call the harmonious formation of its internal physiological structure, will mean relative imperfection in its thinking. That is, if we could take the brain of a man who has lived in a given environment and attained a certain degree of thinking; and if we were to notice its various imperfections of a serious nature with regard to blood-supply, the formation of convolutions, and the arrangement of nerve-fibres and nerve-cells, we might justly conclude that the thinking capacity of that brain would have been greater had it developed without those imperfections. The same environment is to be presupposed when we think of the brain in question in its imperfect state, and in its state of better development, so as to have it under the same influences in each state.

The process by which consciousness, whether as thought, emotion, or volition, is made possible, may be described in the following manner. Impressions of objects of the outer world are made upon the end-organs of the nerve-fibres, and the latter transmit the impressions to the sensory-cells of the brain, from whence they pass, by means of inter-connecting nerves, to the motor-cells. Rearrangements of the molecules of the grey matter of the brain take place, and the result is thought, emotion, or volition; or, perhaps, all three combined. Various degrees of complexity in the process are possible; but I am more concerned with the fact that the result from this process is due to the functioning of a material organism. To explain consciousness, as some would have us do, is an impossibility at the present time; and Materialists are content with describing the processes by which it is made possible. And the processes are such that we are led to form the conclusion that consciousness is motion manifesting itself in a peculiar way, and that this mode of motion is bound up with a certain kind of highly sensitive matter. This, of course, eliminates the idea of a soul, or a mind, capable of living apart from, or of existing as a distinct being within, a material body. If the term "soul" is to be used at all, it should only be used as an abstraction, denoting the total psychic activity of the nervous system.
